Introduction,	141

CHAPTER I.

DIRECTIONS how to prepare for a communion Sabbath,
I. Carefully endeavour and study to have a just and right uptaking of the nature, ends, and uses of the Lord's supper; and the work of communicating while at the Lord's table,	141
II. Be finally persuaded, that partaking of the Lord's supper is a most necessary duty; and the neglecting of it is a very great sin,	142
III. Believe and be persuaded, that communicating is not only a duty; but that it is a duty incumbent upon you to communicate frequently,	150
IV. Be persuaded of the necessity of solemn preparation before you approach to the Lord's table,	154
V. Consider that both habitual and actual preparation is requisite for worthy communicating,	156
VI. Be convinced of the greatness of the sin and hazard of unworthy communicating,	157
VII. Sequester yourselves from worldly cares and business some time before,	160
VIII. Set some time apart for the work of self-examination,	162
1. The examination of our state,	163
2. ————— of our sins,	167
3. ————— of our wants,	168
4. ————— of our ends,	168
5. ————— of our graces,	169
DIRECT. IX.—Set time apart for deep humiliation and mourning for your sins, before you approach to the Lord's table,	173
X. Flee to Jesus Christ by faith, and embrace him as he is offered to you in the gospel,	179
XI. Come and join yourselves unto the Lord in a perpetual and personal covenant,	186
XII. Labour for a thorough cleansing of both heart and life from sin, and turn unto the Lord in the ways of new obedience,	190
XIII. Meditate much upon the death and sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ,	194
XIV. Be frequent and fervent in prayer,	196
XV. After you have done your utmost, see that you lay no stress thereupon, but wholly distrust your own preparation,	199

CHAPTER II.

ESSAY ON THE LIFE AND TIMES

OF THE

REV. JOHN WILLISON.

THE Works of the Rev. John Willison of Dundee require no recommendation from any one, to introduce them to the notice of the Scottish people; for they have long been among the most familiarly and extensively known of those household books that are found wherever true piety exists, whether in the poor man's cottage, or in the halls of the wealthy. But the character of the times in which Willison lived, the events which agitated the church and the kingdom, and the active and influential share which he took in these transactions, are comparatively little known to many who are well acquainted with his chief religious productions. This is not as it ought to be. For there exists a sort of spurious piety, of the nature of what has been called quietism, which induces many to place the chief duty of ministers and religious people in general in keeping entirely aloof from the controversial struggles which occasionally convulse the church. It is at least possible, that a survey of the life and times of Willison, tracing his conduct in public affairs, may serve to convince them that a minister may be a man of a fervently spiritual mind and distinguished practical piety, and yet be an able controversialist and an ardent and indefatigable leader in church courts. It may be added also, that there is in reality very little known respecting Willison's private or personal history, in which it appears that there occurred no remarkable incidents deserving of peculiar notice. For both these reasons combined, it has been resolved in the following Essay on his Life and Times, to state nothing more respecting his personal history than merely what is necessary to give continuity to the narrative, and to direct attention chiefly to his public life, and to those transactions in which he occupied a conspicuous position.

John Willison was born in the year 1680, in the neighbourhood of Stirling, where his father possessed a small property. No definite records have been preserved respecting the early years of Willison, except the very common statement, that he received a regular education at school and college, during the course of which his manifest ability and extensive acquirements gave promise of future eminence. Soon after he had completed his academic career, he received a unanimous call to Brechin, and was ordained to the office of the ministry in that parish in the year 1703. Immediately upon entering into this important charge, he applied himself to the discharge of his duties with the greatest faithfulness, energy, and prudence. Perceiving the extreme value of those instructions which are addressed to the young, and adapted to their comprehension, he devoted a large share of his attention to visiting and catechising. In this part of the ministerial duty he was peculiarly fitted to excel, in consequence of his remarkable clearness and simplicity of language and earnestness of manner. The careful preparation with which he entered upon what too many regard as a very easy task, is apparent from these admirable catechisms which occupy so large a portion of his works, and which are well deserving of the attentive perusal and imitation of all instructors of youth, ministers not less than ordinary teachers. Mr. Willison remained at Brechin, in the zealous and active discharge of his pastoral duties, for about fifteen years, during which time his reputation in the church continued steadily to increase, marking him out for a more important position, when a fitting opportunity should occur. At length about the year 1718 he was translated to Dundee, in which large and flourishing town he spent the remainder of his days, eminently distinguished for personal piety and unshrinking faithfulness in all his public duties, and enjoying the unspeakable happiness of seeing the work of the Lord prospering in his hands among a large and deeply attached congregation.

Mention has been made of the great attention paid by Mr. Willison to the important work of catechising the young; and although this is a duty which no conscientious minister can neglect, yet there is no reason to doubt, that both in this point and in many others, his conduct was so far influenced by the force of circumstances, and that he devoted himself chiefly to that department of his labours which was not only the most hopeful, but where also the necessity of strenuous exertion was most apparent. That the young, not only of Willison's congregation, but of all Scotland, were peculiarly in need of elementary instruction, at that time, may be easily proved, but the proof will require us to take a rapid survey of the state of the nation a little before and at the period when he began his ministry.

When Charles II. was restored to the throne of his ancestors, in the midst of the giddy and frenzied joy of the nation, which in its feverish exultation, neglected to stipulate for the security of civil and religious liberty, that heartless monarch and his equally heartless but more designing courtiers, immediately began to subvert the constitution, preparatory for the erection of a complete and absolute despotism. The first direct act of tyranny was the assumption by the king of ecclesiastical supremacy in Scotland, which but a few years before he had solemnly abjured, when with lifted hands he swore to observe and defend the national covenant. But the church and people of Scotland were not convinced by the monarch's perjury, and therefore they refused to yield obedience to this usurped supremacy. Then began the fearful conflict. About four hundred of the most faithful and godly ministers in the land were driven from their houses and places of worship; forbidden to preach the gospel to a devoted and religious people; and exposed to every kind of suffering when they presumed to obey God rather than man. For not less than twenty-eight terrific years the dreadful struggle continued to rage with unabated, or rather with increasing violence; while power put forth all its terrors, fraud employed all its treacheries, and persecution glutted its burning thirst in the blood of myriads of guiltless victims. It has been computed, that not less than eighteen thousand persons, men, women, and children, suffered by death, exile, or imprisonment during that fearful period. In many parts of the kingdom the country was almost entirely depopulated, and the few inhabitants that remained were reduced to a state of the utmost destitution and wretchedness. Even where such dire results had not taken place, the people had sunk or been cast into the depths of ignorance, and thoroughly demoralized. Such were the fruits of despotism and prelacy in Scotland, and such was the state of the people, when at the revolution the Presbyterian church was restored to its rightful position as the national church, and permitted again to go forth on its great and sacred mission to heal and bless the bleeding and sinful land.

The difficulties which the Presbyterian church had to encounter, when restored to her national position at the revolution, were greater than can be readily conceived. Of the faithful four hundred who had been ejected in 1662, not more than sixty had survived the period of persecution, without having yielded to any compromise of their principles. A considerable number had at different times accepted the indulgences offered to ministers by the civil power. But as these indulgences were also limitations, and as they were based upon the assumption, that the civil power could either grant or withhold the liberty of preaching, those who consented to accept and act under them were regarded as having so far subjected the church to an Erastian supremacy. And the very fact, that they had consented to a compromise liable to such an accusation, tended both to diminish the regard entertained for them by their more consistent brethren and countrymen, and also to hamper themselves in their subsequent proceedings, and rendered them the less able to resist the encroachments of the civil government. The ministers who were in this condition formed a large majority in the General Assembly at its first meeting, and thus there was an element of weakness in the church from the first moment of its restoration as the Church of Scotland. Besides, both these bodies united were not nearly sufficient to supply all the parish churches in the kingdom; and as king William was extremely desirous to be on good terms with the Episcopalian Church of England, he strove to effect something like a junction between the best of the prelate curates in Scotland and the re-established Presbyterian church. This gave rise to what was called the scheme of "comprehension," according to which, while the Presbyterian church was to be that of the nation, all the prelate incumbents might be allowed to retain their parishes and enjoy their civil emoluments, upon subscribing the Confession of Faith, and becoming bound not to attempt the subversion of Presbyterian church government and discipline, yielding submission at the same time to the jurisdiction of the presbyteries. In this "comprehension scheme" all were to be included except those who, after a fair and full trial, should be found guilty of such criminalities as required their deposition from the office of the ministry. The result was what might have been expected. Several hundreds of the prelate incumbents consented to these conditions, and were admitted into the church "on the easiest terms;" while many more who refused to submit, were nevertheless allowed to retain their positions as parish ministers, though not admitted to any participation in church government.

The Church of Scotland, as thus constituted, had a very difficult task to accomplish, while her own energies were considerably paralyzed, both by the admission of such un congenial elements, and by the dissatisfaction with which a large proportion of the people regarded such compromises. In some districts of the country the prelatic intermixture was but small, in others it prevailed to a large extent. Where it prevailed, the people were neglected, and either discontent increased, or ignorance was allowed to remain unmolested, attended by all the inevitable evils of vice and immorality. Generally, indeed, upon the death of a prelatic incumbent in any such district, he was succeeded by a sound and earnest Presbyterian, by whose faithful and vigorous exertions a great change was soon produced. Such was the case with regard to Forfarshire, when Willison was called to Brechin. A very considerable number of the parish churches in that district of country were still possessed by prelatic incumbents; and as a direct consequence, the people were in a great degree ignorant of the first principles of the gospel, and at least equally regardless of the practical duties and observances of vital Christianity. As might have been expected from such a faithful servant of Christ, the first and most constant endeavours of Willison were directed to the discharge of those parts of the ministerial office which most directly met the necessities of his people. And although possessed of such talents for public speaking, as readily gained him the reputation of being an able and popular preacher, he devoted his attention for several years chiefly to the important task of communicating instruction to the young. In this he was remarkably successful; and he afterwards gave the matured results of the method which he had so long and zealously prosecuted to the public in the form of Catechisms, some of which are still household treatises throughout Scotland, as, for instance, "The Mother's Catechism."

To the improvement of his people in more advanced life he was equally devoted, though this necessarily required a labour of a different kind. It cannot be regarded as at all strange, that the grievous sin of Sabbath-breaking should have been common in the district which was the sphere of Willison's labours, when we advert to the fact, that it was one of those in which prelacy had been most prevalent, and where still many prelatic incumbents retained the parish churches. In order to remedy, so far as might lie in his power, this grievous and demoralizing evil, Willison not only devoted much of his preaching to the subject of the proper method of keeping holy the Sabbath day, but also at length cast his matured arguments and exhortations on this important matter into the form of a "Treatise concerning the Sanctification of the Lord's day." This very valuable work was published about the year 1712 or 1713, and appears to have been the earliest of Willison's productions as an author. It has often been re-printed, and although many works of a similar character have since been written, there is not one in existence to which we would more earnestly direct the attention of any serious inquirer who wished to have his mind fully enlightened respecting the sanctification of the Christian Sabbath. The work is not of a controversial character, yet it gives, in the manner, at that time common, of objection and answer, a very full view of all the arguments generally used either for or against that strict religious observance of the entire day, which the true church of Scotland has always striven to inculcate.

It can scarcely fail to strike any thoughtful reader, that there are some startling resemblances between the present times and those in which that Treatise was written, especially with regard to the increasing crime of Sabbath breaking, and its connection with English and prelatic influence. Along the line of the Edinburgh and Glasgow railway, the still and solemn sanctity of a Scottish Sabbath is now unknown; and this great violation of the dread command of God was begun and is continued very chiefly through the influence of English shareholders, who have from infancy been taught to regard the Sabbath as a day of recreation. Nor should it ever be forgotten, that when Laud was erecting his spiritual despotism, and Charles I. was endeavouring to destroy the principles of civil liberty, then it was, that both concurred in issuing the "Book of Sports," the very object of which was to turn the Lord's day into a day of mirth and revelry. It is a truth of the greatest moment and of universal application, that he who is the slave of his bodily senses may be made the slave of whatever can affect the senses, but he who has triumphed over them, has won a liberty that cannot be destroyed,—he who is a freeman of the Lord can never be a fellow-creature's slave. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." And if British freedom is to be subverted, the process will be begun by Sabbath desecration; will proceed by the consequent degradation of the people through the inevitable loss of faith and holiness, and will end in the assumption of despotic power by those who degrade in order to enslave; who not fearing God, neither regard man. The extensive diffusion of such a work as Willison's is, therefore, in a time like the present, of unspeakable importance, tending, as its perusal must, to the diffusion of sounder views, and the remedy of so formidable an evil.

The next work which Willison gave to the public was of a directly controversial character. It was entitled, "A Letter from a Parochial Bishop to a Prelatical Gentleman in Scotland, concerning the Government of the Church." In this production Willison enters fully into the controversy respecting the primitive constitution of the church; shows what it was during the age of the apostles and their immediate successors; traces the alterations of subsequent times, and points out the rise and growth of prelacy. Although this work is not equal to some of those produced by Jamieson and Forrester and others, it is nevertheless a very clear and able outline, or summary of the argument, such as it would not be easy for the most zealous prelaticists of even the present day, with all their advantages, to answer. As an outline, indeed, it is peculiarly valuable; many being willing to peruse a brief yet clear statement, such as it is, who have neither leisure nor inclination for the study of more elaborate works. And it shows clearly, that while its pious author was earnestly engaged in the important pastoral duties of his own charge, he was at the same time quite ready to give a portion of his time and labour, so precious and efficient within its peculiar range, to what too many are disposed to regard as of little value, the controversial discussion of church government. This work was published in the year 1714; and appended to it is a postscript of peculiar significance. That postscript refers to a pamphlet issued by the Rev. Mr. Small, "asserting and proving the morality of the Fourth Commandment." Such was the ostensible purport of Mr. Small's pamphlet; but the real object of it was, an attack on Mr. Willison's "Treatise on the Sanctification of the Lord's Day;" and through that, an attack on the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. To render this intelligible, it is necessary to state, that Mr. Small was one of the old prelatic ministers who had been permitted to retain the parish churches and the emoluments therewith connected; and who was at that very time occupying the church and parish of Forfar. This person, hating the strictness of the Presbyterian system, and aware that people of prelatic opinions or tendencies regarded it with equal dislike, availed himself of the publication of Willison's works to assail the sanctity of the Scottish Sabbath, and to point out the greater freedom of his own opinions, approaching to the licentiousness of the Book of Sports as nearly as the sterner air of Scotland would permit. It is instructive, though a melancholy kind of instruction, to mark how instinctively prelacy labours to set aside the strict requirements of the law of God, and to substitute in their stead matters of mere human invention, which are inevitably more reconcilable with the predilections of fallen and sinful man.

But although Mr. Willison felt it to be his duty to enter on the field of controversy in defence of the truth, he did not the less prosecute his endeavours to promote the welfare of his own immediate charge. In the year 1716 he published another work entitled "A Sacramental Directory, or Treatise concerning the Sanctification of a Communion Sabbath." This is also an exceeding full, complete, and valuable work, containing nearly every kind of instruction that could be desired as likely to contribute toward a beneficial celebration of that sacred ordinance. It went through several editions during the life of its author, receiving each time important additions tending to render it the more thoroughly suited to the object in view, and also exhibiting the matured thoughts and feelings of that eminent servant of the Lord.

The lapse of a very short period found Willison again constrained to enter into the field of controversy. In the year 1719 he published, "An Apology for the Church of Scotland, against the accusation of prelaticists, and particularly the Reflections of James Small, late incumbent at Forfar," &c. In this work Willison vindicates the Church of Scotland from the charge of schism,—proves from scripture the divine institution of presbyterial government,—and overthrows the pretexts for the apostolical foundation of prelacy. It appears that Small, smarting under the short but sharp infliction of Willison's postscript, and suffering from the consequences of his own indiscreet and rebellious procedure, had assailed both Willison and the Church of Scotland in a strain of violent vituperation. This drew from Willison a reply; but in that reply he entered fully and ably into the general controversy, and produced a calm, dispassionate, and masterly treatise, which completely silenced his opponent. But in order to obtain a right view of that controversy and the causes which led to it at the time, we must again direct our attention to the public events then agitating both Church and nation.

Reference has been already made to king William's "comprehension scheme," and to the injurious influence which it exercised on the Church of Scotland at the time of the Revolution settlement, in paralyzing considerably her energies and tending to impair the testimony which it was her duty to bear to the country in so important a juncture. There was another under-current of evil produced by the same comprehension scheme, which did not so soon display its pernicious character. Almost the entire prelatic party in Scotland regarded the revolution with intense hatred. They saw in it the destruction of their despotic power, and they could not expect to gain from William that favour which they had engrossed during the time of the Stuart dynasty. But they cherished the hope, that as William had no personal descendants, the throne might, at his death, be secured to one of the banished race. For that reason it was of the utmost importance to them, that the prelatic curates should retain their positions throughout the parishes of Scotland, where they might continue to ply, if not exactly their former office of spies and informers, at least one very nearly akin to it—the office of subordinate agents in a wide-spread conspiracy for the restoration of the popish pretender. This they continued to do with insidious and persevering activity, during the whole of William's reign. But their hopes were so far disappointed when Anne ascended the throne; and they were constrained to prosecute their dark intrigues, preparatory for a renewed effort at her decease.

The course of Jacobite intrigue was for a time suspended during the discussions which ended in the union between Scotland and England. They strove, indeed, to prevent that union from taking place, anticipating from it the ruin of all their hopes; yet at the same time, with considerable skill and foresight, they made every endeavour to extend their influence, by not merely retaining those parishes in which they had been permitted to remain, but also by raising mobs, and by their assistance seeking possession forcibly of other parish churches in which any vacancy occurred. So numerous were these lawless intrusions, and so violent the means employed by the unscrupulous prelatists to effect them, that it was found necessary for the Scottish parliament to pass an act for the protection of Presbyterian church government. In the mean time there was a somewhat formidable misunderstanding between the church and the civil power. The church courts resolutely asserted their right to meet and deliberate in all matters spiritual, by virtue of that intrinsic authority derived to them from the Lord Jesus Christ alone; and the civil power wished to seize the prerogatives of calling, dissolving, or preventing the meetings of the General Assembly. The result was a kind of compromise, in consequence of which the moderator exercised the power of opening and dissolving the Assembly, and appointing its next place and time of meeting, without reference to the king's commissioner, and the commissioner did the same, without reference to what had been already done by the moderator. This compromise arose out of the struggle in the year 1703. This collision had the effect of sharpening the jealous vigilance with which the church watched the proceedings of the state; and all true Presbyterians became aware of the dangerous position in which their church would be placed by an incorporating union with England. To guard against this danger as fully as possible, the Scottish parliament would not permit their commissioners even to treat respecting the terms of any union, till an act of security had been passed by both parliaments for preserving unimpaired the rights and privileges of the Church of Scotland. In this act the Confession of Faith and the Presbyterian form of church government were formally ratified; and it was further declared, "That this Act of SECURITY, with the ESTABLISHMENT THEREIN

CONTINUED, shall be held and observed in all time coming, as a FUNDAMENTAL AND ESSENTIAL CONDITION OF ANY TREATY OR UNION to be concluded betwixt the two kingdoms, WITHOUT ANY ALTERATION THEREOF, OR DEROGATION THERETO, IN ANY SORT, FOR EVER."

If statesmen and governments could be bound by any stipulations, if there be any power in what is termed national faith, the Presbyterian Church of Scotland should have been by this act secured from the unlawful and unhalloved encroachments of hostile politicians or a rival church. But it was too soon rendered apparent that oaths are feeble barriers against unprincipled men who have the power, and deem it for their interest to break them. The Scottish Jacobites very soon perceived the advantage which they had obtained by the removal of the Scottish legislative body, and the sympathy and support which might be obtained from a parliament, the vast majority of whom were prelatists, and cherished an ignorant dislike of every thing Presbyterian. Very speedily, therefore, did they modify their course of intriguing policy, so as to suit the new position of affairs. Till that time the Scottish prelatists had no liturgy, nor any thing which made a marked distinction between their form of worship and that of the Presbyterian church. But now they judged it expedient to assume entire conformity with the Anglican church. This was directly contrary to the law in Scotland, and it was forbidden by the Scottish civil courts. An appeal was made to the house of lords, the result of which was, that the decision of the Scottish civil court was reversed, and the prelatist party obtained full permission to use the English ritual, the magistrates of Edinburgh being at the same time subjected to heavy damages for their strictly legal, though it may be oppressive treatment of the prelatist innovation.

This event excited great indignation throughout Scotland, among all the Presbyterians; and gave rise to equal exultation among the Jacobites. Pursuing their deep policy, that faction thought that a little more would ensure success. They accordingly contrived to introduce a bill into parliament for the restoration or rather the re-imposition of patronage in Scotland. This was a direct violation of the act of security and the treaty of union, by which the full and perpetual integrity of the Church of Scotland, as it existed at the time of union, had been guaranteed for ever,—there being no patronage in Scotland when that act was passed. The object which the Jacobite party had in view by procuring the passing of this most iniquitous and unconstitutional act, was to prove to the Scottish Presbyterians that the safety of their church was endangered by the union, in the hope that they would either endeavour to procure a repeal of a treaty which might be fairly said to have been rendered invalid by the violation of its fundamental and essential condition,—or, that in their indignation they would join with those who were plotting the restitution to the throne of the exiled Stuart race. Every exertion was made by the Church of Scotland to prevent the passing of the patronage act; but all in vain. With the most unseemly haste was this fatal measure pressed through the legislature, being actually hurried through its three readings in the house of lords in one day, the 12th of April; and signed by the queen on the 22d of April, 1712. Even after it had been thus passed the church remonstrated, protested, and gave instructions to the Commission of Assembly to use all proper means for obtaining a redress of this illegal grievance,—instructions which were repeated to every succeeding Commission till the year 1784.

Although the church and people generally of Scotland were greatly offended by these proceedings, yet Presbyterian loyalty remained unshaken; and when the sudden death of Queen Anne rendered the appointment of a successor to the crown necessary, they gave their warm and vigorous support to the Hanoverian family, thereby securing the Protestant succession, and defeating the hopes of the Jacobites and the popish pretender, and hurling the infidel Bolingbroke from the possession of that political power which he had so grievously abused. In the fierce bitterness of their disappointment the Jacobites rushed into rebellion, and made the desperate attempt to seize by force what they had failed to obtain by fraud. They were joined by the greater part of the prelatial incumbents and their adherents, who, as formerly, manifested their perfect readiness to violate their own allegiance and to place a papist on the throne, provided that they could thereby promote their own ambitious and self-interested designs. But the suppression of the rebellion of 1715, both proved that their expectations were premature, and involved them in its consequences. Many of these men had not only prayed publicly in the parish churches for the success of the Pretender, but had even induced their parishioners to flock to his standard, and had themselves resorted to his camp. Such directly rebellious conduct could not be overlooked. Those who had so acted were generally summoned before the presbyteries, and after the accusation had been fully proved, were deposed from the office of the ministry,—a sentence which in almost every case was followed by a corresponding decision of the civil courts, depriving them of their civil emoluments, and excluding them from those parish churches which they had endeavoured to pervert into seminaries of rebellion. When thus compelled to suffer the just consequences of their own misconduct, their wrath against the Presbyterian church became boundless and deadly. They poured forth the most vehement and slanderous accusations against it, denouncing it as heretical, schismatic, and persecuting. It was in answer to one of these specimens of vindictive calumny, written by Small, who had been deposed from Forfar on account of having promoted the rebellion, that Willison wrote his “Apology for the Church of Scotland.” In this treatise Willison proved both his learning and abilities, as a powerful controversialist; while there mingled in it none of the bitterness which too commonly characterizes controversial works.

While these public events were agitating the nation, there was also a movement, almost imperceptible for a time, working its way into the heart of the church, and preparing for dangerous changes there, likely to affect both its principles and its prosperity as a church of Christ. Not only did the great infusion of the prelatists into the Church of Scotland by means of king William’s comprehension scheme, directly weaken her government and impair her testimony, but it also infused a strong taint of unsoundness into her doctrinal theology. The effect of this did not for some time become apparent, nor indeed was its influence fully experienced till a new generation began to gain the ascendancy in the Church. Although the limited extent of this Essay will not allow any thing like a full investigation of this subject, yet its importance demands at least a brief outline of the leading events by which its progress was characterized.

All who are tolerably acquainted with ecclesiastical matters will at once remember the rise of Arminianism, the discussions which followed, and the condemnation of that system by the Synod of Dort, in the year 1616. But although the Synod of Dort condemned Arminian errors, yet the leading principles of that system of theology are too plausible and too agreeable to human nature to be easily quashed. And as the lofty fervour and spirituality of the reformation had ere then abated, the system, instead of disappearing when condemned, seemed to have obtained the more wide diffusion throughout Christendom. Within a very short period it was adopted by the greater part of the English church; and by almost the whole of the prelatial party in Scotland. The terrific struggle which took place before and during the time of the Commonwealth in England, concealed it for a time; but it rose into full ascendancy again under the sway of Charles II. and the restored Episcopacy of his time. In Holland, where it had been condemned, it both survived and spread; and even among the English nonconformists a modification of it was adopted. The person by whom this modified Arminianism was introduced, and whose writings gave it the greatest currency, was the justly celebrated Richard Baxter. The form which this refined Arminianism assumed was that of an answer to the question, "Whether the gospel may not be regarded as a new law, or constitution, promising salvation upon a certain condition." To this question the answers given by the party referred to generally were such as the following:—That the gospel might be regarded as a new law, and that its condition was faith; to which some added faith and repentance; others, faith, repentance, and sincere though imperfect obedience. Those who held these opinions were termed Neonomians, or new-law men, as it may be translated. They, on the other hand, accused their opponents of being Antinomians; and as generally happens in controversy, each party accused the other of entertaining opinions which they respectively denied; and by that means the breach gradually widened, and both became more completely alienated, and at the same time confirmed in their peculiar views. But, as every one who had studied Arminianism must know, the determined advocates of that system are inevitably drawn by it farther and farther from the simple and sublime truths of the gospel, and steadily tend towards the Pelagian, and ultimately Socinian heresy.

This appears to have been the course unhappily followed by Mr. John Simson, Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow. The attention of the General Assembly, in the year 1714, was drawn to the prevalent report that he taught not only Arminian but Pelagian errors; and they were constrained, with too manifest reluctance, to give directions that the charge should be investigated. For several successive years the case lingered before the church courts, and what may be fairly termed an evasive deliverance was given by the Assembly of 1717. In the same year the Assembly censured a proposition which the presbytery of Auchterarder had framed for the purpose of guarding young men against the growing unsoundness of the time; and also appointed a committee to assist the presbytery of Peebles in the case of a person who had received an insufficient call, and was unacceptable to the majority of the people. Such a course augured ill for the continued purity and prosperity of the Church of Scotland; and the more serious and thoughtful of her ministers and people began to entertain very gloomy apprehensions. These fears were certainly not diminished when soon afterwards the General Assembly was led, chiefly through the management of Principal Hadow of St. Andrews, to condemn a work entitled, "The Marrow of Modern Divinity," on account of its alleged Antinomianism. This gave rise to what has been called "The Marrow Controversy," the effect of which was such that it had almost caused a secession of some of the best ministers at that period, and certainly contributed greatly to prepare for the secession which took place some years afterwards.

The writings of Willison prove that he took a deep interest in all these proceedings; and that he constantly espoused the cause of truth and sincerity, although he did not come prominently forward, deterred probably by the fact, that the party with whom he acted were led by men of great eminence both for piety and talents, venerable also in years, and accustomed to the business of church courts. In his ministerial duties he continued to exert himself with equal zeal and success; one unquestionable proof of which appears in the "Five Communion Sermons," which he published in the year 1722. It may seem a little curious, but it serves to prove Willison's public spirit, and the deep interest which he took in every thing that tended to promote the welfare of his country, to mention, that in the year 1721 he published a political pamphlet, bearing the title of "A Letter to an English Member of Parliament, from a Gentleman in Scotland, concerning the Slavish Dependencies which a great part of that nation is still kept under, by Superiorities, Wards, Reliefs, and other remains of the Feudal Law, and by Clanships and Tithes." In this he displays a very clear apprehension of the evils arising from these remains of feudal bondage, and the spirit of a free British citizen, who understood and valued the principles of liberty, and had the courage to assert them.

The course of defection on which the Church of Scotland had entered continued to advance, deepening and darkening in its progress. In the year 1725, the magistrates and town council of Aberdeen issued a direct presentation as patrons of one of the city charges, then vacant. This was disapproved of by the Synod; but a call was also procured; and though the number dissenting from the call was greater than that by whom it was signed, yet the commission of Assembly sustained it, and the Assembly refused to rescind their sentence, although expressing disapprobation of their conduct in not having due regard to the inclinations of the people. This was the first instance of a minister settled against the assent of the people, subsequently to the revolution; but it did not long stand alone. Several cases, almost precisely similar, occurred in the course of the three or four following years; and the decision of these cases in a manner so directly contrary to all the ancient principles of the Church of Scotland, excited great dissatisfaction, and led to repeated protests and reasons of dissent, which were very disagreeable to the dominant party. They passed an act in the Assembly of 1730, forbidding reasons of dissent to be recorded in the register of the church judicatories. This was the very essence of ecclesiastical despotism; and it roused the strong indignation of those whose defence of sound principles was overborne, and their liberty of exonerating their own conscience by recording their dissent taken away. Next year an alteration with regard to the call was introduced, the effect of which was its virtual annihilation, so far as it was intended to convey the mind of the congregation.

It was now perceived but too clearly, by all true Presbyterians, that unless the church could be induced to change her course, her ruin could not be long prevented. When the Assembly of 1732 met, a representation and petition, signed by forty ministers, was laid on the table, imploring that venerable court to redress the grievances and check the innovations which were threatening the speedy destruction of all the principles of Presbyterianism. But the dominant Moderate party would not even permit this important document to be read, and proceeded on their despotic career with headlong and determined obstinacy. A complaint against the intrusive settlement of Mr. Smith at Kinross was dismissed, and the presbytery was ordered to receive him and give him countenance in his ministry; and when several members protested against such arbitrary procedure, they were not permitted to record their dissent. The innovating act on calls was passed into a standing law of the church, in direct violation of the Barrier act, it not having received the sanction of a majority of the presbyteries, or rather, it having been condemned, eighteen presbyteries having approved, eighteen having returned no opinion, twelve having recommended material alterations, and thirty-one having absolutely condemned it.

The conduct of this Assembly brought on a crisis of a formidable nature. All the true Presbyterian party perceived that the essential principles of their beloved church were disregarded and overborne by the ruling faction, who now rejoiced in the very inappropriate name of Moderates,—their conduct being immoderately tyrannical. Those whose temper was as warm as their principles were sound, felt it impossible to refrain from giving utterance to their strong indignation. Of these the most prominent was the Rev. Ebenezer Erskine, who, from his own pulpit, denounced in strong terms the oppressive and sinful procedure of the church courts. At the meeting of the synod of Fife in October, he preached a sermon in which he boldly and keenly censured the growing corruption and degeneracy of the church. The synod were deeply offended, condemned his conduct, and ordered him to submit to a sharp rebuke. This he refused to do, protested against their sentence, and appealed to the next General Assembly. The Assembly met in perilous circumstances; but met apparently unaware of their peril. No change, no modification of their severity appeared. They ordered Mr Erskine to be rebuked and admonished at the bar of the Assembly. Against this sentence he protested; and to this protest were added the names of William Wilson minister at Perth, Alexander Moncrieff, minister at Abernethy, and James Fisher, minister at Kinclaven. This protest was recorded, and the case of the four brethren remitted to the Commission, with full power first to suspend them, and then to proceed to high censure, unless they should submit, express their sorrow for their conduct, and retract their protest.

Guided as the Commission was by Moderate policy, there was little room for doubt what would be its course. In spite of the general, the almost universally national sympathy with the four brethren, the Commission passed the sentence of deposition, by the casting vote of the moderator, Mr. Gowdy of Edinburgh. Against this sentence the four brethren gave in a protest, which was subsequently expanded into a full statement of the reasons of their "secession from the prevailing party in the Church." In this document they used the memorable words, "We hereby appeal unto the first free, faithful, and reforming General Assembly of the Church of Scotland."

The dangerous position in which the Church was placed by these outrageous proceedings of the Moderate party, constrained every minister who loved the Church of his fathers to come forward and exert himself to rescue her from impending ruin. Among those who hastened to the rescue was Willison of Dundee. At the meeting of the Synod of Angus and Mearns, in 1733, he preached a sermon, in which he pointedly and strongly animadverted on the conduct of the Church Courts. This sermon was soon afterwards published, bearing the title of "The Church's Danger." In the preface to this sermon Willison very clearly and strongly points out the innovating and despotic procedure of the ruling Moderate party, and urges the necessity of immediate repentance and amendment, as the only way to avert the displeasure and just judgments of God.

But Willison was not a man to rest satisfied with a mere complaint, if exertion might be of any avail. Many of the venerable men who had formerly guided the counsels of the genuine Presbyterian party were now removed by death, or sunk into the inactivity of advanced age. It was time therefore for others to take the position which they had occupied: and Willison did not hesitate to undertake the duty. His character stood very high, both as an author, and as a man of distinguished piety; and whatever talents his Master had given to him he was ready to expend in that Master's cause. Great exertions were made by Willison and his friends to procure a return to the next Assembly of such a number of right-hearted men as might obtain a majority in that Court, and both put a stop to innovations, and redress the wrongs already done. Such a majority was obtained, in the Assembly of 1734; and they immediately began the work of reformation, and held out invitations to the seceding brethren to return to the bosom of the church. A deputation, of whom Willison was one, was sent from the commission to London, to solicit a repeal of the act re-imposing patronages. The acts of 1730 and 1732 were rescinded, and the liberty of recording protests again restored. Next year a deputation was sent to London to renew the application of the church for the repeal of the Patronage Act; and in the year 1736, an Act was passed "Against the intrusion of Ministers into vacant congregations." This Act contains the following memorable words:—"The General Assembly considering that it is, and has been since the Reformation, the principle of this Church, that no minister shall be intruded into any Church contrary to the will of the congregation, do therefore seriously recommend to all judicatories of this church, to have a due regard to this principle in planting vacant congregations, so as none be intruded into such parishes, as they regard the glory of God and edification of the body of Christ." Directions were also given, in consequence of complaints against the style of preaching adopted by many young ministers, recommending a more full and faithful exhibition of the peculiar doctrines of the gospel.

Deeply is it to be deplored that these earnest endeavours of Willison and his friends to reform the church did not induce the seceding brethren to return, resume their position, and lend their assistance in completing the reformation. But they had taken their position, they were joined in 1737 by four new adherents, they framed their first Act and Testimony, and by the publication of that document they placed an almost insurmountable barrier in the way of any re-union with the church. Very little more was needed to complete that melancholy separation, and that was soon accomplished. In 1739, the seceding brethren formed themselves into a presbytery, and declared the judicatories of the church "not lawful nor rightly constitute courts of Christ." At the urgent solicitations of Willison and some of his friends the Assembly consented to delay passing the sentence of deposition for another year, if perhaps the secession might still be averted. But 1740 came; the Seceding brethren made no offers of conciliation; and on the 15th day of May the sentence of deposition was passed, and they ceased to be ministers of the Church of Scotland.

The melancholy failure of all his strenuous exertions to prevent a final secession from taking place, seems to have so completely overwhelmed Willison with grief, as to discourage him from taking an active share in the business of Church Courts after that period. But though ceasing from his hopeless labours in that department, he did not the less continue his active exertions both for the welfare of his own people and of the community at large. Nay, even while acting no second part in the endeavour to reform the church, he was at the same time employed in publishing some of his most important religious works. The "Afflicted Man's Companion" appeared in 1737, during the very heat of the controversy; and the "Example of Plain Catechising" was published in the same year. There can be no doubt that both had been written during the course of several preceding years; but their publication at this very anxious juncture is a beautiful illustration of an important truth, which has been more frequently realized, even in recent times, than people are ready to imagine,—namely, that eminent piety is essential to eminent usefulness, whether in the discharge of public or of private duties, and that it is equally fitted to secure that usefulness in both departments, and at the same time. It deserves also to be stated, that although Willison disapproved very strongly of the language of keen vituperation in which the seceding brethren too often permitted themselves to indulge against the church, he was never betrayed to the use of similar language in retaliation. This cannot be said of the writing of some of his friends, who in several instances allowed themselves to give utterance to sentiments of great indignation and keen reproach, in words which did not abate the vehemence or severity of the thoughts. But as this was a fault into which both parties fell, and as we have no pleasure in dwelling on the errors of good men, we shall not more distinctly record these mutual recriminations, especially since happily Willison was not implicated in what was deserving of censure.

An important course of reflection suggests itself here to the mind, which we may state, rather than fully trace. When the first Seceders withdrew from the Church of Scotland, they did so not on the ground of any dissatisfaction with its constitution and its principles, but because of the corruptions and abuses perpetrated and persevered in by the ruling party in its courts. In point of fact, strictly considered, they did not secede from the church, but from the Moderate party, who had usurped and were steadily exercising a perverting and tyrannical domination over the church. Doubtless they regarded it to be their duty to do so; but it is not, in our apprehension, very easy fully to justify their conduct. They readily acknowledged that there were many eminently pious ministers in the church, with whom, to use their own words, "they did not think themselves worthy to be compared;" but they seem to have thought that these men ought also to have seceded; and they felt that the continuance in the church of such ministers was calculated to suggest at least a doubt respecting the propriety of their own conduct. On the other hand, the pious and faithful ministers who remained, felt it to be their duty to continue in connection with the church, for the very purpose of endeavouring to remedy the abuses of which they complained. Had the Act of Assembly which prohibited the recording of protests and dissents with reasons not been rescinded, they also must and doubtless would have seceded; because that involved both a violation of the constitution and a bond imposed on conscience: or, had the state forcibly changed any of the fundamental principles of the constitution of the church, and refused redress, then they must have seceded not from "a prevailing party in the church," but from the church itself, or rather from the state. But as neither of these cases existed they did not feel themselves constrained to quit a church within which, in spite of many abuses, there still existed spiritual liberty constitutionally secured, and which they cherished the hope of restoring to its pristine purity,—a hope which had recently been so nearly realized.

A full investigation and accurate understanding of this subject would tend very greatly to illustrate those recent events, which, after the lapse of a century, have again convulsed the church and kingdom. The contest, at the period of the secession, was between parties in the church; but in that contest the state and the civil courts did not take any active part. Even when the true presbyterian, or evangelical party, led by Willison and his friends, obtained the ascendancy, rescinded the unconstitutional acts passed by their opponents, sent a deputation to London to apply for redress from the grievance of patronage, and passed the act of 1736, containing a formal re-statement of the principle "that no pastor should be intruded into any parish contrary to the will of the congregation,"—even then the civil courts made no attempt to coerce the reforming party, or to impede their course by expensive lawsuits, actions of damages, and hostile declarations from the state itself. In these circumstances we are led to conclude, that since the contest did not directly involve the connection between church and state, and was not respecting the constitution of the church, but its administration, those ministers best discharged their duty who retained their position, and strove either to procure the reform of abuses, or to retard the progress of corruption and maladministration. But the case was very different with regard to the recent struggle and disruption. The contest began, doubtless, between the moderate and the evangelical bodies; but scarcely had the latter gained the ascendancy when their reforming path was crossed by the civil courts. And in the decisions pronounced in the Auchterarder and Lethendy cases, and in the case of the quoad sacra churches, principles were clearly and boldly promulgated, as the basis of these judgments, which were utterly subversive of the constitution of the church, and fatal to spiritual liberty. The contest thus became one between the church and the civil courts; and when application was made to the state for redress against the destructive aggressions of its subordinate courts, it became a question between the church and the state itself, and upon its solution depended the continuation or the dissolving of the connection between church and state. For the church being persuaded that her constitution is founded on and agreeable to the word of God, it never could be a question whether that were to be altered or subverted according to the judgment of any earthly power. When, therefore, the state finally refused redress, and thereby very clearly sanctioned all the proceedings of the civil courts, it became the sacred duty of the church to abandon that connection with the state which could no longer be maintained without the subversion of her own constitution and the loss of spiritual liberty. The real character of the disruption of 1843, therefore, was, not the act of a party withdrawing from the church because of its corruptions and abuses through maladministration, but the church withdrawing from the state, because of the violent attempt to subvert her constitution, and doing so for the very purpose of preserving that constitution from being destroyed.

This, it will be observed, completely vindicates such men as Willison from the accusation brought at that time against them, of want of faithfulness in remaining in the church; because the constitution was unchanged, and they were perfectly justifiable in remaining for the purpose of preserving it and endeavouring to reform the abuses of its administration. But the same plea cannot be available for those who remain connected with the state now, because the constitution of the present establishment is not that of the church of our fathers. In proof of this assertion nothing more is necessary than a reference to the facts of the case. No sooner had the evangelical body withdrawn from connection with the state, than the moderate party rescinded every reforming enactment which had been passed after 1834, and left the constitution of their church to be reconstructed by Lord Aberdeen. But in the time of Willison, when the moderates recovered the ascendancy, they did not attempt to rescind any of the reforming enactments, and they did not reimpose the act of 1732, which was a violation of the constitution. The constitution of the church, in short, was left at that time entire, but the maladministration was resumed; whereas in the present period the constitution has been changed, and the maladministration sanctioned and enforced.

It has been already stated, that the failure of Willison and his friends in their endeavour to prevent the secession and to reform the church, discouraged them to such a degree that they ceased to continue the hopeless struggle. So far as regarded the administration of the public business of the church, this was indeed the case. But they looked more deeply into the matter than many are in the habit of doing. They regarded the public sins of the church as involving the whole kingdom in deep guilt; they feared lest God should withdraw his presence from the land; and they dreaded the infliction of heavy judgments. For these reasons they betook themselves with increased zeal and earnestness to the discharge of their pastoral duties, and strove to arouse their flocks from spiritual lethargy, and to convince them of the necessity of regeneration, faith, and new obedience. The more distinctly that they perceived the coming danger, the more loudly, as faithful watchmen, did they proclaim its approach, and call on all men to be prepared. Ample evidence of this might be produced from many quarters; but we consider it enough to refer to a work published in January 1742, by Willison, entitled, "The Balm of Gilead." This very remarkable production consists of eight sermons on Jeremiah viii. 20—22; four on the ministration of the Spirit, and the increase of Christ's kingdom; and twelve sacramental discourses. In the first eight, Willison traces minutely and bewails deeply the corruptions and defections of the church; and while advert- ing to instances of revival in America, connected with the ministry of the celebrated Jonathan Edwards and others, he expresses the most earnest longing and fervent supplication that a similar time of refreshing might visit Scotland. The four following sermons are remarkable chiefly on account of their containing a view of prophecy from which Willison, in 1742, concluded that some great revolution would take place in France about 1792, which was fearfully verified, as all Europe knows.

This volume, as has been stated, was published in January 1742. About the middle of February 1742, a remarkable revival of religion took place at Cambuslang, during which some hundreds were called from death to life, and out of darkness into God's marvellous light. The dates are here stated for the express purpose of drawing attention to the important consideration, how closely this glorious and most encouraging event was connected with the faithful struggles for reformation and the earnest prayers of the Evangelical ministers in the Church of Scotland. In the case of Willison, his sermons published immediately before that memorable event furnish irresistible evidence how his heart and soul had been engaged; and from the letters written by many of the faithful ministers of the period, we have similar, though less ample evidence, that they too had been making earnest application to the Divine Physician for the "Balm of Gilead," to heal the hurt of the daughter of their people. Let this remarkable coincidence between the prayers of God's servants, and so manifest an answer, furnish at once encouragement and instruction to all who mourn over Zion's injuries and wish her welfare; for the arm of the Lord is not shortened that it cannot save, nor his ear heavy that it cannot hear. We might also, with great propriety, direct the reader's attention to the revivals which took place in the year 1839, at Kilsyth, Dundee, Perth, Ross-shire, and in many other parts of Scotland, during the very heat of the conflict which ended in the disestablishment of the true Church of Scotland. For it is remarkable, that these revivals happened solely under the ministry of those evangelical pastors who were also the strenuous public defenders of the constitutional rights and spiritual liberties of the Church; and it is impossible to estimate how much they contributed to prepare both ministers and people for the conflict which had still to be endured, and the sacrifices which had to be made, in continuing to bear their testimony for the crown-rights of the Redeemer.

The connection which Willison had with the revivals of 1742, was still more direct than appears from the sermons to which reference has been made. Within a month after the publication of that volume, the time of refreshing began at Cambuslang. Intelligence of this much longed-for and most encouraging event very speedily reached Willison; and as soon as he could make the necessary arrangements, he hastened to the place, to see with his own eyes what great things God had wrought and was working. After staying there a short time he returned homewards, and on his way stopped at Kilsyth on the 15th of April. Next day he preached in that place from Psalm xl. 2, 3. This sermon made a deep impression on all that heard it, and is mentioned by the Rev. Mr. Robe, in his Narrative, as having produced the first direct movement towards the revival which very soon afterwards took place at Kilsyth. In this instance again we find God honouring one who had been a distinguished leader in public controversies, by making him also a leading instrument in winning souls to Christ, thereby both defending and enlarging the Redeemer's kingdom. The holy joy which this must have given to this faithful minister may be imagined, but cannot be expressed. It was to him far more than a reward for all his many anxieties and toils; and it gave him a source of comfort and happiness during the remainder of his life, amidst the increasing infirmities of age, which sickness could not diminish nor death destroy.

Through the kindness of a direct descendant of Willison, we are enabled to enrich these pages with extracts from some letters written by him to the Rev. Mr. McCulloch, minister at Cambuslang, which sufficiently indicate his opinion of the revival there, as a marvellous manifestation of spiritual life. The first of these letters which we insert, bears date and is as follows:— “DUNDEE, April 5th, 1743.

“REV. AND DEAR BROTHER,—I had your reviving account of your observing the 18th of February last (which we also kept): a memorable day indeed wherein the Lord began his glorious work through your country. O, may he continue it this year, and make greater progress still! It gladdens my heart to hear of the new awakening you had on that day; of the full dining-room that evening, and of the delightful music you had in it, and also on the following Sabbath. I'll be glad to hear of the continuance of that sweet music all the year through. We desire to help you to praise him for what he hath again begun to do, and to pray that he may not be provoked to depart from you, but that he may still continue his work among you, either in the way of awakening, convincing, humbling, converting, confirming, establishing, comforting, or building up. It is a refreshing account you give me from your friend's letter of the increase of praying societies in Edinburgh. Blessed be God we have also a great increase of that sort in this place. I think there will be above twenty of such societies here, and in several of them between twenty and thirty persons; and much time, yea sometimes whole nights, they spend in prayer; yet, alas, we have not the awakenings and humiliations of your people. O dear Sir, pray for us that we may not be passed by! O, if you would take a trip northward this summer, and pay us a visit, it would be most welcome. I had heard of your writing to Mr. Ebenezer Erskine, but I scarcely believed it till I had yours. I am much grieved at the stiffness and obstinacy of these brethren, that they refuse all manner of conviction or satisfaction. Nothing but infinite power will open their eyes. No doubt you have seen my letter to Mr. Fisher; I reckon it will have no more effect on him than yours on his father-in-law—yet let us not give over praying for them. When God's time comes they will not be able to resist any longer. This comes to you by Mr. McLaurin; if you send yours to him he will enclose it in his to me, and I'll be glad to hear of the continuance and progress of the blessed work with you and elsewhere. I offer my kindest respects to your spouse and sister, and remain,

“REV. AND DEAR BROTHER,

“Yours most affectionately in the Lord,

Jo: Willison

The reference in the preceding letter to the sentiments entertained by the Seceding brethren towards the revivals at Cambuslang and Kilsyth might lead to a course of painful reflection; for few things can be more painful than to see truly good men endeavouring to cast discredit upon and to oppose a work of grace because it has not taken place in their communion. But we forbear, and proceed to give another of Willison's letters to Mr. McCulloch.

“DUNDEE, Sept. 22d, 1743.

“REV. AND DEAR BROTHER—I had yours by post, for which I heartily thank you; and for the copy you sent me of worthy Mr. Edwards' Letter. I value that great man highly and all his writings. But I hope Mr. Webster will take the trouble of prefacing this last book of his,—you know how I was pelted for the former. I would be glad to hear that Mr. Fisher and his brethren are beginning to weary of that angry way of doing; may the Lord bring them to a more meek gospel-frame of spirit. I bless the Lord that I am at present much better in my health than I have been for some months past; but considering my age, I ought always to live as on the brink of eternity. I would desire (if the Lord pleased) to finish the Testimony you write of, it being bigger than I designed. It contains a brief history of the memorable occurrences in this church from her original, with observations on them; but since the restoring of patronage in 1712, many things have occurred that take up more paper. I have wrote about ten sheets of it already; and have come the length of 1733. I hope all our honest brethren will easily agree about what precedes, but I am jealous of what comes after, particularly in 1737, anent Porteous. May the Lord direct. I have studied to be as impartial as I could; but all is under the correction of yourself and others.

“Your good news of the good behaviour of those awakened with you last year give me much pleasure; as doth your account of the Lord's countenancing your second Sacrament. Mr. Robe also writes me a most refreshing account of his second Communion. I rejoice that both you and he are heartened and strengthened to celebrate that blessed ordinance twice a year. I hope God will help you to persevere in that course, as a lasting token of gratitude for what God hath done for both your parishes. I would be glad to hear of that practice becoming more general about you. As for what you speak of getting a right Assembly, I would be glad to see or hear of such a one, but I have no hope, and you know despair cuts the sinews of endeavours. Many of the Assembly of 1734 are gone, and presentees and intruders come in their room. Until the Spirit be poured out from on high, our wilderness will not become a fruitful field. It is refreshing that such a man as Mr. Edwards is so full of hope of the glorious reviving of the Lord's work through the world. Oh, that we could wait and pray in hope! I still remember the poor parish of Baldernock; oh that God would appear for their relief! I kindly remember your kind spouse and all your honest people. May the Lord's grace be with you and them all.

"I remain," &c.

The next letter bears date, June 18th, 1744, and from it we make the following extracts. "I long much to hear of your late sacramental occasion; if any thing of the Lord's mighty goings appeared among you as in former times; and if the blessed effects of his former work do still remain perceptible upon these you conceived good hopes of. I hope they do; though no doubt the after-carriage of some may occasion you grief. We must lay our account with such trials.—Your Synod, and the Assembly's management with respect to Mr. Leechman's sermon, gives me also much uneasiness; and also what your Synod did concerning that process before the presbytery of Ayr. These proceedings forebode no good to this poor church of the rising age. I pray you write me what is doing with the poor parish of Baldernock and its settlement; or what has become of those hopeful and promising signs of the Lord's work that were in that parish and others about it. Intrusions upon them may come to mar all, if the Lord prevent not.

"No doubt, you got the Testimony I sent you, with the reasons for subscribing it; the preface and conclusion are wanting, but now are ready. I desire to look upon myself as near going off the stage; and with submission to his will that ordereth all things concerning me, I would incline to leave something of my mind behind me, touching the prevailing evils of the day, that being dead I may yet speak. I trust a general reviving may come when I am gone, and then such an essay may be of use. It would greatly encourage me to have you, or such as the Lord hath remarkably owned and honoured, to concur with me in it. I expect to hear from you about it with the first occasion, and direct yours with the copy to Mr. Lumsden as before; and write me if your historical account be yet ready for the press. May the Lord spare you for much further good.

"I am," &c., &c.

The "Testimony" to which reference is made in the preceding letter, is a treatise published by Willison in July, 1744, of which the title page is as follows:—"A Fair and Impartial Testimony, Essayed in name of a number of ministers, elders, and Christian people, of the Church of Scotland, unto the laudable principles, wrestlings, and attainments of that Church; and against the backslidings, corrup-

tions, divisions, and prevailing evils, both of former and present times. And namely, the defections of the Established Church, of the Nobility, Gentry, Commons, Seceders, Episcopalians, &c., &c. Containing a brief Historical Deduction of the chief Occurrences in this Church from the beginning to the year 1744, with Remarks; and humble Pleadings with our Mother Church, to exert herself to stop Defection and promote Reformation." This ample title page very fully and accurately explains the character of the work, which gives indeed a singularly clear and distinct outline of the History of the Church of Scotland from the time of the first reformation, and especially from the period of the Revolution. No attempt was made by the moderate party to answer Willison's argument, or to repel the very grave accusations which he urged against them, in a tone of appalling earnestness and solemnity. The expressions in his letter which relate to this work are very striking. The venerable man regarded it as his dying testimony, wrote it in the spirit of one who expected soon to stand at the judgment-seat of God, and cherished the hope, that though too probably his contemporaries would disregard the solemn warnings and remonstrances which it contained, a time would come when, preceded by a revival of genuine religion, it might be of use. "The secret of the Lord is with those that fear him;" and though we do not assert that Willison was imbued with the spirit of prophecy, we cannot help concluding that what he then hoped for, has already been so far realized. A time of reviving has come to the church of our fathers; and in the long and arduous conflict through which we have passed, Willison's "Fair and Impartial Testimony" has been, and will still be, of signal service to the cause of truth. It is impossible for any candid and intelligent person to peruse that work without clearly perceiving that the Disestablished but Free Church of Scotland is, in constitution and spirit, in all that constitutes the living and prolonged identity of a church, the very church to which Willison bore "Testimony" with all the deep solemnity of a dying man. Certainly the present Establishment will never claim the benefit of that Testimony.

In another of the original letters in our possession, Willison relates to Mr. McCulloch conversation which he had held with one of the Seceding brethren, concerning the revivals at Cambuslang and Kilsyth; in the course of which the latter was constrained, "with shame and confusion," to acknowledge his rashness in venturing to censure an event with the true nature of which he was unacquainted. But on this painful topic we will not further enter.

Another of these letters is both curious and interesting, as containing an account of the manner in which the Highlanders conducted themselves during the rebellion of 1745—6. The letter is dated March 21st, 1746, and is as follows:—

“REV. AND DEAR BROTHER,—I am favoured with yours of 22d Feb. last, for which I heartily thank you; as also for your kind and tender sympathies with me and others in this country during the stormy winter we have come through by the divine mercy. Blessed be God, we found our Immanuel a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest, for we were more frightened than hurt. We had a good number of fierce lion-like men quartered in this town, who threatened us very much with plundering and killing if we complied not with their measures, travelling still up and down our streets with guns, swords, and pistols in their hands and bosoms. Hundreds of them came sometimes into our churches with these arms, having their pistols loaded with ball, threatening to let them fly at us, if we prayed for king George; yet they were restrained when they heard us do it, and sometimes they were overheard in going out of the church blaming themselves for not executing their wicked purposes. One day four of their officers armed, of the names of Farquharson, M’Intosh, M’Gillivray, &c., advanced towards the pulpit, and three of them came up close to me, and discharged me to pray for king George. I began to reason with them before the people; but the women cried so much, (fearing they should do me harm, though I entreated them to be composed, and also sung a psalm for that end, but all in vain,) that I was obliged to pronounce the blessing and dismiss the congregation without prayers. They had several hundreds drawn up in arms about the church, to have assisted these officers in case of resistance. They sent afterwards to my house forbidding me to preach, unless I complied with their terms, upon my peril. It was thought proper to leave the churches and betake ourselves to preach through the town in private houses. I was only three Sabbaths out of the church. They broke our windows for not joining with them upon their days of joviality; we moved little out of doors, but in day light. I join with you in blessing the Lord in setting a hedge about you and all you had. O how much are we bound to his preserving care, which should encourage us still to trust him in our straits. The bitterness of death seems not to be yet past, for our dispersed enemies have gathered again, and threaten another visit. The prints give you the surest account, therefore I forbear writing particulars. Alas, neither ministers nor people seem to be suitably affected with these awful judgments, nor are turning as they should to him that smites them; for in the midst of these calamities congregations are spoiled, intrusions made, and patronage supported, and how is it to be expected God’s controversy should end?

Likewise our people show much deadness under the word, and many, alas, favour the rebels. Oh, it were just with God to return and destroy us, after he hath begun to do us good. A temporal deliverance, without a spiritual, will but harden and ripen us for the extirpating stroke. I’ll be glad to hear of any token of a new revival among your people after the storm. Mr. M’Laurin wrote me his news from America, for which I am indebted to him.”

In another letter Willison replies to a request which Mr. M’Culloch had made, that he would apply to the duke of Cumberland to induce him to intercede for the relief of the Church of Scotland from the oppressive and fatal yoke of patronage. With this request Willison declined to comply, arguing that it was hopeless to imagine that his individual application could be of any avail, since that application was fruitless when made in company with others of his brethren deputed by the Church itself, on a former occasion. Yet if either the duke of Cumberland, or the government of the day, had been possessed of enlarged statesmanship, not to speak of gratitude, they might have seen that they could not possibly better confirm the loyalty and peace of the kingdom than by granting the request of those who in a time of such peril had been the faithful supporters of the Protestant monarchy.

Although Willison, with that modesty which was a leading characteristic of his mind, assumed that his personal application could be of no avail, yet he might have claimed a favourable hearing on the ground of his own exertions, as well as perils encountered, in the defence of religious and civil liberty. For in the very heat of the rebellion of 1745, and while a large proportion of Scotland was overrun by the pretender’s forces, Willison first preached, and then published six sermons bearing the general title, “Popery another Gospel, or a Demonstration that the Romish Religion is not the Gospel which Christ hath left his Church, but what Antichrist hath since devised to the destruction of Christianity and the souls of men.” There is great reason to believe that it was on account of this publication that Willison was exposed to so much danger while Dundee was in the possession of the Highland army; and it can scarcely be doubted that its influence tended to prevent many from joining the rebel troops. He might, therefore, have considered himself entitled to expect at least a favourable reception from the Duke, and a careful consideration of any request which he might have to prefer. But he had formed too just an estimate of statesmen to cherish any such hopes; and therefore while he was ready on every emergency to discharge his own duty, be the peril in doing so what it might, he was not inclined to waste his time and strength in paying fruitless court to princes and civil rulers.

It is highly interesting to contemplate this venerable minister, now on the very brink of the grave, still sensitively alive to every thing that threatened the welfare of pure and true religion, and of his native country, and still ready to take a bold and prominent part in those public exertions which such a time required. But it is perfectly consistent with the whole tenor of his life, which displayed a beautiful union of private and personal piety and public zeal and faithfulness. His was that generous and healthful Christianity which finds and discharges its duties alike in private or in public; in the closet, the household, the pulpit, and the parish, in church courts, and in the face of civil war and a convulsed and reeling kingdom.

This eminent and faithful servant of the Lord now felt that his work was well nigh done; and that he might end it in his Master's service he prepared for publication a series of "Sacramental Meditations and Advices."—This work was so constructed as to embody the substance of those sermons which he had not thought proper to print in a separate form. It contains therefore the essence of his preaching, the matured results of his own soul's intercourse with God, so moulded as to convey most important instruction to those who long to enjoy similar spiritual communion with their great God and Saviour. With the appearance of this work, in August 1747, he may be said to have rested from his labours; for his death took place on the 3d of May 1750, in the 70th year of his age, and 47th of his ministry.

Having thus traced a brief outline of the life and times of the Rev. John Willison of Dundee, it may be both interesting and instructive to the general reader to give some account of his personal character, and the manner in which he discharged his ministerial duties, according to the information transmitted on these points by those who, enjoying an intimate acquaintance with him, were enabled to record what had come within their own observation.

The personal character of the Rev. John Willison, so far as it can now be ascertained, was of that peculiarly amiable and attractive kind which at once disarms hostility and secures affection. A gentle and persuasive seriousness was the prevailing characteristic of his mind, both in public and private; and particularly in private life the overflowing kindness of his heart rendered it almost impossible to know and not to love him. Hence, although no man more firmly held and defended those principles which he believed to be founded on God's revealed truth, and although he did not hesitate to enter the field of controversy, when that seemed to be the path of duty, there mingled no asperity in what he said or wrote; and if his strong hand did deal a vigorous blow, it was more as a part of necessary and merciful correction, than in vindictive violence. In his family, as a husband, a father, and a master, his conduct exhibited all the gracious attractions of the Christian character. In addition to the constant and regular maintenance of family-worship, he devoted a part of every day to the instruction of his children and servants; and on the evening of the Lord's day he required from them all a statement of as much of the sermons which they had heard as they could remember, at the same time addressing to them such additional exhortations as were calculated to promote their spiritual welfare.

His skill in catechising, and his devotedness to that department of instruction, must be apparent to all who have perused his numerous and extensive catechetical writings. And it is recorded by his contemporaries and immediate successors, that his exertions were blessed with eminent success, many of his catechumens exhibiting, both during his life and afterwards, manifest proofs that in endeavouring to teach them the saving truths of the gospel he had not laboured in vain.

As a pastor he was equally devoted to the careful discharge of duty in the pulpit, and in visiting the people under his charge. His sermons were the result of much study, and especially of much prayer, as their sound theology and their remarkable closeness of practical and heart-searching application to the life and conscience abundantly prove. He did not affect nor aim after peculiar elegance of style, his desire being to instruct rather than to please; yet in several of his sermons there occur passages of great power and beauty, expressed in language of remarkable energy and precision. This is the case most frequently in his sacramental sermons; and in those sacramental meditations which were the compressed essence of many a sermon. To these we would direct the attention of any reader who wished to obtain a full knowledge of the matured results of Willison's Christian experience; and we feel very certain that no one will read them attentively without receiving much benefit from the perusal. The earnest and affectionate, and at the same time deeply spiritual manner in which he conducted his regular and occasional visitations of his people, may also be learned best from that well-known treatise, his "Afflicted Man's Companion;" from which great numbers have derived, and will long continue to derive, much valuable instruction and consolation in nature's dark and trying hours of conflict with the last enemy.

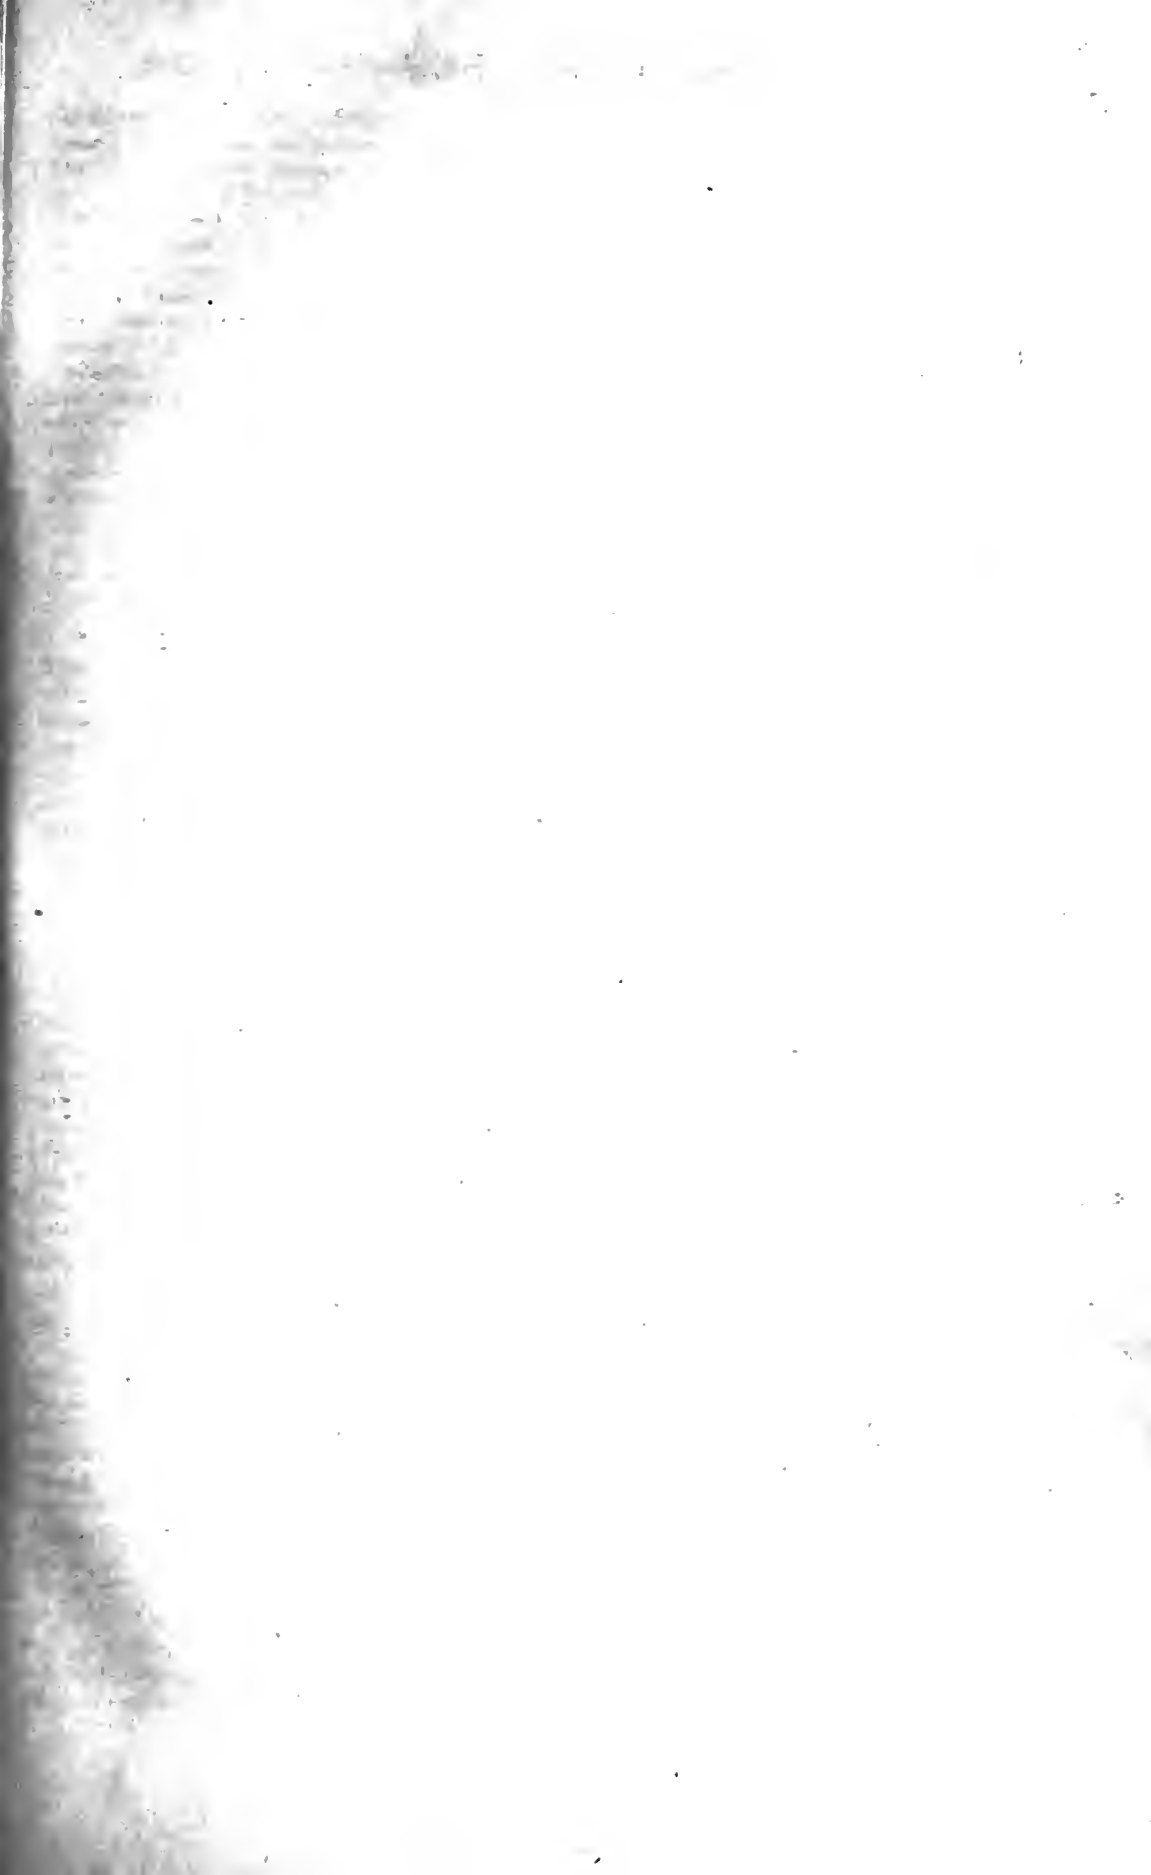

We have already offered some remarks respecting Willison's controversial writings, as these came before us in the course of the preceding narrative, and need not now dwell particularly on that subject. Yet it is difficult to pass it without again directing attention to the pervading spirit of Christian compassion to the erring, combined with uncompromising condemnation of errors, by which his controversial treatises are characterized. It is also worthy of observation, that in some of these productions there are manifest proofs of an extent of learning and a force of reasoning powers, for the possession of which even his admirers are not generally prepared to give him credit. While all his arguments are conducted with the utmost fairness and courtesy towards his opponents, they often display an amount of knowledge, a precision of statement, an acuteness of analysis, and a strength of reasoning, which combined to render him a very formidable antagonist.

In his attendance upon church courts he was constant, attentive to the business brought forward, and zealous in his endeavours to arrest the progress of corruption, and to produce a thorough reformation. And even when all his strenuous exertions failed, he did not permit himself to sink into the listless inactivity of despair, but exerted himself to frame what he well termed a "Fair and Impartial Testimony," in the hope that by its means he, being dead, might yet speak, with more success, to reviving and reforming times. And it may be truly asserted, that these hopes have been in no slight degree realized; few productions having been more instrumental in both perpetuating and reviving the knowledge of those great and sacred principles for which the Church of Scotland has always had to strive and suffer, than Willison's Fair and Impartial Testimony. And we cannot but regard it as a favourable omen for the interest of truth and vital godliness in our land, that public encouragement has been so largely given to the publication of a Full and Complete Edition of Willison's Works.

CONCERNING

PREFACE.

THAT wise king, Solomon, observes, Eccl. iii. 1, "To every thing there is a season, and a time for every purpose under heaven." And if there be a time and season allowed for every thing and purpose, even the meanest things and purposes in the world; surely an infinitely wise God will allow a proper time and season for the best things and purposes, and particularly for his solemn worship and service, which is the most necessary and excellent purpose in the world. It is not enough that we give God, from whom we have all our time, a share of every day for his service; no, we owe him also some whole days for his solemn and public worship: yea, it is agreeable to the dictates of the light of nature, and of sound reason, that one whole day of every week should be dedicated to him for that end.

All nations throughout the world have had their seasons and set times for devotion and sacrifices. The heathens, who worshipped dumb idols, had their festivals and holy-days, and particularly one day of the week, which they esteemed more sacred than the rest. The Turks, who have taken up the most unreasonable delusions and impostures, still retain the impressions of the rationality and equity of this thing, that there should be a certain day of the week set apart for the solemn worship of God. Indeed the light of nature, without some other help, could not have determined men universally to dedicate the seventh day of their time to God, more than the sixth or eighth. But seeing the wise Creator of the world, and author of time, thought fit from the beginning to measure time by days, and parcel out these days into such remarkable periods as weeks, or the revolution of seven days, to be constantly observed all the world over; it is most consonant to reason and equity, that one day of each week should be holy to the Lord.

But, besides the light of nature, we have the light of revelation for this point; God hath expressly appointed in his word one day in seven to be kept holy for his solemn worship; neither hath he left the particular day to men's own choice, but hath chosen it for them. And now, in the New Testament, he points out the first day of the week to be the Christian Sabbath to the end of the world, as is made evident in the following treatise.

The Jews have their Saturday Sabbath, which they glory in, and call the queen of the week. The Mahometans keep the Friday, as being Mahomet's birth-day. The Parthians and some other Pagan nations observe Tuesday, and esteem it above all other days of the week. But it is the discriminating badge of the professors of Christianity, through all the world, to celebrate the first day of the week, being Christ's resurrection-day, and hence called the Lord's day. Now, though the Jews and some few others plead that the seventh day from the creation is unalterable by virtue of the fourth commandment, it is showed in this treatise, that the words of the fourth commandment are so framed, that they may be applied to any day of the week that God doth please to pitch upon for the Sabbath, whether it be the first or last of the seven days. For when it is said, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God;" it doth not mean the seventh day from the creation, but any seventh day after six days' labour which God pitches on; upon which account it is not called that seventh day, but the seventh day. Neither is the seventh day mentioned in the first words of the commandment, which contain the substance of it; for it is said only, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy," not the seventh day. Nor is the seventh day mentioned in the last words of the commandment, which contain the formal reason of it; for it is said only, "The Lord blessed the Sabbath-day and hallowed it," not the seventh day.

As to the first day of the week, our Christian Sabbath, the great Lord of our time hath appropriated this day to himself, marked it with his seal, and hath put his name upon it, calling it, Rev. i. 10, the Lord's day; even as he calls the holy supper, 1 Cor. xi. 20, the Lord's supper; because the one was his institution as well as the other, and set apart for keeping up his memory, and showing forth his glory. Wherefore no true Christian, or lover of our Lord Jesus Christ, will be indifferent about the keeping of this holy day: for as the holy observing of this day is an open and visible owning of the Lord Jesus (whose name it bears) for our Lord and Master; so the neglect of this day is a plain disowning of him, and an open slighting of the benefits of his resurrection. O that men would think on this, and consider what they do, when they neglect or contemn the Lord's day.

Though the way of Sabbath-sanctification be the good old way, appointed by God ever since he created man upon the earth; yet there is no way more hated, no duty more opposed by Satan and wicked men. This we need not be surprised at, seeing it is a special fence to all religion, and a great bulwark against the torrent of impiety that runs in the world. And that true piety is so low in most places, and that vice and immorality so generally prevail, is mainly to be imputed to the abounding neglect and contempt of the holy Sabbath. For common experience doth testify, that where the Lord's day is more strictly observed, there Christian knowledge, piety, and morality, prosper most; and where the Sabbath is disregarded, there all these decay. The consideration whereof should excite all the lovers of God and holiness, to use their utmost endeavours to support the credit and maintain the dignity of the Sabbath against all its enemies.

This consideration hath moved me to contribute my mite upon this excellent subject in the following treatise, which is partly controversial and partly practical, for confuting the enemies of the Sabbath, and for instructing all in the divine warrant for sanctifying this holy day, and in the right manner of doing it. There are two essential things in the Christian religion, which all should make conscience of; sincerely to believe its truths, and faithfully to practise its duties. The first of these hath great influence upon the second; for, if the Christian truths be not firmly believed, the Christian duties will be ill performed. Now, the best means for promoting both the Christian faith and Christian practice, is the sanctification of the Lord's day.

Had it not been for the observation of the Sabbath, the truths of Christianity had been quite erased out of the minds of most men. For as the Lord's day, of itself, is a bright and lively memorial of our redemption by Jesus Christ: so upon this day we constantly have sounded in our ears the truths of that religion which Christ and his apostles delivered unto the world, and the excellency of them inculcated upon us. And as the observation of the Sabbath is a great preservative to the truths of Christianity, so it is also to the duties thereof. God hath set this one duty as a hedge or fence for keeping all the rest; for, by keeping the Sabbath conscientiously, the soul is notably disposed and put in frame for serving God in every religious duty. The frequent recurring of this day, and the gospel ordinances therein dispensed, serve to continue the remembrance of Christ and heaven among men, keep sin and vice under constant rebukes, and put atheism and infidelity to the blush. Take away the observation of the Lord's day, then the worship of God would be cast off, and atheism, profaneness, and all disorders, like a flood, would break in upon us.

We may look upon the duty of Sabbath-sanctification to be of no less consequence to the practice of Christianity, than Luther reckoned the article of justification to be to the doctrine of it, when he called it "the article by which the church stands or falls." For, if once we make a gap in this hedge of piety, serious godliness will run out at it, and a flood of impiety and looseness rush in upon us. It was surely the knowledge of this, that determined the wisest of emperors, kings, parliaments, and church councils and synods, to frame and publish so many excellent laws and acts for the strict observation of the Lord's day, agreeable to the divine laws thereanent. It would be happy for churches and nations, if these were put in execution, and all sorts of men brought to have a due regard to them.

But, notwithstanding of all the laws, divine and human, for the holy observation of the Lord's day, there are many in the age wherein we live, who venture to pour contempt upon this holy day. Some there are who dispute against the morality of the Sabbath, and disown the standing and perpetual obligation of the fourth commandment. Others, though they own the obligation of the commandment so far as to forbear servile work, and attend public worship on the Sabbath, yet plead for carnal diversions and recreations after public worship is over. Many would incline to the Papists' way of celebrating the Sabbath, who after mass and even song (as they call it) go presently to piping and dancing, and then to the ale-house; the same way that the Israelites celebrated the feast of the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 6, "The people ate and drank, and rose up to play." If this profane course were allowed, as of old, in times of antichristian darkness, many would then call the Sabbath a delight, and be, in some measure, reconciled to it; but, when they hear that the whole Sabbath is to be spent in religious duties and exercises, they murmur, and say, as those in Mal. i. 13, "What a weariness is it!"

It would be no grievance to many to see that old abomination of the "Book of Sports" revived and authorised among us; I mean that infamous declaration for liberty of sports and recreation on the Lord's day, published by authority in the year 1633, and appointed to be read from the pulpits; the prelates consenting to it, and persecuting those ministers who refused to read it. O what heinous God-provoking wickedness was it, for civil and ecclesiastical rulers, to unite in promoting the profanation of the Sabbath by such methods! As the heavy judgment of God followed them for such avowed profanation, so those in our age have reason to fear his judgments, who continue to be of the same profane disposition. Oh! is it not evident that sports and pastimes unfit the mind for spiritual service, and take off men's thoughts from what is serious and solemn? Do they not put the heart out of frame for attending on God, and for holding communion with him in holy duties and ordinances? This is showed more fully in the following treatise.

Again, there are others who observe this day no better than the beasts do. They only rest from their ordinary labour, and spend the day in idleness and sloth; which is to keep the Sabbath of an ox or an ass, not of a reasonable creature. To sanctify the Sabbath, it is not to keep it merely as a rest from our common employments, or keep it as an idle day: but to keep it as a holy day, a day set apart for God's glory, and for promoting our salvation. But, alas! such is the spiritual sloth and idleness of many poor careless souls on this day, they labour as little for their souls on it as they do for their bodies; they sleep, loiter, lie at home, and seldom go to any worship at all; if they go out of doors, it is for their diversion, to take a walk, to pay a visit, or the like, but not to attend God's worship. Many, alas! will go a dozen of miles to a market for a little gain, that will not go one mile, nor a few steps to the church, to attend the gospel-market for enriching their souls. If the bell that calls them to the worship of God, advertised them of a stage play, or of some idle pastime, perhaps they would be found there among the first; but, for spiritual work, they have an aversion to it.

Moreover, there are many who go to church and attend ordinances this day, rather to please a natural conscience, or support their reputation in the world, than to serve God or save their souls. Or perhaps they go because it is the fashion, or the way in which they have been brought up; but, alas! leaving their hearts behind them they present their bodies to God, and no more. And hence it is, that in the time of the most solemn worship, they have their eyes either wandering after vanity, or else shut with drowsiness, and sleep; they find no delight in the Sabbath, taste no sweetness in ordinances, know nothing of communion with God in them. They understand not the Psalmist's language, "A day in God's courts is better than a thousand any where else." No, this day is to them the longest and most wearisome day of all the week; the religious exercises of it are irksome and burdensome to them. It may be said of them, as of Doeg the Edomite, 1 Sam. xxi. 7, "He was that day detained before the Lord." They long to be released from the service of that day, and glad when it is over. Alas! the minds of many are so set upon the world, that they complain in their hearts of the length of this day, as the Israelites of old, Amos viii. 5, "When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn; and the Sabbath, that we may set forth wheat?" They count all these days lost days that bring them in no worldly gain. Hence it was that the heathens (as Seneca tells us) counted the Jews a foolish people, because they lost a full seventh part of their lives, to wit, by observing the Sabbath. But, ah! it is to be lamented, that not heathens only, but also many professed Christians, count the Sabbath a lost day. O what base ingratitude is this to God, for the invaluable privilege and blessing of the Sabbath to the souls of men!

LASTLY, There are, besides these mentioned, some prodigies of wickedness in the world, persons who prosecute their lewd and profane courses with more vigour on this holy day than upon any other; and so make this day of holy rest the devil's working day, and consume it wholly upon their lusts! O how daring an affront must this be to a great, a holy God, to make that a day to serve the devil, a day to improve in vice and debauchery, which the Lord hath instituted to be a day for his own worship, and for our improvement in piety and devotion!

It is for remedying these woeful abuses of the Sabbath that I have written the ensuing treatise. I have heard of the usefulness of this treatise to some who have read it. O that God would bless it to many more, and make it the means to preserve and promote the love and esteem of the Lord's day in the hearts of many! A serious godliness never did, so it never will, thrive nor flourish, in the world, when or where the Lord's day is disregarded: long experience confirms it, that the sin of Sabbath-breaking is a woeful inlet to impiety and profaneness. They who once begin to make little difference betwixt the Lord's day and other days, will easily be brought to make little difference betwixt the Lord's name and other names, the Lord's table and other tables, the Lord's book and other books. Whereas a conscientious regard to his holy day is a strong fence to religion, being a mighty check upon the soul against the commission of sin, and the neglect of duty. The Lord's day is an unspeakable blessing to a lost world, and the sweetest day that ever dawned upon it; it ought to be the delight of our souls, and rejoicing of our hearts. Every wise man, that knows the value of this day, will have a peculiar esteem for it above all the days of the week, and will reckon every minute of it precious, and desire that none of it be mispent. What Christ said to his disciples concerning the loaves and fishes, he says to us concerning his holy day, "Gather up the fragments." Gather up the spare hours and minutes of it, count them as precious as the goldsmith doth the small filings of his gold; let nothing of Sabbath-time be lost, improve it wholly for God and your souls.

This treatise I recommend chiefly to families, because the duty of sanctifying the Sabbath doth nearly concern all families as such: for all governors of families are charged, by the fourth commandment, to see that it be done in all their dwellings; and by the commandment, they are made responsible for their children, servants, and for all that lodge within their gates, that none of them be allowed to break the Sabbath. If any masters of families be excited by this treatise to mind their proper duty, I have my reward; but let the glorious Author of the Sabbath alone have the praise.

May all of us get grace to keep the Sabbath of our God, and choose the things that please him, and take hold of his covenant, that so we may be numbered among those whom he will bring to his holy mountain, and make joyful in his house of prayer! Amen.

SOME INSTANCES OF THE GREAT REGARD WHICH OUR ANCESTORS AND LEGISLATORS MANIFESTED TO THE LORD'S DAY, AND OF THE LAWS AND ACTS MADE IN ANCIENT TIMES FOR THE STRICT OBSERVATION OF IT, WITH THOSE OF THIS NATION AND CHURCH WHICH STILL STAND IN FORCE; BEING SO MANY TESTIMONIES TO THE MORALITY OF THE SABBATH, AND THE DIVINE INSTITUTION OF THE LORD'S DAY.

THE ancient Christians, who lived nearest the apostles' times, spoke of the Lord's day with the highest veneration and respect; such as Ignatius, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and others; who also give an account of the particular religious services performed by Christians on that day. It is observable, that the Christians then commonly called that day among themselves, "the first day of the week," and "the Lord's day," as it is denominated in the New Testament; likewise, they sometimes called it the "eighth day," because it succeeded the Jewish seventh day, and came to be celebrated in the room of it, and seems to be pointed at by the eighth day mentioned by Ezck. xliii. 27. I grant that some of the fathers, such as Justin and Tertullian, in their apologies to the heathen emperors, called this day "Sunday;" the reason whereof is plain, they were speaking to heathens, who always called this day by that name, and so would not have known certainly what day they meant, if they had not called it Sunday; which name was given it by the heathens, because of their dedicating this day to the sun, who was the chief of the planetary gods worshipped by them. But now, when that reason has ceased, and Christians speak of this day among themselves, it is not proper to give it the name of Sunday any more.

With what esteem and veneration doth Ignatius, that ancient martyr, speak of this day in his epistle to the Magnesians? "Let us not," saith he, "Jewishly sabbatize, but let us rest spiritually; and, instead of the old Sabbath, let every lover of Christ celebrate the Lord's day, the best and most eminent of days, in which our Life arose."

So strictly was this day set apart by the ancients for public devotion, that very early the synod of Illeberis ordained, "That if any man dwelling in a city (where churches are near at hand) should for three Lord's days keep from church, he should be suspended from communion with the church."

In the fourth century, the historian Eusebius tells us, that Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor, issued an edict, requiring the whole Roman empire to observe the Lord's day, in memory of those things which were done by the common Saviour of all men; and bearing that he counted that day the best and chief of days, truly the Lord's, and a day of salvation; and that he ordered his army to offer up prayers to God, and required all men every where to apply themselves to religious worship; and that no work nor any thing should be allowed to hinder their prayers and devotions that day.

We read also of many ancient laws made by kings in England, prohibiting all kinds of servile work, merchandise or traffic, on the Lord's day, upon very severe penalties; as that made by king Ina about the year 688, that made by king Alfred in the year 876, that made by Edward his son about the year 912, that made by king Edgar about the year 966, which required that the celebration of the Lord's day should begin from nine o'clock on Saturday night: also that law made by king Canute about the year 1026, to the same effect with that of Edgar's, and more particularly and strictly forbidding all trade, and all meetings of people for secular affairs or conversations, requiring them to abstain from hunting and every worldly employment on this day.

To the same purpose might be adduced many canons of ecclesiastical synods and councils in England, France, Germany, and other nations; a great number whereof we find collected by Dr. Francis White, bishop of Ely, in 1635. Likewise we find great zeal manifested by a convocation of the Scots clergy for the Lord's day, at their meeting at Perth in the year 1180, as narrated by Archbishop Spotiswood. They ordained, that every Saturday, from twelve o'clock, should be set apart for preparation for the Lord's day; and that all the people on Saturday evening, at the sound of the bell, should address themselves to hear prayers, and should abstain from worldly labours till Monday morning.

But I shall pass from those more ancient laws and canons, to give a brief account of some acts of Parliament both in England and Scotland, which are now in force, for observing the Lord's day; and which all magistrates of burghs, justices of peace, and other judges, should and might execute presently, if they were disposed to do it.

In England PRIMO CAR. I. cap. 1. "Forasmuch as there is nothing more acceptable to God than the true and sincere worship of him according to his holy will, and that the holy keeping of the Lord's day is a principal part of the true service of God, which in very many places of this realm hath been, and now is, profaned and neglected by disorderly sorts of people: it is therefore enacted, that there shall be no more meetings, assemblies, or concourse of people on the Lord's day, for any sport and pastimes whatsoever," &c.

TERTIO CAR. I. cap. 1. it is enacted, "That no carrier, carman, wainman, nor drover of cattle, shall travel on the Lord's day, upon pain of forfeiting twenty shillings; nor any butcher shall be allowed to kill or sell meat," &c.

VIGESIMO NONO CAR. II. cap. 7. it is enacted, "That all the laws enacted and in force concerning the observation of the Lord's day, and repairing to the church thereon, be carefully put in execution: and that all and every person and persons whatsoever shall on every Lord's day apply themselves to the observation of the same, by exercising themselves thereon in the duties of piety and true religion publicly and privately; and that no tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, or other person whatsoever, shall do or exercise any worldly labour, business, or work of their ordinary callings upon the Lord's days, or any part thereof (works of necessity and charity only excepted;) and that every person, being of the age of fourteen years and upwards, offending in the premises, shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of five shillings; and that no person or persons whatever shall publicly cry, show forth, or expose to sale, any wares, merchandises, fruit, herbs, goods, or chattels whatsoever upon the Lord's day, or any part thereof, upon pain that every person so offending shall forfeit the same goods, so cried, or showed forth, or exposed to sale."

It is further enacted, "That no drover, horse-courser, waggoner, butcher, higler, they or any of their servants, shall travel or come into his or their inn or lodging upon the Lord's day, or any part thereof, upon pain that each and every such offender shall forfeit twenty shillings for every such offence. And if any other person travels on the Lord's day, and should then be robbed, the hundred is not to be answerable for it; and whatever the person loses, he is barred from bringing any action for such robberies. No waterman is to be employed to travel, except as licensed for any extraordinary occasion. No person is allowed to serve or, execute, or cause to be served or executed, any writ, process, warrant, order, judgment, or device, except in cases of treason, felony, or breach of the peace. The impeachment of offenders is to be within ten days, and a third part of the forfeitures is appointed to the prosecutor," &c.

SOME ACTS OF THE PARLIAMENT OF SCOTLAND FOR THE RELIGIOUS OBSERVATION OF THE LORD'S DAY, WHICH STILL STAND IN FORCE.

JAMES VI. Parl. 6. chap. 71. It is enacted, "That there be no markets on the Sabbath-day: and that no gaming, playing, passing to taverns and ale-houses, or selling of meat or drink, or wilful remaining from the parish-kirk in time of sermon or prayers, upon the Sabbath-day, be used, under the pains of twenty shillings Scots. And who refuse, or are unable to pay the said pains, shall be put and holden in the stocks, or such other engine for public punishment, for the space of twenty-four hours," &c.

Charles II. Parl. 1. Act. 18. intituled, Act for the due observation of the Lord's day; which act doth discharge, "All going of salt-pans, mills, or kilns, under the pains of twenty pounds Scots, to be paid by the heritors and possessors thereof: and also all salmon fishing, hiring of shearers, carrying of loads, keeping of markets, or using of merchandise upon the said day, and all other profanation thereof, under the pain of ten pound Scots, the one half thereof to be paid by the said fisher or shearer hired, and the other half by the persons hiring. And if the offender be not able to pay the said penalties, that he be exemplarily punished in his body, according to the merits of his fault. This act is again ratified, Charles II.

Parl. 2. Sess. 3. chap. 22. Likewise it is ratified by K. William, Parl. 1. June 15, 1693. And also, that parliament made several new laws to the said purpose, June 28, 1695, October 9, 1696, January 31, 1701. And in these acts they ratify, renew, and revive, all former laws against Sabbath-breaking, and strictly require and enjoin all inferior magistrates to put the same to exact and punctual execution against all persons without exception; with certification, that any magistrate that shall refuse, neglect or delay, to execute the said laws, upon application of any minister or kirk-session, or any person in their name, informing and offering sufficient probation, shall be liable toties quoties to a fine of an hundred pounds Scots by the Lords of Session," &c.

Likewise our sovereigns, upon their coming to the throne, do still emit proclamations for executing the laws against Sabbath-breaking, and other vices; and wherein they charge all magistrates and judges to suppress and punish the profanation of the Lord's day by gaming, selling of liquors, and otherwise; and they require and command all persons whatsoever, decently and reverently, to attend the worship of God on every Lord's day, on pain of their highest displeasure, and with being proceeded against with the utmost rigour that may be by law.

To these acts of parliament and proclamations, I might subjoin some acts of the General Assembly of the church of Scotland against Sabbath-breaking, and for the better observation of the Lord's day. Many such acts have they made since our reformation from popery: I shall only mention a few of them.

Assemb. 1639, at Edinburgh, August 29. They made an act, intituled, Act anent keeping of the Lord's day, in which we have these words: "The General Assembly recommend to the several presbyteries the execution of the old acts of assemblies against the breach of the Sabbath-day, by going of mills, salt-pans, salmon-fishing, or any such like labour," &c.

Assemb. 1646, at Edinburgh, June 18. They made an act, intituled, Act against loosing of ships and barks on the Lord's day, which runs thus: "The General Assembly, understanding how much the Lord's day is profaned by skippers and other seafaring men, do therefore discharge and inhibit all skippers and sailors to begin any voyage on the Lord's day, or to loose any ships, barks, or boats out of the harbour or road upon that day: and who shall do on the contrary thereof, shall be censured as profaners of the Sabbath."

Assemb. 1699, at Edinburgh, January 30, in their act against profaneness, they have these words: "The General Assembly recommends to kirk-sessions and presbyteries, the vigorous, impartial, and yet prudent exercise of discipline against all immorality; especially drunkenness and filthiness, cursing, swearing, and profaning the Lord's day, which too much abound: and that they apply to the magistrate for the execution of the good laws made against immorality and profaneness. And seeing it is observed, that in burghs, especially those of the greatest resort, as Edinburgh, many sit too late in taverns, especially on the Saturday night, and men of business pretend they do it for the relaxation of their mind; through which some neglect the public worship of the Lord's day in the forenoon, and others attend the worship drowsily: Therefore the General Assembly recommends it to all ministers, where such sinful customs are, to represent to the people, both publicly and privately, the sin and evil thereof; and to call them to redeem that time which they have free from business, and to employ it in converse with God, about their soul's state, and in preparation for the Sabbath; which will yield more delight than all sensual pleasures can do. And the General Assembly beseech and exhort all magistrates of burghs to be assistant to ministers in inquiring into and reforming such abuses."

Assemb. 1705, at Edinburgh, April 10. "The General Assembly, taking to their serious consideration the great profanation of the Lord's day, by multitudes of people vaguing idly upon the streets of the city of Edinburgh, pier and shore of Leith, in St. Ann's yard, and the Queen's park, and in diverse places about Edinburgh; and considering the profanation of the Lord's day in other places, by unnecessary travelling and otherways; and the General Assembly being deeply sensible of the great dishonour done to the holy God, and of the open contempt of God and man manifested by such heaven-daring profaneness, to the exposing of the nation to the heaviest judgments; therefore they do in the fear of God earnestly exhort all their reverend brethren of the ministry, and other officers of the church, to contribute their utmost endeavours in their stations for suppressing such gross profanation of the Lord's day, by a vigorous and impartial, yet prudent exercise of the discipline of the church, and by holding hand to the execution of the laudable laws of the nation against the guilty, in such a way and manner as is allowed by law. And, because the concurrence and assistance of the civil government will be absolutely necessary for the better curbing and restraining of this crying sin, the General Assembly do hereby appoint their commission to be nominated by them, to address the Right Honourable the Lords of her Majesty's privy council, that their Lordships may be pleased to give such orders, and take such courses for restraining such abuses, as they in their wisdom shall judge most effectual."

Assemb. 1708, at Edinburgh, April 27. "Foras-

much ministers from diverse parts of this national church do represent that there is a general profanation of the Lord's day by travelling thereupon, carrying goods, driving cattle, and other abuses, to the great scandal of religion, and manifest breach of many good laws; therefore the General Assembly did, and hereby do appoint each presbytery within this church to nominate two or three of their number, to attend the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary at their first circuit that falls to be in their bounds, and to represent to their Lordships the profanation of the Lord's day by the foresaid wicked and sinful practices: and the General Assembly do seriously recommend to the said Lords of Justiciary to take such effectual courses as they in their wisdom shall think fit to restrain and punish the aforesaid abuses; which the Assembly will acknowledge as a singular service done to God and his church. And they do, in the meantime, enjoin all the ministers of this church, from their pulpits, to advertise their people, among whom such practices are, of the great hazard their immortal souls are in by such courses," &c. By all which we may clearly see what a high esteem our zealous and godly ancestors had of the Lord's day, and of what great importance they judged the due observation of this holy day is to the interest of true religion and godliness! And O what a pity is it that we, who succeed them, should come so far short of them in zeal for sanctifying the Lord's day! O that all magistrates and ministers were animated to show a due concern for the honour of this holy day, as in former times. A pleasant token would this be of the revival of decayed religion among us.

INTRODUCTION.

GOD, in his infinite goodness to fallen mankind, has been pleased to give us the holy Bible, or canonical scriptures, as a perfect rule of faith and manners; containing at large the great truths, duties, and concerns of the Christian religion. And these we have briefly comprised in three succinct compends, which are owned and received by all Christians; viz. the Apostles' creed, as it is commonly called, the Lord's prayer, and the decalogue; the first being the sum of our things to be believed, the second of our things to be asked for, and the third of our things to be done.

The decalogue, or ten commandments, which were solemnly delivered to the people of Israel from mount Sinai, contain the moral law; being a fixed and perpetual rule of righteousness which God hath given to be observed by all mankind, in all ages and periods, to the end of the world. This is that law which the royal psalmist so much admires and commends, and makes his chief subject in several psalms, particularly xix. and cxix. which deserve our special notice and high esteem in that respect.

The moral law differs vastly in its nature from that of a positive law, which commands or prohibits things that before were indifferent, and only become good or evil by the virtue of the command, and not otherwise. Such was that command to our first parents concerning their eating of the tree of knowledge; such were the ceremonial and many of the judicial laws given to the Jews. These were binding only upon particular persons, and lasted but for a time. But the moral law, contained in the Decalogue, is of universal and perpetual obligation to every rational creature, and can never be abrogated nor dispensed with; seeing it is evidently founded upon, and agreeable to the dictates of the light of nature, and the principles of sound reason, naturally engraven on man's heart.

This moral law God hath divided into two tables, Deut. v. 22. In the first table we have the first four commandments, which immediately belong unto the honour of God, and instruct us in the duties we owe to him. In the second table we have the last six commandments, which respect the welfare of our neighbours, and teach us our duty towards them.

As all God's works are very beautiful in their order, so are the ten commandments, which have their place and rank assigned them, according to the dignity of the duties commanded, and the heinousness of the sins forbidden. As for the first table, the order of its commandments is admirable. The first determines the right object of our worship; viz. the eternal and only true God. The second directs to the means of worship; viz. that they be only those of God's instituting, and not images, or means of our devising. The third appoints the manner of our worship, that it be with awful fear and reverence; without blaspheming or profaning of his name. The fourth commandment specifies the right time or season to be employed in his solemn worship; viz. one day in seven, which is the subject of the ensuing treatise, the design whereof is to promote the religious observation of the Christian Sabbath, as the best mean to revive religion when it falls under decay, and to maintain it in its life and power where it exists.

Time is a jewel of inestimable worth, and upon the management of it depends the salvation of our immortal souls for ever; and therefore it can never be enough valued, nor too carefully improved. Time is a golden stream, continually running past us out of one eternity into another; and yet its worth is seldom taken notice of until it is quite passed away from us. How sadly do we verify that word of Solomon? Eccl. ix. 12, "Man knoweth not his time."

But of all time, Sabbath-time is the most precious, and should be redeemed with the greatest care, as that upon which our salvation depends in a peculiar manner. It is the time in which the Holy Spirit is especially at work for convincing, converting, and edifying the souls of men; it is the time set apart by infinite Wisdom for the happiness of the creature and the glory of the Creator: and therefore it is the business of every one to inquire how this time is to be improved aright. Now, for their encouragement and assistance in this matter, I propose to insist chiefly upon two heads: 1. To evince the morality of the Sabbath, and the divine appointment of the Lord's day. 2. Give directions how to sanctify it aright.

CHAP. I.

CONCERNING THE MORALITY OF THE SABBATH, AND THE DIVINE APPOINTMENT OF THE LORD'S DAY.

IN order to the handling of this subject the more clearly and methodically, I shall, through the divine assistance, propose and resolve several questions relative to it.

QUESTION I. What is the proper signification and import of the name Sabbath, so commonly in use among us?

ANSWER. The name Sabbath is a Hebrew word, signifying rest, the Sabbath being a day of holy rest: and it is so called, because God hath enjoined us to rest this day from our earthly work and labour, that we may solemnly call to mind his resting from his works, both of creation and redemption; publicly adore him therefore, solace our souls in his goodness, repose and rest in the arms of his mercy, and meditate upon that "eternal rest which remains for the people of God" in the other world.

This being the true import and meaning of the word Sabbath, we still retain it, and commonly use it to signify the Lord's day, our Christian Sabbath.

There are some indeed who are offended at the retaining of the name Sabbath, under the New Testament times, pretending that it is properly Jewish; though, in the meantime, they are fond of the words priest and altar, which are much more so. But it is surely a mistake to say, that the name Sabbath is Jewish, or peculiar to the Jews, and so not to be used by Christians: for we see the Lord gives it that name in the moral law, which is of perpetual use, binding Christians as much as Jews: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." So it was not the Jews, but the great God, that gave the Sabbath its name. Nay, Christ our Saviour doth, in the New Testament, call his own day by the name of Sabbath, Matth. xxiv. 20, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, nor on the Sabbath day." Now, it is evident, that our Lord doth there mean the Christian Sabbath, or his own day; for he is not only speaking to Christians, but concerning the flight of Christians, which he knew was to fall out forty years after the Jewish Sabbath was abolished, and the Lord's day come into its place. Surely he would not bid Christians pray that their flight might not fall on the Jewish Sabbath, when he both foresaw, and intended, that then they would reckon themselves under no obligation to observe the Jewish Sabbath, nor under any restraint of fleeing or travelling on that day: (which even the Jews themselves believed at that time, they might lawfully do in time of eminent hazard, as appears by the decree which they made relative thereto under the Hasmonians) and therefore he must mean the Christian Sabbath, upon which he bids Christians pray that their flight may not happen. Not that it was unlawful for them to flee or travel on that day in time of danger, but because it would be a great addition to their trouble, if their flight should happen at such a time, as to deprive them of the opportunity of God's worship and ordinances.

It is of no weight what is objected by some, that the Christians who lived in Judea among the Jews, could not be allowed by them to travel on their Sabbath, and therefore (say they) Christ bids them pray that their flight might not fall upon it. For, in the first place, the Jews not having the government then in their hands, they had no power of restraining or punishing of crimes. 2dly, The time which Christ speaks of was a time of war and confusion, occasioned by the Roman armies invading the land, when no notice could be taken of such cases as travelling on the Sabbath. 3dly, The most superstitious were at that time caused to flee and travel as well as the Christians; which they then thought it lawful to do, as we told before. 4thly, If Christ had spoken so concerning the Jewish Sabbath, it had laid some foundation for Christians to fall into mistakes concerning the obligation of the Jewish Sabbath, and other ceremonies: which, to be sure, our Lord would not have given them. And, if there had been any such occasion given, the Judaizing Christians would certainly have improved it against the apostles; which yet we do not find. Lastly, The learned Owen, Durham, Brown, and other writers on this subject, understand Christ as speaking in this place of the Christian Sabbath.

But granting that the name Sabbath were indeed Jewish and improper, (as some would have it) yet I am sure it is still preferable to that of Sunday, which is truly heathenish, though commonly used by them in their liturgy to the offence of many Christians. For it is well known that the heathen idolaters called this day Sunday, because of their dedicating it to the created sun, which was the chief of their planetary gods that they ordinarily worshipped, as may be gathered also from 2 Kings xxiii. 5; Ezek. viii. 16. And hence some of the ancient heathens (of whom Tertullian speaks) fancied that the sun was the God of the Christians, because they celebrated the first day of the week.

I know it is objected, that some of the primitive apologists for Christianity, as Justin Martyr and Tertullian, in their writings, call the Lord's day Sunday. But the reason of their so doing is plain; they were writing to heathens, to whom the doctrines of Christianity and institution of the Lord's day were things new and strange, and who would not have known what day they meant, if they had spoken of the Lord's day; and therefore they call it by the name they gave it, Sunday. For when we treat with others, we must express things by the names that are common and current among them, unless we intend to be barbarians to them.

But the primitive Christians did not use to call it Sunday among themselves, but, commonly, the Lord's day, not the Sabbath; partly to distinguish it from the Jewish Sabbath that was so lately abolished, and partly to wean the Jewish converts the more effectually from Judaism. But the true reason why some in this age seem to be offended at the word Sabbath, as being applied to the Lord's day, is, because they cannot allow of any thing that would infer an obligation upon them to keep such a strict holy rest upon the Christian Sabbath as the Jews did upon their Sabbath: but I will have occasion to speak of this afterwards.

I need not wait to show the different significations of the word Sabbath among the Jews; only, in a word, beside the seventh day of each week, or weekly Sabbath, (which is the most ordinary acceptation of the word in scripture) it is put also sometimes to signify a whole week, because every week had a Sabbath included in it, Lev. xxiii. 15. "Seven Sabbaths shall be complete," i. e. weeks. The Pharisee saith, Luke xviii. 12. "I fast twice a-week." Likewise the word Sabbath is sometimes put to signify seven years, Lev. xxv. 8, "Thou shalt number unto thee seven Sabbaths of years," i. e. (as it is there explained) seven times seven years. Seven years was called among the Jews a Sabbath of years, because their land rested from culture or husbandry every seventh year in answer to the church's resting every seventh day. Hence it is said, Lev. xxv. 4, "The seventh year shall be a Sabbath of rest unto the land." Besides this, they had their great sabbatical year, or jubilee, which was every fiftieth year. For, according to Lev. xxv. 9, they were to reckon seven Sabbaths of years, or seven times seven years, which is forty-nine, and then to observe their jubilee, or sabbatical year. Lastly, The other sacred feasts which the Jews kept monthly or annually, are also called Sabbaths, in regard of their resting from labour on these days as on the weekly Sabbath. Hence, Lev. xxiii. 24, the first day of the seventh month, which was their "feast of trumpets," is called a Sabbath. But the weekly Sabbath is commonly called in Scripture, by way of eminency, the Sabbath; to distinguish it from all other Sabbaths, and give it the preference to all the other feasts of the Jews.

QUEST. II. For what ends hath God appointed a weekly Sabbath?

ANS. 1. God hath appointed it for manifesting of his own glory, and particularly for displaying his sovereign power and authority over all his creatures. It must certainly be a high acknowledgment of God's universal dominion and supremacy, to have all the world every week, in one day, lay aside their own business, that they may jointly worship him in a public and solemn manner.

2. He appointed the Sabbath for the benefit of his creatures, and particularly in compassion to fallen man; for he saw man's heart would be so glued to the world, so drenched in sensuality, that, were he left to himself, he would not allow one day in a month, nay, in a year, for divine worship; but would have drudged himself, his servants, and beasts, even to death, in pursuit of worldly things, without caring for any thing that is better. Wherefore a merciful God hath strictly commanded man to rest one day every week from all worldly concerns, that thereby he might, in a manner, be laid under a necessity to care for his soul, and the things of another world; and, in the meantime, the poor toiled beasts, as well as men's bodies, might have some rest and ease, for their preservation and support.

But more particularly, the Sabbath is designed for our soul's eternal welfare; in regard,

1. The Sabbath tends highly to our instruction, and to the keeping up the lively impressions of the truths of Christianity in our memories. The Sabbath recurring every week doth still anew lay before us a compendious view of these essential doctrines:—The creation of the world, man's fall, Christ's incarnation and satisfaction, his death, resurrection and victory for completing our redemption: besides that glorious and eternal rest above, provided for the people of God.

2. It tends to promote holiness, spirituality, and heavenly-mindedness, in us; and that two ways. 1st. By calling us off from temporal to spiritual employment. Sensual objects through the week are ready to alienate our affections from God, and wear spiritual things out of our minds; for recalling whereof the Sabbath seasonably returns, and presents and entertains us with divine objects. 2d. By affording us a lively emblem of heaven, and the conversation of the glorified saints, in celebrating that eternal Sabbath above. For, as in heaven there is no buying, selling, nor any worldly business, but a continual speaking of God, enjoying communion with him, adoring and praising him for ever, without any mixture of other affairs, so the Lord will have an emblem or representation hereof, as near as may be, given weekly to his people on earth, by the Sabbath, wherein they must lay aside all worldly things, and be wholly employed in the service of God, and work of heaven. And this is in order both to keep them in mind of, and make them meet for, that inheritance of the saints in light.

QUEST. III. What is to be understood by the morality of the Sabbath, or fourth commandment, so frequently spoken of?

ANS. When we call the Sabbath, or fourth commandment, moral, we mean that it is one of God's moral precepts, or a part of the moral law, i. e. the perpetual and unalterable rule given us by God, for regulating our life and manners. Also, by calling it moral, we distinguish it from the ceremonial law, which was binding for a time only, and abrogated by Christ's coming. The fourth commandment, enjoining the observation of the Sabbath, is not ceremonial, but moral; that is, it is not temporary, but of standing and perpetual obligation, and which binds all men, in all ages, to the end of the world.

But, that we may have a more distinct apprehension of the morality of the Sabbath, we must distinguish betwixt things that are naturally moral, and things positively moral. Moral natural is, when the thing required is so founded upon, and authorised by, the law of nature and right reason, that it is fit and necessary to be done, though there had been no express command for it; such as worshipping God, obeying parents, abstaining from murder, &c. Moral positive is something enjoined us, which, though it be agreeable to the law of nature, yet carries not such a natural evidence in it, as to oblige us, without a divine revelation and express command; but, being once revealed and commanded, it is perpetually binding, as well as that which is moral natural. Now, the fourth commandment is commonly called moral positive, though indeed there are several things in it which are of natural equity, and authorised by the law of nature and sound reason; such as,

1. That there be a due part of our time stated and consecrated for the solemn worship and service of God, and particularly in public assemblies.

2. That this stated time or day should be universal, and the same through all, that one man's business interfere not with another's devotions.

3. That this day should recur in a due frequency, that it neither be so rare as to hinder our soul's good, or indispose us for the duties of it; nor so frequent as to deprive us of opportunity for our necessary secular employments.

4. That the holy duties of this day be not marred or interrupted by worldly employments or diversions; as they tend naturally to draw off the mind from God and divine objects. These four things, included in the fourth commandment, I reckon to be of natural equity or moral natural.

There are other things in it which are of positive institution, that is, binding only by a positive law and express revelation. Of these again there is something,

1. Which is positive moral, that is, of perpetual unalterable obligation; viz. that the foresaid stated time for God's solemn worship should be the seventh part of our time, or one day in seven. This, by God's law, is become perpetually moral and unalterable; but, if God had not revealed it to us, the law or light of nature could not have determined us to it, nor rendered any solid reason why the seventh rather than the fifth, sixth, or eighth part of our time should have been so consecrated to God. But the Author of nature, who best knows what proportion of time is most suitable both for men's bodies and spirits, and how oft it should recur, so as to answer best the exigencies both of our present and future life, hath wisely determined it to be a seventh part, or one day in seven. And can any man say but it is a most rational and fair determination? Had he dealt with us strictly, he might have taken the six days and left us but one: but since he hath taken but one, and allowed us six, we ought to acknowledge that the Lord hath dealt graciously and liberally with us. Nay, had it been referred to ourselves, could we have given less time than this to God, from whom we have all our time, nay, our very being, and all the good things we enjoy?

Bat, 2. There is in the fourth commandment something that is positive ceremonial or mutable; viz. the observation of the last day of the seven for the Sabbath. This, indeed, was enjoined at first, though not directly and principally, as anywise essential to the commandment for the Sabbath; but only in a secondary way, as a circumstance of the commandment, which was to be altered when God pleased. It belonged not to the substance of this commandment, or the great design of the law, in what end of the week the Sabbath should be, whether the first or last of the seven days should be consecrated for it; since the scope of the fourth commandment is only to bind us to consecrate the seventh part of our time, or one day in seven, to the Lord; this is the morality of the commandment, and what is of sacred and perpetual obligation in it. For, observe how the commandment runs, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy: six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord." He saith not, "Remember the seventh day" to keep it holy, but, "Remember the Sabbath-day," or "holy rest," whatever day it shall be appointed on. Take the six days for your labour, and let God have a seventh every week for his solemn worship; this is the design of the law. For when it is said, "The seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord," it is not precisely meant of the seventh in the order, but the seventh in number; not the seventh day after the creation, but the day following the six days allowed men to labour; that day is the Lord's, whatever day in the week it fall on. And though it be told in the end, that "God rested the seventh day," which indeed seems to be the seventh from the creation; yet it is said, "He blessed the Sabbath-day," not the seventh day. So that it is plain, that both in the beginning and end of the commandment, the Lord puts a remarkable difference betwixt the Sabbath or day of holy rest, and the seventh day of the week, the day of his own rest; implying that the scope of the commandment is to bind us to sanctify one day in seven, whatever seventh the Lord pleases to choose, whether it be the first or last day of the week: and that the observation of the seventh day from the creation is to be distinguished from the standing law of the Sabbath. For, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy," is the fourth commandment, and would have bound us though it had stopt there and said no more. Though yet I grant, that the observation of the seventh or last day of the week for the Sabbath is so enjoined by the fourth commandment that none could have altered it from that day to another but he that is Lord of the Sabbath.

Thus you see in what sense the fourth commandment is moral, and of unalterable obligation; and how it perpetually binds all Christians, as well as Jews, to sanctify one day in seven for a weekly Sabbath unto the Lord. And now the day being changed by divine authority from the last to the first day of the week, (of which afterwards,) the substance, scope, or morality of the fourth commandment is nowise infringed; and it still retains its authority and obligatory force as much as ever, binding Christians to sanctify the first day of the week, as much as it did the Jews to sanctify the last. Even as a law, commanding the keeping of an anniversary day for the sovereign's birth, doth equally apply itself to the birthday of each succeeding prince.

QUEST. IV. How may the morality of the Sabbath, or the perpetual obligation of the fourth commandment, be demonstrated against those who deny it?

Ans. There are many reasons which prove that the fourth commandment is moral, binding us by a sacred and perpetual law to keep holy one day in seven to the end of the world; such as,

I. If the law for the Sabbath was given to man, and binding upon him in a state of innocence before there was any ceremony or type of Christ instituted, (for then man did not need a Redeemer, nor any rite or type relative to him,) then consequently this commandment was not ceremonial, nor abolished by Christ's coming, but is of moral and perpetual obligation: but the former is true, and therefore the latter. The consequence of the first proposition is certain, for the reasons mentioned; and also from this, that the Sabbath was appointed to Adam upon a moral ground, which obliges all his posterity; viz. that he might have freedom and opportunity for the solemn worship of God, without any diversion from worldly things. For Adam, in his best estate, being but a finite creature, could not be intensely taken up with spiritual and temporal things both at once; his ordinary employment of dressing the garden would, in some measure, have diverted his mind, that he could not wholly give himself to devotion and the solemn worship of his Maker. Wherefore, God saw it fit he should have a day set apart, wherein he might have an uninterrupted freedom for it. Now, if Adam needed a Sabbath for the grounds above-mentioned, much more do we need one, who are not only finite creatures, but corrupt also; and have so little grace and strength for spiritual employment, and so many corruptions, temptations, and allurements to draw our hearts from God through the week which he had not.

Philip Limbroch, and other anti-sabbatarians, have no way to answer this argument but by denying such an early institution of the Sabbath, and asserting that it was not appointed till the time of Moses, when the ceremonies were instituted. But the contrary is evident from several texts.

1. From Gen. ii. 3, where we are told before man's fall, or any notice of it, that "God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work." Now, the scripture notion of sanctifying any thing, is to separate and set it apart from common to sacred uses and purposes. And so it is plain from this text, that God from the beginning of the world did sanctify and set apart one day in seven to be observed by all mankind as a day of sacred rest, a day solemnly consecrated to his worship and service. And to lay an obligation on us to observe it, we have God's example of resting this day from all his work set before our eyes. And, seeing God from the beginning of the world had a church in it, who would certainly join together in performing public worship and service to him; they behoved to have set times for it, and consequently a Sabbath. What day so fit for that purpose as the day which God hath sanctified for sacred rest? That this was the ancient practice may be inferred from Gen. iv. 3, 4, where we read of Cain and Abel bringing their offerings to the Lord, which was an instance of public worship. And ver. 3, it is said, "In process of time" they brought offerings, &c. Now these words, "In process of time," may be as well rendered from the Hebrew, "At the end of days," and so it is in the margin of bibles. Now, by "the end of days," must be meant the period of working days, which we call a week; and so it was on the seventh day, when solemn worship was (according to divine institution) to be performed, that men brought their offerings to the Lord. That God's rest on this day was exemplary to all mankind, appears from his taking six several days to perform his works of creation, and the distinct recording of each day's work, and his resting upon the seventh day. Certainly it had been as easy for an almighty power to have made the world in one day as in six. He that said, "Let there be light, let there be a firmament," and it was so, might, if he had pleased, as soon have said, "Let there be a world," and it had been so. And why did he not? Surely for our instruction and imitation, that we in like manner should sanctify every seventh day of our time after six days' labour. And this is given as the reason of the fourth commandment, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy; for in six days God made heaven and earth," &c.

The anti-sabbatarians are much puzzled with the forecited text, Gen. ii. 3. And, to avoid the force of it, contrary to all reason, they would allege that the blessing and sanctifying of the seventh day did not commence immediately from the creation, but only in the days of Moses when the command was given for the Sabbath, Exod. xx., and that Moses only relates this in Gen. ii. by way of anticipation. But this opinion is contrary both to the text and the context; for it is evident to every man that seriously reads them, that Moses relates the sanctification of the Sabbath as a thing done by the Lord immediately after the creation, and nowise as a thing done or to be done by him two thousand years thereafter. For, as soon as he had said that God ended his work and rested on the seventh day, he adds immediately in words of the same tense, "That God blessed the Sabbath-day and sanctified it." And if we compare this place with Exod. xx. 11, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day and hallowed it;" it is manifest that there he brings in God's blessing and sanctifying of the Sabbath, not as an action then first done, but as that which God hath done long before, upon the creation of the world.

2. That this was done from the beginning is further confirmed from Exod. xvi. 16, 22, 23, from whence commentators justly observe, that the sanctification of the Sabbath was a thing known to the Israelites before it was enjoined them by Moses; otherwise there would be a strange abruptness in the introducing of that matter. For, before ever there was any mention of the Sabbath, we find, ver. 22, that the Israelites of their own accord gathered two days' provision of manna on the sixth day of the week, reckoning that the gathering of manna was a servile work, not proper on the Sabbath. But the rulers taking notice of this practice as done, not only without, but in appearance contrary to the orders given them, they bring the matter to Moses that they might know his thoughts of it. Whence it appears that the rulers doubted if the people had done right, seeing Moses had commanded that every man should "gather it according to his eating, and lay up none till the next day," ver. 16, 19, and so they might apprehend that by virtue of this order they might lawfully gather it on the Sabbath also. But not being able to reconcile the seeming clashing of these two commandments, of gathering manna every day, and resting on the seventh day, they come to Moses in a solemn manner for direction in this straitening case. Accordingly, ver. 23, Moses gives them a solution, and approves what the people had done, as agreeable to God's ancient law concerning the Sabbath, Gen. ii., which now was to be renewed and confirmed. "To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord." He saith not, to-morrow shall be the rest, but, to-morrow is the rest; speaking of it as a thing well known to them. Now, if Moses had given them any previous direction about the keeping of the Sabbath, and gathering a double provision of manna, what was the need of all the rulers coming so solemnly to Moses about this case? For it is said, ver. 22, "That all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses." From all which it is clear that the law for the Sabbath was extant, and the observation of it in use, before either the promulgation of the moral law at mount Sinai, or the giving of the ceremonial law, which was sometime afterwards.

3. The first words of the fourth commandment, "Remember to keep holy the Sabbath-day," plainly insinuate the renovation of an old commandment, and not the enacting of a new one. It is highly probable that the observation of this ancient law had been greatly neglected for many years before, while the Israelites were in bondage in Egypt, and obliged to sore labour every day by their task-masters, and so not suffered to keep the Sabbath as before. Hereby, no doubt, the impressions of the duty of keeping it might be much worn off the minds of many; though the memory of the Sabbath was not quite lost, as appears from the people gathering double manna on the sixth day of the week without direction. But, that they might guard against neglecting or forgetting the law for the Sabbath in time coming, the Lord renews the commandment with a solemn memento, "Remember to keep holy the Sabbath-day."

4. Though Moses makes no express mention of the patriarchs observing the Sabbath, it is no wonder, as he writes the history of some thousands of years after the creation in very small bounds; wherein many things relating to the church in that period must certainly be omitted: for the account which Moses gives of those early times is only designed for an introduction to his history of the deliverance, erection, and polity of the nation of the Jews, God's peculiar people, and the only visible church he then had upon the earth. Nevertheless, we have no reason to call in question the patriarchs' observation of the Sabbath from the beginning of the world; but we have good grounds for believing they did it, if we consider the eminent piety of some of them, together with their long lives, by reason whereof it was very easy to hand down the institution of the Sabbath, with others of God's revelations, from Adam to Abraham's days. For Adam's life reached to Methusalem's time; Methusalem's life reached to Shem's time; and Shem's life reached to Abraham. And, being religious men, they would not fail to teach and recommend God's statutes to one another. As for Abraham, the father of the faithful, we read expressly of his commanding his children to keep these statutes, Gen. xviii. 19; and, without doubt, he enjoined the keeping of the Sabbath among the rest. And, though it be not mentioned in so many words, that is no argument against the thing; for we read not of the church's observing of the Sabbath all the time of the Judges, which was nearly five hundred years: yet there is no ground to question but they kept it all that time.

Several things might be added, which make it highly probable, that the institution of the Sabbath was handed down by tradition from Adam to his posterity, through all the world. What reason else can be given for Noah observing the revolution of seven days while in the ark? Gen. viii. 10, 12, where we see him once and again waiting the fall of the waters by sevens. He still let the seventh day of Sabbath be over, before he sent out the next messenger: wisely reckoning, that upon his suitable observation of the Lord's Sabbath, he might look for the more agreeable news to be brought him. What reason else can be given for the heathens dividing their time into weeks, and their weeks into seven days, and their constant holding the septenary number as sacred? Yea, (as Clemens Alexandrinus tells us) the seventh day of the week was still held sacred by the Greeks. All this certainly was conveyed to them by tradition from Adam and Noah, their forefathers; and not learned, to be sure, from the Jews, against whose customs and religion they had such rooted prejudices.

II. A second argument for the morality of the fourth commandment, may be drawn from the situation of it. We find this command placed in the midst of the decalogue, or those moral precepts which God hath delivered to the world, as a perpetual rule of their lives. And is it any way probable, that God would place a ceremonial law, or temporary precept, in the very midst of them? As it is certain that the moral precepts have the preference to the ceremonial in many things; so it is as sure that the fourth commandment, or the sacred observation of one day in seven, hath an equal share with the other nine, in all the dignity and privileges of the moral law. For,

In the 1st. place, this fourth commandment, as well as the rest, was spoken immediately by the voice of God, in the hearing of all the people; whereas the other laws, ceremonial or judicial, were only given unto Moses, and by him declared unto the people.

2d. This command, as well as the rest of the decalogue, was written by the finger of God; nay, twice written by him in tables of stone. Whereby the Lord intended to teach us its fixed continuance and lasting obligation; and that by his Spirit he would have this law written in the fleshly tables of his people's hearts, never to be obliterated. But this was not done with the ceremonial laws, which were only delivered verbally to Moses, and written by him from God's mouth.

3. This command was put and reserved with the rest of the moral law in the ark; whereas the law of ceremonial ordinances was placed in a book without on the side of the ark, and which might be separated from the ark. The moral precepts were laid up within the ark of the covenant, as a sign of their excellency and perpetuity, and of their being inseparable from Christ and his covenant, (of whom the ark was a famous type) therefore saith Christ, Psal. xl. 8, "Thy law is within my heart:" but the ceremonial precepts being without the ark of the covenant, was a token they were separable from it, and to be abolished by Jesus Christ, when the appointed time should come. And, if the law of the Sabbath had been of this nature, to be sure it had been placed on the side of the ark, with the other ceremonial laws, and not lodged within it, together with the moral precepts, which were perpetual and unalterable. Moreover, if situation in the decalogue, among the moral precepts, which were laid up in the ark, be a good argument for the morality of the second commandment, against the Papists, as it is proved against them by Protestant divines, there can be no reason why the same argument should not be fully as conclusive for the fourth commandment against the Anti-sabbatarians.

III. A third argument for the morality of the fourth commandment, may be this. The reasons and grounds of this commandment are, in their nature, moral and perpetual, and as forcible upon Christians as Jews; consequently the commandment itself must be moral also.

The reasons included in the fourth commandment are various.

1. One reason, enforcing the sanctification of the Sabbath, is taken from the propriety of the day, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God;" it is the Lord's day, and the "holy of the Lord," Isa. lviii. 13, the day which the Lord hath reserved for himself and his use, and therefore must be entirely dedicated to him; no man may encroach upon this consecrated time, without the guilt of sacrilege. And doth not this reason bind us as much as the Jews? Have we any power to alienate from God what is his property, more than they had?

2. Another reason is taken from the equity and rationality of this precept. God is good and liberal to us, in giving us six days for our works: wherefore it is highly reasonable and just, that we should give him one day for his worship. It aggravated David's sin, that he took the poor man's darling ewe-lamb, when he had a whole flock of his own: as it did our first parents' fault in pulling the fruit of one tree that God had reserved, when he gave them all the rest of the trees at their will; so it heightens our crime, if we rob God of his one day, when he gives us no less than six to ourselves. Moreover, it is highly reasonable and fit, when our dying bodies have six days for their necessities and occasions, that our immortal souls should have one for theirs. Now, doth not the equity and justice of this commandment affect and oblige us as much as it doth the Jews?

3. A third reason is taken from the charitableness of this law; viz. That our bodies and cattle should have a day allowed them for rest; charity saith, that they should have some ease and relaxation from sore labour, and not be wearied out with continual toil: and is not this as needful now as it was of old among the Jews?

4. Another reason is drawn from God's example, which is a rule to us: "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is; and rested the seventh day." Here we have a twofold example, both of God's resting and working; and they are both set before us for our imitation. As God employed six days in the works of creation; so we are to make use of six days in the works of our lawful calling: and as he ceased from his works and rested on the seventh day, so we are bound to imitate him in that respect, by quitting our weekly labours, and sanctifying of the Sabbath day. Now, can there any reason be given, why we are not as much bound to follow God's example, in resting one day after six days' labour, as the Jews were?

A fifth is taken from the blessed advantages of it; it is a blessed day to them that keep it. And, is not God as able and willing to bless the Sabbath to us now as he was of old? And do not we need his blessing as much as the Jews?

Now, if these arguments be moral, perpetual, and obligatory to us, as much as to the Jews; the commandment that is enforced by them must be so likewise.

IV. A fourth argument may be taken from the special marks of honour and respect that God puts on this commandment. It is not only engraven in tables of stone by the immediate finger of God, as all the rest; but it is privileged above them in several respects.

1. It is placed in the first table of the law, and thereby is preferable to those of the second table.

2. It is situated in the midst of the decalogue, in the close of the first table, and before the front of the second table; thereby teaching us, that the observation of both tables much depends on the right keeping of this one commandment. God hath placed it in the heart of the ten commandments, because the keeping of it gives life to the keeping of all the rest. The sanctification of the Sabbath is an epitome of all religion; it virtually includes all the commandments, and strongly engages men to keep them all. Hence it was, when the Israelites broke the fourth command ment by gathering manna, that the Lord charges them with breaking all the commandments, Exod. xvi. 28, "How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?" Why so? Because he that makes no conscience of keeping the Sabbath, will not much stick to break any of the rest.

3. It hath a solemn memento prefixed to it, which the rest have not; God ushers it in with a remember, which is very emphatic, and is as if he had said, "Keep this command always in your minds: forget what you will, forget not this." God speaks, as a master that had some special affair, among many others, to recommend to his servant. Among all other injunctions, he bids him particularly remember such an affair; thereby showing a special concern for it, more than the rest.

4. It is delivered both positively and negatively. All the rest of the commandments are delivered only one of the ways, but this is both ways. It is not only said positively, "Remember the Sabbath to keep it holy;" but also negatively, "In it thou shalt do no manner of work," &c.

5. The Lord presseth obedience to this command with more reasons and arguments than any of the rest which were enumerated before. And this he doth, because he knew the conscientious observing of this commandment would engage us to make conscience of all the rest, and because he foresaw wicked men would attack it, and reason against it more than any of the rest. Now, is it probable that God would show such a concern for a ceremonial law, that he would place it in the middle of the moral precepts, and press it with more reasons and arguments than any of them?

6. He makes the keeping of this commandment, and sanctifying of the Sabbath, one special end of man's creation; because therein God is highly glorified. The Jewish Talmud propounds the question, "Why God made man on the evening before the Sabbath?" and gives this one reason, that man might forthwith enter upon the observation of the commandment to keep the Sabbath, and begin his life with the worship of God, which was the chief end why it was given him, as if the keeping the Sabbath were the great end of his creation. And indeed there is solid reason for this assertion, if we consider that, as the end of the Sabbath day is to commemorate God's glorious works, and celebrate his praises for the same, so the chief end and design of man, whom God made on the sixth day, as his last and most consummate work of all, was, that he might be the tongue of the whole creation, to trumpet forth his praises for all the rest of his works. And accordingly, just on the back of his creation, he entered upon the keeping of a Sabbath for that very end. So it may well be said, that God made man chiefly for this end, to keep the Sabbath day.

7. The Lord entails many special blessings upon the keeping of this commandment, and denounces many sad threatenings against the breaking of it. Read the 56th chapter of Isaiah throughout, where the Lord not only pronounceth him blessed that keeps the Sabbath, but promises to "give him a place and a name better than of sons and daughters," to fill his heart with "spiritual joy," to give him a "spirit of prayer," and to "hear his prayer." God will both give him ability to serve him, and then accept and reward his service when it is done. Also read Isa. lviii. 14: Jer. xvii. 24, where blessings, both spiritual and temporal, peace, wealth, plenty, and prosperity, are promised to such as keep the Sabbath. On the other hand, how terrible are the plagues he threatens against a land or people for breaking this commandment. Read Jer. xvii. 27; Eze. xx. 21—26.

8. He hath severely punished sinners for the breach of this commandment, as if it were the sum of his whole service. He caused a man to be put to a cruel death for "gathering sticks on the Sabbath," Numb. xv. The offence might be thought small, but God looks on the contempt of the Sabbath as an affront to the Creator who instituted it, and to whose honour it was dedicated; and an incursion upon the whole law, about which God appointed the Sabbath for a hedge. It was the slighting of the Lord's Sabbaths that caused Jerusalem to be burnt with fire, Jer. xvii. 27. Many instances of judgments against Sabbath-breakers might also be brought from human histories.

V. A fifth argument may be taken from the prophecies of the Old Testament. We find Isaiah, that evangelical prophet, pronouncing a blessing on those that should keep the Sabbath, even in evangelical times, Isa. lvi. 1, 2. "Thus saith the Lord, keep ye judgment, and do justice; for my salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed. Blessed is the man that doth this—that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it." That is a plain prophecy of Christ; yet in his times he declares them blessed who should keep the Sabbath; yea, verse 6, he puts "the keeping of the Sabbath" in a manner for the whole duties of the covenant. That this evangelical prophet is speaking there of the New Testament times, there is no ground left to doubt; for he is speaking of the time when the stranger and eunuch should be joined to the Lord, and when there should be no distinction of persons, Jews or Gentiles, but both should be alike welcome to God and his ordinances. And yet, in these times, there are many blessings promised to them that should keep the Sabbath; which demonstrates it to be a moral and perpetually binding duty.

VI. Christ himself plainly tells us, "That he came not to destroy (or abrogate any part of) the moral law, but to fulfil it," severely threatening these who would seek to invalidate the obligation of the least of these commandments, Mat. v. 17—19; and, in confirmation hereof, he bids Christians "pray that their flight might not be on the Sabbath-day," Mat. xxiv. 10. Now, the flight he there speaks of was to happen in Vespasian's time, about forty years after all ceremonies were abolished, together with the Jewish Sabbath, as I showed before; and yet we see Christ plainly enough homologates the morality and perpetual obligation of the law for the Sabbath under the New Testament: for he still supposes that a Sabbath would be in being and in force after all the ceremonies were abolished; and therefore he warns his disciples, and in them all Christians to the end of the world, to make it a petition in their prayers, upon any approaching calamity, to be delivered from the necessity of fleeing upon the day when the duties of the Sabbath should be observed; seeing it is no small aggravation of our distress to be forced to flee and travel on God's holy day, when we should be employed in attending the solemn ordinances of his worship, and enjoying communion with God therein.

VII. A seventh argument may be taken from the absurdities that would follow upon the denying the morality of this commandment. For then,

1. There would be but nine commandments in the moral law, which is directly contrary to scripture; for we are told that there are ten in it, Deut. x. 4, "And he wrote on the tables, according to the first writing, the ten commandments, which the Lord spake out of the midst of the fire," &c.

2. It would open a door for atheism and immorality, and tend to cast loose the whole moral law. For, if we yield that the fourth commandment is not moral, but ceremonial, why may not some in the next place rise up and say, the second and fifth are not moral either? and so on, concerning the rest. But the Lord having written the whole moral law in tables of stone, and the fourth commandment in the midst thereof, doth teach us thereby that the whole of it should be indelibly written in our hearts, and that the obligation of it, and of this commandment among the rest, can never be extinguished.

Lastly, The universal church have still held the commandment of the Sabbath to be moral, and of perpetual obligation, and that the seventh day of our time should be consecrated unto the Lord. The constant practice of all true Christians, since the apostles' times, in observing a weekly Sabbath, is a great confirmation of this truth; especially if we consider that the judgment and practice of the Catholic church have been so uniform, constant, and uninterrupted in this matter, that we do not find so much as one heretic, or person of any sort in ancient times, that ever presumed to oppose or contradict this doctrine.

And as the foresaid universal consent evidences this truth or law to be of divine institution, so it proves it to be a dictate of the law of nature and sound reason, that one day of the week should be dedicated to the worship and service of God. Yea, so strong is the light hereof, that those who have apostatized from the true religion, and have taken up with the vilest of superstitions, have still found it necessary to fix upon a certain day of the week for the performing of solemn worship; and so the Mahometans have chosen Friday for this end, and the Parthians observed Tuesday. For it is evident to every rational man, that the religious observation of a weekly Sabbath is the greatest preservative of a solemn profession of religion in the world. Take away from amongst men all conscience of observing a stated day of sacred rest to God for the celebration of his worship in assemblies, and all religion will quickly decay, if not come to nothing, in the world. And it is to be observed, that, wherever religion flourisheth in the power of it, there we find most conscience made in the observation of the Sabbath.

QUEST. V. If the fourth commandment be moral and perpetual, how then could the Sabbath be changed from the last to the first day of the week, as we see it done?

Ans. The precise day of the week for the Sabbath not being of the essence of the fourth commandment, but only an alterable circumstance in it, the actual alteration thereof under the New Testament is no more against the morality of the fourth commandment, than the change of the outward ordinances and means of worship under the gospel is against the morality of the second commandment. That the keeping of the precise seventh day of the week is distinct from the scope and substance of the fourth commandment, which is only to institute one day in seven for the Sabbath, is pretty evident from the commandment itself, both in the first and last words of it. The first words, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy," contain the whole substance of the commandment. The last words, "Wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it," contain the formal reason of the commandment; and in neither of these is the seventh day of the week spoken of, which notifies to us, that the observation of that precise day is not essential to the moral and standing law of the Sabbath, but separable from it. If it be said that the commandment enforces the observation of this day from God's example in resting upon it, I answer, that a seventh day's rest after six days' labour is all the conformity which the fourth commandment requires of us to the example of God, that is, any seventh day he pleaseth to appoint.

Moreover, our natural reason argueth for what is above asserted. For though the Jews, who lived in the land of Palestine, might possibly have observed the precise seventh day from the creation; yet the joint observation of that precise time was impossible to all others whom the fourth commandment doth concern, because of the difference of the climate where they live, which makes it night to many of them when it is day to the Jews. Again, the computation of our time by weeks, consisting of seven days, each of twenty-four hours' length, was so interrupted in the time of Joshua and Hezekiah by the prodigious lengthening out of some days, that I cannot see how the precise seventh day could possibly be morally or perpetually binding. From all which I infer, that the change of the day by instituting the Lord's day or first day Sabbath, in room of the seventh day Sabbath, doth nowise repeal or infringe the morality and substance of the fourth commandment.

Several proper questions may be moved upon this head.

QUEST. 1. By what authority came the day for the Sabbath to be changed?

ANS. By the same authority that first appointed the Sabbath, I mean that of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is true God, "the Lord of the Sabbath," and sovereign Head of his church.

There are, indeed, some differences among divines about this matter; some holding this change to have been made immediately by Christ himself, others that it was made by the apostles. But both opinions come to one thing, and equally establish the divine authority of the Lord's day; seeing the apostles were divinely inspired, and infallibly guided by Christ's Spirit in their ecclesiastical determinations, delivering nothing to be constantly observed in God's worship, but what they had the Lord's authority for, according to 1 Cor. xi. 23.

Athanasius plainly affirms that the change was made by the Lord himself; and indeed it is more than probable, that during Christ's forty days' stay on earth after his resurrection, wherein he continued instructing his disciples of the things relating to the gospel-church, "and giving his commandments to his apostles," Acts i. 2, 3, he among other things, appointed this change, leaving it upon his apostles to make promulgation of it to the world after his ascension; and especially at Pentecost, at the extraordinary effusion of the Spirit on that day, whereby he publicly confirmed this change.

When the sacred penman of the book of the Acts tells us, that Christ continued for so many days' space after his resurrection, to speak to his apostles "of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God," that is, the gospel-church, he surely hath a special respect to the instructions he gave them concerning the ordinances and institutions of the Christian church. And as he instructed them how they should change the carnal sacrifices of beasts into the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise, the sacrament of circumcision into that of baptism, and the sacrament of the passover into that of the Lord's supper; so likewise he instructed them how to change the seventh-day Sabbath into that of the Lord's day. All the primitive fathers are very positive concerning the divine authority of this change. Ignatius, who lived in the first century, saith (in his Epist.) concerning the Lord's day, "Every lover of Christ celebrates the Lord's day as the queen and chief of all days." August. Sermon. 151, On Time, saith, "The apostles appointed that the Lord's day should be kept with religious solemnity, because our Redeemer arose from the dead; and therefore it is called (Dominicus) the Lord's day."

QUEST. 2. If it be asked, What was the necessity of this change? I answer, it was necessary,

1. To manifest Christ's glory and equality with the Father; for Christ saith, "That men shall honour the Son as they honour the Father," John v. 23. Wherefore, as they honoured the Father with a Sabbath upon account of his rest from creation, so it was fit they should honour the Son with a Sabbath upon account of his rest from redemption, which was a far more glorious work. And therefore, in honour of the Son, the Christian Sabbath is by the Spirit of God called the Lord's day.

2. The change of the day was necessary to manifest Christ's headship over his church, and that he is the sovereign Lord over his own house, worship, and ordinances; and particularly that he is "Lord of the Sabbath," which title he had assumed before, in Mark ii. 28. And accordingly he would have this convincingly displayed to the world, by showing that he is able to change the day of his solemn worship.

3. Since he hath thought fit to appoint a new manner of his worship, it was meet to appoint a new time of it also. The Levitical service and ceremonial worship of the Sabbath-day being changed, it was proper the day of the Sabbath should be changed also, to show the more clearly the expiration of that worship, and to induce the Jews the more easily to lay it aside, and keep Christians the more from judaizing.

4. There were some things in the observation of the seventh-day Sabbath peculiar to the Israelites, that belonged properly to that nation, and not to others: as, 1. God designed it to be a signal or mark for distinguishing that people from the rest of the world; therefore he calls the keeping of this day "a sign betwixt him and the children of Israel, throughout their generations," Exod. xxxi. 13, 17, that is, a sign they were God's covenanted people, a nation that stood in a peculiar relation to God above all others in the world. But this relation coming at length to be altered, it was fit the sign should be also changed. 2. When God revived the institution of the Sabbath to the Jewish nation, he enjoined them to keep it in memory of their deliverance from Egypt, as well as the creation of the world; for it is very observable in Dent. v., when Moses called the Israelites together in a solemn manner to put them in mind of the covenant God had made with them in Horeb, he repeats the ten commandments to them. But, in repeating of the fourth, he leaves out the argument for keeping the Sabbath, taken from God's creating of the world in six days and resting the seventh; and, in the room of it, puts in their miraculous deliverance from Egypt. For, in the close of the fourth commandment, he says, Dent. v. 15, "Remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God brought thee out thence, through a mighty hand and by a stretched-out arm; therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath-day." And hence some think, that it was not precisely the seventh day from the creation that was appointed for the Jewish Sabbath, but the seventh day from their deliverance from Egypt. Lastly, This day was also appointed them to call to mind their wonderful deliverance at the Red sea, which several learned writers are of opinion was wrought for them on the morning of the Jewish Sabbath, and seems very probable from Exod. xii. 15—17; and hence they are enjoined to rest and cease from their labour on this day in remembrance of their being miraculously rescued on it from Egypt, and of their resting from the cruel bondage thereof. From all which it appears that there was something in this commandment peculiar to the Jewish nation, and which belonged not to others. And whence I may well infer, that if the deliverance by Moses from Egypt and the Red sea was a good reason for the Sabbath of the Jews, surely the eternal redemption by Christ from sin and hell is a much stronger and better reason for the Sabbath of the Christians.

5. In the commandment for the seventh-day Sabbath, there were some things typical and mystical, peculiar to the Old Testament times, and which were to be fulfilled in the Messiah and gospel times; and therefore to be abolished. 1st. The seventh-day Sabbath represented Christ, who is the only rest, centre, and satisfaction of our souls; therefore the apostle tells us, Col. ii. 17, that the Sabbath "was a shadow of things to come but the body is of Christ," that is, he is the substance which this shadow or type represented. 2d. It signified the great Sabbath of the New Testament, or the happy times of the gospel, wherein the faithful were to rest from the servile rites and burdensome ceremonies of the law. 3d. The seventh-day Sabbath being a "shadow of things to come," typified the believer's rest and deliverance by Jesus Christ from the bondage of sin, being brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God. 4th. The Jewish Sabbath, with its ceremonial and typical worship under the law, shadowed forth the Christian Sabbath with its pure and spiritual worship under the gospel, and so is expired. 5th. The rest of the seventh-day Sabbath was a type and shadow of Christ's resting upon that day in the grave, and therefore could not be continued after his resurrection more than any of the other types fulfilled in Christ. Our Saviour, by choosing to lie buried throughout this day in the grave, did thereby bury the Jewish seventh-day Sabbath with the rest of their types and shadows. Hence it is that the apostle Paul, Col. ii. 16, 17, expressly numbers the Sabbath among the Old Testament shadows that ceased upon their being accomplished in Christ, the substance and antitype, who came in place of all the legal shadows. Now, it being evident from the foresaid text, that the Jewish Sabbath was abrogated by Christ's death and resurrection, it is necessary to believe that either Christ, by himself or his apostles, appointed another day in lieu thereof for the solemn worship of God; otherwise the state of the Christian church, under the New Testament, would be far worse than that of the Jews under the Old, which is absurd. 6th. The two ages, before and after Christ, are reckoned as two diverse worlds, Heb. ii. 5, wherefore as, when the first world was made by creation, there was a day set apart in memory thereof; so, when the world was renewed by redemption, it was fit there should be a day kept in honour and memory of that great work. For, if the perfecting the work of the first creation deserved to have a day set apart for celebrating the power and glory of the Author, much more doth the finishing the new creation or restoration of the world deserve a day to be consecrated for the commemorating of that, as the glorious attributes of God shine far more brightly in this than in the other.

QUEST. III. If it be asked, Why was the Sabbath changed to the first day of the week?

I answer, For many reasons.

I. The great reason for observing the last day of the week doth plead more strongly now for the observation of the first day of the week. The reason for observing the seventh day was, because the Lord rested that day from the great work he had made, viz. of creation, which ought to be remembered with thankfulness and praise. Now, when God gave the ten commandments, there was no greater work in the world than the creation; and therefore it was fit that the day of God's rest from his greatest work should be the Sabbath or day of rest to the world. But, should God thereafter work a greater work than creating heaven and earth, then, by parity of reason, and even by virtue of the fourth commandment, the day of God's rest from that should be the Sabbath of the world. Now, the work of redemption which the Lord perfected, and rested from on the first day of the week, is far greater than the work of creation, it doth even eclipse and swallow it up, as the temple did the tabernacle. It is far more valued and esteemed by God the Author, and ought to be far more regarded and remembered by us on many accounts.

1. In regard, that in the world's redemption there is a far more glorious display of the divine attributes, God's power, wisdom, justice, goodness, &c. than in the world's creation.

2. It is much more for our benefit and comfort than the work of creation: we could have had no comfort without it; for the whole creation groaned under the burden of sin, and, by reason thereof, all the creatures were at enmity with us. Without redemption what pleasure can we take in our creation, since by it we are made capable only of everlasting misery and destruction? Alas! there are no comforts in being creatures, if we be not made new creatures; and there is no doing of that but by this new and glorious method.

3. As the second creation was a work of far greater difficulty and expense than the first. The first was finished by the word of his mouth, but the second could not be perfected but by the blood and death of his dear Son. The first was finished in six days; but it cost the Son of God above thirty-three years painful travail and suffering in the world to effectuate the second. In the first there was no opposition: for since the world was made out of nothing, there was nothing to make resistance to the Creator; but in the second creation, or redemption of the world, there was a formidable opposition made by justice, men, and devils. It was wonderful for the glorious fabric of heaven and earth to be made out of nothing; but much more for the Maker of all things to be made of a woman, Jesus Christ to be born of his own creature. In the first creation God made us like himself; but here the Lord makes himself like us. The glorious Creator is made a creature, yea, made sin, made a curse to save man, his sinful creature, from the curse. We may indeed say, "We are fearfully and wonderfully made;" but much more are we fearfully and wonderfully redeemed. Creation was the work of God's fingers, Psal. viii. 3; but redemption the work of his arm, Luke i. 51. We use the strength of the arm to effectuate what the fingers cannot do. So that we see it is a far greater work and miracle to bring us back from hell, than to bring us from nothing; to make us saints, than to make us men and women. Well then, if God's resting from his work of creation on the seventh day determined mankind to keep this day for a Sabbath in a thankful remembrance thereof, much more should God incarnate's raising a new world at a far greater charge, and resting from his labour of love on the first day of the week, determine us to observe that day for a Sabbath in an adoring remembrance of his infinite glory and goodness displayed in this stupendous work.

4. The Lord himself delights and rejoices much more in the new creation than in the old, his glory being more conspicuous by the one than by the other; and that which is esteemed and preferred by him ought to be so by us. The Lord indeed took pleasure in the review of his works in the first creation, when he at first rested from the same; but these being afterwards all corrupted and deformed by sin, his complacency therein was exceedingly diminished. Hence, Gen. vi., it is said, "It repented him he had made man." Wherefore it was proper and necessary to transfer the Sabbath to the day of the world's new creation or redemption, effected and completed by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, the world's Redeemer, in which day the Lord rested from these his more glorious works, delighting himself in the review thereof with an everlasting complacency.

Lastly, To confirm what is said, let it be observed, that God so far preferred the work of redemption to that of creation, that he changed the beginning of the year (as Dr. Lightfoot remarks on Exod. xiii.) from the time of the world's creation to the time of the passover, and the Israelites' deliverance from Egypt by Moses, as being an eminent type of our redemption from sin and hell by Jesus Christ. We have reason to believe, that, from the creation of the world, the year began in September, at the time of the autumnal equinox; for we find the fruits were on the trees at the creation, Gen. i. 12. But when God instituted the first passover, which immediately ushered in the Israelites' deliverance from Egypt, which was in March at the vernal equinox, he changed the beginning of the year, and ordered it to commence from that time, Exod. xii. 2, "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months, it shall be the first month of the year to you." Now, if the beginning of the year was changed upon the account of the type, a day might well be changed upon the account of the antitype. If the month of the figurative redemption was so remarkable that the month of the world's creation must give place to it; then surely the substance itself, when it appeared, might well be the cause of the change of a day, and the seventh day of the creation give place to the first day of the finishing of our redemption.

II. Since there was a necessity for changing the Sabbath from the seventh day of the week; as is already proved; it could be into no other day so fitly as the first day of the week, on several accounts.

1. Because of its answering the intent of the commandment better than another day. For if the Sabbath had been changed into the second, third, fourth, or any other day of the week than the first, the morality of the fourth commandment had been infringed. For so God would not have had one day, and man six working days' together of one and the same week, as the commandment requires. But now it holds in a constant course. God hath his one day, and we our six together in one and the same week; as it was from the beginning. And, by this wise alteration, there was never a week without a Sabbath, and never a week had two Sabbaths. For as the week ended with the Jews' Sabbath, so the next week began with the Christian Sabbath; which could not have been, if any other seventh day had been chosen.

2. Since there behoved to be a change, it was very agreeable to reason to begin the week with God, and that our Creator and Benefactor should be first served, and have his portion of the week assigned to him in the first place, that his worship might have the preference to our labour; and also, that our consecrating the first fruits of the week to God might in a manner sanctify the whole, obtain his blessing on the week's labour, and make all our works therein the more acceptable to him.

3. The first day of the week is the fittest for keeping up the memory both of the first and second creation of the world. For it being a day of rest always succeeding our six days' labour, puts us in mind of God's finishing the works of creation in six days' space, and resting the seventh. And especially, it being the first day of the week, serves to remind us of the beginning of the world, and of its first creation; seeing it was on this day that God began his glorious work, saying, "Let there be light." But in a special manner, this day serves to perpetuate the memorial of this greater blessing of the world's new creation or redemption by Jesus Christ; since on it he finished this work by his resurrection. It was on this day that not only that temporal and perishing light did first shine at the first creation;—but also that eternal and heavenly light brake out in a meridian splendour, the Sun of righteousness arose from a dark grave, and shone on a dark world, and brought light, life, peace, healing, and all mercies under his wings.

4. It is the fittest day for celebrating the honour and memory of all the persons of the glorious Trinity; for though Jesus Christ the second person of the Trinity be honoured by this day in a peculiar manner upon account of his glorious rest from the work of redemption; yet the Father and Holy Ghost are remarkably honoured also. The Father did not only begin this day to create, but he was the glorious contriver of our happiness, and sent his Son to carry on that blessed work of redemption which was this day happily completed. Also, the Holy Ghost is honoured, since he gloriously descended at Pentecost on this day for fitting and furnishing the apostles for the work of the gospel: and he is the blessed applier of the redemption finished by Jesus Christ, and is in a more especial manner at work this day in making saving application of it unto elect souls by the preaching of the gospel.

III. The Sabbath is changed to the first day of the week because it is the most honourable and glorious day to Christ and his church that ever dawned upon the world: the most honourable day to our Redeemer, and the most joyful to the redeemed; and therefore ought to be kept in perpetual remembrance.

Hence, by the Spirit of God, and ever since Christ's resurrection, it is called the Lord's day, it being the most glorious day ever he had. It was in an eminent manner his birth-day, for in it he was born from the dead; in it God solemnly owned him to be his only-begotten Son; hence that word in Psal. ii., "Thou art my Son, this day I have begotten thee," is applied to the day of his resurrection, Acts xiii. 13. "He was this day declared to be the Son of God with power," Rom. i. 4. For, at his rising, he made the earth to shake, the graves to open, the stones to roll away, the dead to rise and appear, the soldiers to tremble and flee, and both saints and angels to come and attend him. And was not this a triumphant day to him? Yea, on this day he conquered the grave, death, and hell, and showed himself to be the Captain of our salvation, triumphing over his and our enemies. His birth and death showed him to be truly man, but his resurrection manifested him to be truly God, and the great Redeemer of the world. Hereby he gave full proof that he had completely finished the work of our redemption, paid the elect's debt, satisfied divine justice, cancelled our bond, and obtained an ample discharge, since he, as our great Cautioner, was now let out of prison. Was not this then a joyful day, a day to be had in everlasting remembrance? The day Jonas came safe out of the whale's belly; the day Samson carried away the gates of Gaza. Now it was that death lost its sting; now the grave and hell lost their purchase; now the serpent's head was bruised; now were they all swallowed up in victory; now it was that our glorious Redeemer rested from all the works of suffering and redemption, and rejoiced in the review thereof, with infinite complacency. And ought not we, who are so much concerned, cheerfully to rest this day with Christ, in a thankful remembrance of all he hath done?

IV. This day was prophesied of long before, Psal. cxviii. 24. "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it." The greater number of expositors understand this day of our Christian Sabbath, and of Christ's resurrection thereon; for here plainly there is a prophecy of Christ, and of a remarkable day whereat the world should wonder, and the church rejoice. "This is the day which the Lord hath made," that is, of which God is author. He made it, not by creation only, as he made all days; but by consecration, designing and appointing it for a peculiar end, even for that strange and wonderful work of Christ's resurrection from the grave, when he obtained his glorious victory, and our gracious deliverance from hell and destruction. Again, he made it, that is (as the word from the original may be rendered) exalted it. This is the day which the Lord hath honoured and exalted above its fellows, above the seventh, or any other day of the week, because of the incomparable work of this day. That the day prophesied of, in that place, is some remarkable day of the Messiah, is very clear, if we consider the context, and the two preceding verses of this Psalm; by which it plainly appears, that the day there spoken of is the day wherein "the stone rejected by the builders," (that is Christ, who was rejected by the elders, scribes, and pharisees, the pretended builders) became "the head of the corner." Now what day was this, but his "resurrection-day?" in which God, by raising him from the dead, gloriously exalted him above all his enemies, rolled away his reproach, made him "Head of the corner," and Head of the church, by openly declaring him to be his "Son with power," and that to the terror and confusion of all his enemies, and the joy and gladness of all his friends. And to put it beyond doubt that this is the meaning of the place, see it particularly applied by Peter, before the Jewish Sanhedrim, Acts iv. 11, 12, "Be it known to you, that this Jesus Christ whom ye crucified, God hath raised from the dead:" and therefore he subjoins, verse 12, "This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, which is become the head of the corner." Now, this being such a memorable day, the psalmist's direction is, that all Christians should rejoice and be glad in it; which indeed is a most proper duty on our Christian Sabbath.

Again we have another prophecy concerning this day, in Isa. xi. 10, "And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek, and his rest shall be glorious." Now, what was that special day, wherein Christ was raised and exalted for an ensign, to invite and engage the nations to flee to him as their Redeemer? Was it not his resurrection day, on which he was declared to the world to be "the Son of God with power?" Rom. i. 4. This is the day then on which his rest was glorious. For as God the Father's "rest from the work of creation was glorious," and had great glory and honour put on it, by the world's keeping a Sabbath for about four thousand years thereupon; so God the Son's "rest from the work of redemption" was to have great glory and honour put upon it, by the Christian world's observing a weekly Sabbath on it, to the end of time.

And was it not a glorious rest which the Son of God had on the first day of the week, from his great and stupendous work, when he had laid the foundations of the new heavens and new earth, and had given the finishing stroke to a new creation; when all "the stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?" It was on this day the Son of God rested from his works, "and was refreshed," as it is said of God, Exod. xxxi. 17, with respect to his resting from the works of the first creation. Now, as God's rest from his works on the seventh day, and his being refreshed therein, was a sufficient indication of the precise day of rest which he would have observed by the world under the old dispensation of the covenant; so the rest of our Lord Jesus Christ from his works on the first day of the week, and his being refreshed therein, is a sufficient indication of the precise day of rest which he would have observed under the dispensation of the new covenant. And accordingly, upon this indication, we immediately find the disciples assembling themselves together upon this day of their Redeemer's rest; and no sooner are they met, but Christ comes and graciously meets with them, solemnly blesses them, and gives them the Holy Ghost, John xx. 19, from which time forward the first day of the week was never without its solemn assemblies.

Moreover, we have the apostle to the Hebrews expressly confirming the foresaid prophecies concerning Christ's rest upon the first day of the week, by telling us, that under the gospel "there remained a rest for the people of God," Heb. iv. 9. Now if this place be duly considered, and rightly understood, it will mightily confirm the change of the Sabbath from the last to the first day of the week. For the word, which is there rendered rest, should be rendered a Sabbatism, or Sabbath-keeping, and so the meaning is, (according to Dr. Owen and other learned commentators) "There remaineth a Sabbath-keeping for the people of God, under the New Testament, as well as under the Old." And this (as the apostle showed in the context) behoved necessarily to be a new Sabbatism, as it hath a new foundation, in correspondence to the foundation of the old Sabbatism mentioned verse 4, of that chapter, "For he spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all his works." Well (saith the apostle) the new Sabbatism hath the like foundation, verse 10, "For he (Jesus Christ) that is entered into his rest, hath also ceased from his own works, as God did from his." Now it was on the morning of the first day of the week that Christ entered into his mediatory rest from his works of redemption, as God on the seventh day entered into his rest from the work of creation. And as God, by his resting on the seventh day, did determine that day for a sacred sabbatical rest under the Old Testament; so Christ (who is the Lord of the Sabbath) by his entering into his rest on the first day, did determine that day of the week for a sacred Sabbatism under the New Testament. The ceasing from his works, as God did from his, mentioned ver. 10, can never properly be applied (as some do) to the believer, but to Christ's ceasing from his works of redemption; seeing it is absurd to make our ceasing from the vile works of sin, a parallel to God's ceasing from his glorious works of creation. And it cannot be meant of ceasing from the works of duty and service to God; for, to all eternity, believers never cease from these, Rev. xxii. 3.

V. Our Lord Jesus Christ hath put honour upon the first day of the week, and authorised the observation of it by his own example and practice, which hath the force of a law to us. It was on this day he met with the two disciples going to Emmaus, opened the scriptures to them, and was made known to them in the breaking of bread, Luke xxiv. 13. Likewise upon the same day he appeared to the eleven, when gathered together, and others with them, showed them his pierced hands and feet, comforted them, and opened their understandings that they might understand the scriptures, Luke xxiv. 33, 36, 40, 45. It was on this day that Christ came to his disciples, (being all convened together except Thomas) gave them his peace and blessed them, and also gave them their commission and the Holy Ghost, John xx. 16, 20, &c. Again, upon that day eight days, being the next first day of the week, when the disciples were assembled together, and Thomas with them, John xx. 26, Christ chose to appear unto them, and graciously convinced Thomas by the discovery of his wounds. Though Christ, after his resurrection, met with several of his disciples upon other days of the week, yet on the first day only (which is therefore expressly recorded) did he appear to them when assembled together; and therefore we see how he left Thomas a whole week under his unbelief and doubtings, till the next Lord's day or first day of the week should come, that he might have occasion graciously to release him in the assembly of his disciples, for their common edification and comfort. The first day of the week is the only day of the week, or month, or year, that is ever mentioned by number in all the New Testament; and wherever it is spoken of, we hear of the religious observation of it, by the disciples assembling together. And why are we told by the evangelists so expressly, and so often, of Christ's making his visits to his disciples upon the first day of the week? but to show us, that Christ put a particular honour and respect upon this day, and thereby gave us a plain intimation of his will, that it should be observed in his church, as the Christian Sabbath, or the weekly day of holy rest and holy convocations. That one day in seven should be religiously observed in this manner, was a law from the beginning, and that as old as the state of innocence (as I showed before). But that; in the kingdom of the Messiah, the first day of the week should be that solemn day; this was indication enough, that Christ on that day once and again met his disciples in a religious assembly. And it is highly probable, that at his first meeting with them, he appointed them that day eight days to be together again, promising to meet them; for we find them more completely convened that day than the former, John xx. 26, "And after eight days, again his disciples were within, and Thomas with them," as it would seem waiting for Christ's coming. And many are of opinion, that he thus continued to meet with them every first day of the week, till his ascension, "speaking to them the things pertaining to the kingdom of God," Acts i. 2.

Christ's meeting with them that day was not merely occasional, but designed; as appears by the express mentioning of the first day of the week so oft as he met them. For, when Christ met with his disciples on any other day of the week, we are not told what day it was, whether the second, third or fourth day of the week; but when he meets with them on the first day, the Holy Ghost names and records that, thereby subscribing something peculiar to it above all the rest.

VI. The observation of the first day of the week is also authorised by the divinely inspired apostles of Christ, and founders of the Christian church, and that both by their example and direction. We have them both directing and performing the duties of the Sabbath on this day, and also asserting Christ's propriety in it as his; all which is evident from scripture.

In the forecited passages, where we read of Christ's appearances to his disciples, we also read of their assembling together on the first day of the week several times; which certainly was for the public worship of God, and in honour of this day. For, when they met on other days of the week, it is not told what these were; but, when they met on the first day of the week, the Holy Ghost records that; which shows it to be a remarkable day in itself, and observed as such by the disciples of Christ, and that in a religious way.

But, besides these, I shall adduce four other passages, that clearly demonstrate what is above asserted.

The first is, Acts ii. 1, 2, where it is recorded, that "the apostles and other brethren were met altogether on the day of Pentecost in one place." This meeting was for public worship on the first day of the week, according to their wonted practice. It was not in the temple with the Jews, but in a house in Jerusalem by themselves.

QUEST. How prove you that it was on the first day of the week?

ANS. Because it is evident from scripture, that the passover that year fell on the Jewish Sabbath; and Pentecost being still the fiftieth day after the passover, it consequently fell that year on the first day of the week, or the Lord's day. Pentecost is a Greek word, signifying the fiftieth, called so because of its being still the fiftieth day after the passover, a Jewish feast, which fell sometimes upon one day of the week, and sometimes on another; but this year it fell on the last or seventh day of the week. Pentecost was another feast of the Jews, but kept in remembrance of God's giving the law that day on mount Sinai, being the fiftieth day after their eating the passover and coming out of Egypt. And consequently, Pentecost falling this year upon the first day of the week, our Lord's resurrection-day, the apostles, and brethren, assembled for celebrating this day by public worship. Now, let us observe how remarkably God confirmed their keeping of the first day of the week, and blessed their meeting together upon it for worship: he even sent down that extraordinary effusion of the Holy Ghost upon them, for fitting and furnishing them for the extraordinary work of planting the Christian church, and converting the world. This was a solemn approbation of the Christian Sabbath, and a seal to its institution from heaven, which confirmed all Christians in the celebrating of this day for the future. And many times have they experienced the gracious effusions of the Spirit on their public assemblies this day since that time. It is observed by Grotius, upon Exod. xix. 1, that it was on the first day of the week that the law was given in its fearful promulgation from mount Sinai. But though God made that in some respect a terrible day to them, yet he makes it weekly a joyful day to us, by the comfortable promulgation of the gospel thereupon from mount Zion.

A second passage is, Acts xx. 7, "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached to them," &c. Whence it is plain that the first day of the week was then the stated time for Christians meeting together, for the preaching of the word, and celebrating of the Lord's supper; for this is recorded as their customary known practice. Paul had been at Troas seven days, and consequently was there upon the Jewish Sabbath; but there is no word of any meeting among them on that day, or any other day of the week. But, when the first day of the week comes, the church is solemnly convened, and performs the work of the Sabbath on this day. Paul was ready to depart from that place, only he must stay till the first day of the week, that he might meet with the whole church, and preach to them before he leave them; and so, according to their custom, they all assemble together, and he sanctifies the Sabbath with them, by preaching and dispensing the sacrament, and that even till midnight; for they did not soon weary, at that time, of the work and duties of the Lord's day.

A third passage is, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2, "Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store," &c. Whence it is plain that the apostle enjoins the church of Corinth, in conformity with other churches, to make their collection for the poor on the first day of the week. Now, why on the first day of the week, and not on the seventh, or any other? but for these reasons: 1. They had their public meeting on this day, and so had more conveniency for gathering their charity on this day than upon another. 2. The first day of the week was now come in place of the old Sabbath, on which day collections were made in the Jewish synagogues; for the giving of alms was always reckoned a proper duty for the Sabbath-day. But now the apostle will have all the duties of the Sabbath transferred to the first day of the week, and particularly this duty of public charity, there being a peculiar fitness in this day for it, as we are called this day to commemorate Christ's infinite charity to our souls, and also to receive new blessings and expressions of bounty from him; and therefore should be the more liberal to his poor saints. I hope there is none that will say that the apostle had not Christ's warrant for what he appointed in this matter; for in this epistle he protests that "he delivered nothing to them, but what he had received from the Lord, and had his command for;" see 1 Cor. xi. 23; xiv. 43. It is as clear as light from the foresaid testimony, and many others, that the primitive Christians had their assemblies on the first day of the week, which they would not have had without the apostles' direction; nor would the apostles have determined so, without knowing the mind of Christ.

A fourth passage is, Rev. i. 10, where John saith of himself that "he was in the Spirit on the Lord's day;" which, to be sure, is no other than the Christian Sabbath, getting the denomination from our Lord Jesus Christ, and his rising from the dead thereupon, and frequent meetings with his disciples this day; and to this day it still retains this title of the Lord's day, being a day specially instituted for the honour of our Lord, and consecrated for his service and worship. The apostle wrote this book near the end of the first century, and calls this day by that name which it commonly got then, and speaks of it as a day universally known and remarkable for the Christians' observation of it. The apostle at this time was banished into the isle of Patmos by Domitian the emperor, where probably he wanted the opportunity of the public assemblies on this day; yet he is employed in sanctifying the Lord's day in a private way; he is in the Spirit, that is, in a spiritual frame, and employed in spiritual exercises, meditation, and prayer, (which are proper duties for the Sabbath,) and the Lord rewards this conscientious regard to this day with the revelation of those great things which were afterwards to happen to the church to the end of the world.

Moreover, it is observable that the Lord puts his name on this day; for the Holy Ghost calls it here the Lord's day, and that for these reasons: 1. Because of its deriving its institution from him: so the prayer dictated by him is called the Lord's prayer; the sacrament of the supper instituted by him is called the Lord's supper. 2. It is called the Lord's, because of his special propriety in it. He hath separated and set it apart from common use, and consecrated it wholly to his use and service: so the sacrament is called the Lord's table, because of its being consecrated for holy uses, and so set apart and distinguished from all other tables. 3. Because of its being dedicated to his honour and memory, being the day in which he conquered death, gained a total victory, and triumphed over all his enemies. 4. It is called the Lord's day, because the Lord Jesus Christ, his person and mediation, is the principal subject of this day.

VII. Another argument for the observation of the Christian Sabbath may be drawn from the constant and uninterrupted practice of all Christ's churches through the world since the apostles' days; they have all continued to observe the Lord's day for holy worship. All the ancient fathers and Christians had the Lord's day in great esteem, and made it a badge of their religion to observe it carefully, as appears from the writings of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Origen, &c. Ignatius, that ancient father, who lived so near Christ's times, in his epistles highly recommends the Lord's day: "Let every one that loveth Christ (saith he) observe the first day of the week, the Lord's day, as the queen of all days." It is a remarkable saying of Augustine, "as the virgin Mary was blessed above all women, so is the first day of the week blessed above all days."

VIII. The consciences of men plead for the divine authority of the Lord's day. Surely it is God, who is the supreme Lord and Sovereign of men's consciences, that directs this his deputy in men to excite and press them so closely to the observation of this day, and also to challenge and smite them so sharply for the neglect and profanation of it. And, indeed, there is no sin that conscience more commonly accuses wicked men of than the breach of the Lord's day. And hence it is that many malefactors at their last hour most bitterly bewail it; acknowledging that their Sabbath-breaking was their leading sin, and the occasion of all the rest of their wicked courses; having provoked God to leave them, and give them up to the lusts of their own hearts and the temptations of the devil. Clark, in his 2d volume of Examples, tells us of one Thomas Savage (a young man who was executed at Ratcliff, October 28, 1668, for murdering his fellow-servant,) that whilst he was in prison, cried out to some that came to visit him after this manner—"Oh wretch that I was! I studied how I might spend the Lord's day in the devil's work; at that time when I should have been serving God, I was busiest in serving Satan. I was glad when the Sabbath came, for then I had leisure to pursue my lusts and pleasures. I sometimes went into the church, but I never staid the time of a whole sermon. I laughed at those who spent the Sabbaths in hearing and praying, and looked on them as the veriest fools in the world. O tell young men from me that Sabbath-breaking is a dangerous and costly sin," &c.

Turner, on Providence, gives an account of one Edmund Kirk, vintner, executed at Tyburn, July 11, 1684, for murdering his wife, who in his confession lamented his frequent profanation of the Lord's day—"Upon which holy day (saith he) I committed the heinous sin of murdering my poor wife." Thus one sin was punished with another, Sabbath-breaking with murder, and that with the gallows. Likewise he tells of another, executed May 25, 1687, for theft, who in his confession said, "That it was his earnest desire that all young men especially should take care not to misspend the Lord's day." And the author's remark is, that he does not know that ever he observed any repentance in a malefactor, who did not bitterly lament his neglect of his duty to God on that day.

IX. In the last place.—The dispensations of divine providence may be brought in as giving suffrage to the sanctification of the Lord's day. God hath highly honoured this day by doing many mighty works upon it: on this day he created the light, and began to make the world; on this day he gave the law from Mount Sinai, as Grotius observes. Nay, it is affirmed by an ancient Council held at Constantinople, Conc. 6. Can. 8, "That Christ was born on the Lord's day, and the star shined to the wise men on it. Christ fed the five thousand with the five loaves and two fishes on this day; he was baptized, rose from the dead, and sent down the Holy Ghost on this day." And some of the ancients have further affirmed, that whatsoever notable thing was done in the world, the Lord ordered it so, was done to the honour of this day. Thus God hath consecrated the first day of the week, or Christian Sabbath, by doing so many of his wonderful works upon it; to intimate to us, that it is his will we should sanctify this day, and observe it weekly, for publishing and proclaiming his worthy acts, and keeping up the memory of Christ's nativity, passion, resurrection, &c. to the end of the world, without instituting days of our own for these ends.

Moreover, there are various dispensations from God, both of mercy and judgment, that result for the observation of this holy day. The gracious providences that attend the conscientious observers of the Lord's day are most remarkable. On them the Lord pours down the gracious influences of his Spirit, in his ordinances dispensed this day; he eminently blesseth them with increase of grace, tenderness of conscience, and holiness of life; and with all his best blessings, both spiritual and temporal. God hath now for these 1700 years past, granted all his churches through the world many signal marks of his favour and presence in observing the Lord's day, which they could not have expected had they been in error in keeping it. How often hath he poured out his Spirit upon them when attending ordinances on this day, and blessed them with conviction, conversion, and manifestations of his love? Nay, the universal experience of Christians testify, that all the blessings and mercies promised to the observers of the Sabbath under the Old Testament, are now transferred and accomplished to the keepers of the Christian Sabbath. For, the change of the day being by divine authority, the first-day Sabbath doth lawfully succeed to all the privileges, promises, and threatenings, formerly pertaining to the seventh-day Sabbath. We see what blessings are promised to the keeping of the Sabbath of old, both spiritual and temporal; that is a remarkable word, Jer. xvii. 24, 26, "If ye hallow the Sabbath-day, to do no work therein, then they shall come from the cities of Judah, and all other places, bringing burnt-offerings, and sacrifices, and meat-offerings, and incense, and bringing sacrifices of praise unto the house of the Lord;" that is, when the Sabbath is duly observed, then the church shall flourish, religion shall be promoted, and the name of God highly exalted. And do we not see this promise visibly accomplished to such churches and persons as strictly sanctify the Lord's day? Among such Christianity doth flourish, knowledge is increased, reformation is advanced, grace is multiplied, and a conscientious regard is had to all the other duties of religion.

Again, we find temporal mercies annexed to the keeping of the Sabbath, Isa. lviii. 13, 14, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath," that is, if thou cease from profaning it, "I will cause thee to ride on the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father;" that is, thou shalt be blessed with outward prosperity, and many earthly enjoyments. This is again confirmed in Jer. xvii. 24, 25, "If ye diligently hearken unto me, saith the Lord, to hallow the Sabbath-day, to do no work therein, then shall there enter into the gates of this city kings and princes, sitting on the throne of David, riding in chariots, and this city shall remain for ever;" in other words, the nation and city shall be blessed with all secular and civil advantages. Accordingly the people of God have found the hallowing of the Lord's day sensibly prosperous to them with respect to their secular affairs. When they have discharged the duties of this day with a good conscience, it hath fared the better with them all the week after. In testimony whereof, I shall here narrate the experience of that excellent person, Sir Matthew Hale, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, in the reign of King Charles II. who was both an eminent lawyer and a great divine. In his book, called "Contemplations, Moral and Divine," he hath these words: "I have found, saith he, by a strict and diligent observation, that a due observing the duty of the Lord's day hath ever had joined to it a blessing upon the rest of my time; and the week that hath been so begun hath been blessed and prosperous to me: and, on the other side, when I have been negligent of the duties of this day, the rest of the week hath been unsuccessful and unhappy to my secular employments; so that I could easily make an estimate of my successes in my own secular employments the week following, by the manner of my passing this day. And this I do not write lightly or inconsiderately, but upon a long and sound observation and experience." Again, in another place, he saith, "I thank God, I ever found that, in the strictest observation of the times of his worship, I ever met with the best advantage to my worldly occasions; and that, whenever my worldly occasions encroached upon those times, I ever met with disappointment, though in things of the most probable success; and ever let it be so with me. It hath been and ever shall be to me, a conviction, beyond all argument and demonstration whatsoever, that God expects the observation of his times; and that, while I find myself thus dealt with, God hath not given over his care of me. It would be a sad presage unto me of the severe anger of my Maker, if my inadvertence should cast me upon a temporal undertaking upon this day, and that it should prosper." Thus the learned and pious Judge Hale, who spake from his own experience, after long and critical observation of divine providence.

Again, the judgments which often follow upon the violation of this day, give testimony to its divine authority. How sad are the spiritual strokes, though little noticed, which God inflicts upon the slights of his holy day, by giving them up to hardness of heart, scaredness of conscience, and vile affections; so that commonly they fall into scandalous out-breakings, and notorious crimes, proceeding from evil to worse, till they at length run themselves into some fatal mischief! And, when men neglect to punish the profanation of this day, the Lord usually takes the sword into his own hand, and, by visible temporal judgments, plagues the profaners of it. If the violation of the Jewish Sabbath was, by a divine order, punished with death under the law, Exod. xxxi. 15, surely the breach of the Christian Sabbath shall not escape without some signal marks of the divine vengeance, according to the scripture-threatenings, which are levelled against the one as well as the other, as I showed before. Let us not forget that terrible denunciation of judgment, which we have in Jeremiah xvii. 27, "But if you will not hearken unto me to hallow the Sabbath-day, and not to bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem, on the Sabbath day, then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched." The Jews (as Augustine observes) fell generally into this grievous sin of profaning the Sabbath: for, though they pretended to hallow it, by forbearing servile labour upon it, yet upon that day above all days they used to pamper the flesh with carnal delights, and run into the excesses of gluttony and drunkenness. Against these sins did our Saviour warn them; but, they persisting, the foresaid direful threatening was at length exactly fulfilled; for upon that very day, so abused by them, their regal city Jerusalem, the glory and the masterpiece of the whole earth, was burnt down to the ground by the Romans. And this Hegisippus and Dio observe to have been done on the Sabbath-day, in September, about forty years after Christ's death.

And doth not that prophetic commination concern us as well as the Jews? And have we not cause to fear the accomplishment of it for the breach of the Christian Sabbath? Yes, we have found it to be true. Some impartial observers of God's judgments in the world have remarked, that this sin, viz. the breach of the fourth commandment, by the profane neglect of God's worship upon the Lord's day, and the spending of this time in open works of impiety, hath been frequently visited upon cities and private persons, by consuming fires that have happened upon this day; of which many instances might be given in this same island, as well as other parts of the world. That fiery prediction against Jerusalem hath been oftener than once fulfilled and executed upon the two capital cities thereof, many of whose inhabitants have been as guilty of profaning the day set apart for God's service as ever the Jews were. In London this vice reigned, and there it was dreadfully punished with a furious and astonishing fire in the year 1666, which laid the most part of that great city, with its fairest churches and buildings, in rubbish, in three days' space: and it is remarkable, that that dreadful fire broke forth on the Lord's day, very early in the morning, being the second day of September.

Likewise in Edinburgh, where Sabbath breaking very much abounded, (as appears by the acts of assembly made against that sin) the fairest and stateliest of its buildings, in the Parliament close, and about it, (to which scarce any in Britain were comparable) were, on the 4th of February, 1700, (being the Lord's day) burnt down and laid in ashes and ruins, in the space of a few hours, to the astonishment and terror of the sorrowful inhabitants; whereof I myself was an eye-witness: and the effects of that fire are visible to this day. Yea, so great was the terror and confusion of that Lord's day, that the people of the city were in no case to attend any sermon or public worship upon it, though there was a great number of worthy ministers convened in the place, (besides the reverend ministers of the city) ready to have prayed with, or preached to, the people on that sad occasion; for the General Assembly was sitting there at the time: but the dismal case of the city made this impracticable. However the Lord himself, by that silent Sabbath, did loudly preach to all the inhabitants of the city, setting forth to them, in a most awakening manner, the great sin and danger of irreligious neglecting of God's worship upon the Lord's day, and profaning it, "by doing their own works, and finding their own pleasures."

I have read of the town of Stratford upon Avon, that it was twice, upon the Lord's day, almost consumed with fire, chiefly for profaning the Lord's day, and contemning his word in the mouth of his faithful minister. The like also might be told of several towns in Scotland.

Dr. Beard, in his Theatre of God's Judgments, tells us of the town of Feverton, in Devonshire, that was often admonished by her godly pastor, that God would bring some heavy judgment upon the inhabitants of that place, for their profanation of the Lord's day, occasioned chiefly by preparing for their weekly market, which they then held on the Monday. Accordingly, very soon after the said minister's death, on the 3d April, 1598, God sent a terrible fire, which in less than half an hour consumed the whole town, except the church, the court-house, alms-houses, and a few poor people's dwellings; where a man might have seen four hundred dwelling-houses all at once on fire, and above fifty persons consumed in the flames. But the remaining inhabitants not taking warning by the former judgment, but continuing in the same sin, the town was again fired on the 5th of August, 1612, (fourteen years after the former fire), and all consumed, except a few poor houses. The historian adds, that they are blind who see not in this the finger of God: and he prays for grace to the people of that city, when it is next built, to change their market day, and to remove all occasions of profaning the Lord's day.

Mr Clark, in his Examples, tells us of one Mr. Abberly, a godly minister in Burton upon Trent, who took occasion often to reprove and threaten Sabbath-breakers, especially such as sold and bought meat upon Sabbath-day mornings, a practice too common in that place. Nevertheless, there was a tailor, that dwelt in the upper end of the town, who would go through the long street (as it were in a bravado) to the other end of the town, and fetch home meat on the Lord's day morning; but as he returned with both his hands full, in the midst of the street, he fell down quite dead. I was (saith Dr. Teate) an eye-witness, both of his fall and burial: and it pleased God thereby to work some reformation, both among the butchers and others.

Also he relates, from one Mr. Falconer, minister of Burford near Salisbury, a fearful example of God's justice, about the year 1635. A profane company of young men, on the Lord's day, early in the morning, went to Claringdon park, to cut down a May-pole; and having laden the cart with it, at Milner's Bars, entering into the city of Salisbury, one of the cartwheels fell into a rut, which made the young tree in the cart (which they had stolen for a May-pole) to give a great lurch on one side, so that it struck one of the company such a blow on the head, that it beat out his brains, and he instantly died on the place, and lay there a fearful spectacle of God's wrath, both against that heathenish sport and wilful profanation of the Sabbath; whilst he maketh the very thing they had chosen for their sport and pastime, to be the instrument of executing his fury. The author saith, that he diligently inquired after the truth of this matter, at his first going to Sarum; and many godly and credible persons, who had seen that sad spectacle, in his hearing attested it to be so as above narrated.

Dr. Twiss on the Sabbath, tells, That at a place called Tidworth, on the Sabbath day, many being met together to play at foot-ball in the church-yard, one had his leg broken, which presently gangrening, he forthwith died thereof. Likewise at Alcester in Warwickshire, a lusty young woman (upon the coming forth of the declaration for sports) went on the Sabbath day to a green not very far off, where she said she would dance as long as she could stand: but, while she was dancing, God struck her with a violent disease, whereof, within two or three days, she died.

I shall conclude with one example more from Mr. Clark. He gives an account of a godly minister, that one day was preaching, and earnestly pressing the sanctification of the Sabbath; and, in his sermon, he had occasion to make mention of that man, that, by the special commandment of God, was stoned to death for gathering sticks on the Sabbath-day. Whereupon one in the congregation was so wicked, as to rise up and laugh; yea, made all the haste he could out of the church, and went to gathering of sticks, though he had no need of them. But, when the people came out from the sermon, they found him in their way, lying quite dead, with the bundle of sticks in his arms. These instances of divine vengeance, inflicted upon the profaners of the Lord's day, may contribute very much to confirm us in the belief of the divine institution of this holy day; and likewise may serve to warn all ranks and degrees of persons, to guard against the contempt and violation of the Lord's day. The Lord indeed exerciseth great long-suffering and patience towards many notorious Sabbath-breakers, to show us that there is a judgment to come: but nevertheless he makes monuments of some, to let us know, that "verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth."

Many more examples might be brought, if it were needful, from all corners of the land; but I truly believe there are few serious observers of providence, but might relate many sad instances of the discovery of God's displeasure against the profanation of the Lord's day, from their own experience and observation.

After all, I hope, there is none that fears God, loves Christ, and believes the holy scriptures, but will see these arguments which I have adduced to be convincing demonstrations of the necessity of sanctifying the Lord's day, and honouring it as God's Sabbath to the end of the world.

Now, to sum up the whole, let us lay all these together: the solid ground for the morality of the fourth commandment, the weighty reasons of the change of the day, and the special marks of honour that Christ hath put upon this holy day; it being the day in which he first made the light to shine, the day wherein also the Sun of righteousness arose, dispelling the clouds of guilt and fear; the day he subdued his enemies, manifested himself to his disciples, and taught them his will; the day he sent the Holy Ghost to his apostles; the day he hath called by his own name, and reserved for his own use, and upon which he holds special communion with his people, and vouchsafes them the marks of his royal favour; the day which God highly honours by his providential dispensations. And will it not then be judged a high affront to Almighty God to pour contempt on that day which he delights to honour? Surely it ought to be matter of grief to all true lovers of God when they see it done. We are told, that, when one of Darius' eunuchs saw Alexander setting his feet on a rich table of his master's, he fell a weeping; and being asked the reason of it, he said, "It was to see the table his master so highly esteemed now made a footstool." And may we not weep to see the day that God hath honoured and blessed, and for which he is so highly concerned, made a footstool, and trampled on by so many profane persons in our days? To be sure, God will not bear with such open affronts as he gets from some in this matter.

Thus, I think, I have demonstrated the morality of the fourth commandment, and the divine institution of the Lord's day for our Christian Sabbath; which, by necessary consequence, proves the abolition of the Jewish seventh-day Sabbath. For though there were no other scripture warrant for abolishing the old Sabbath, (which nevertheless there is, as I showed before,) yet seeing it is evident that our Lord Jesus Christ, "the Lord of the Sabbath," hath by his resurrection, example, and authority, for ever consecrated the first day of the week, for the solemn remembrance and celebration of the Lord's rest from the great work of redemption, and of that unparalleled deliverance wrought by him for a lost world, and thereby hath set apart the first day for our Sabbath; then, of course, the old seventh day must yield, and resign its sanctity to it, and be for ever abrogated. The Christian Sabbath must necessarily extinguish the Jewish, seeing the two Sabbath-days cannot stand in force together. For, by virtue of the fourth commandment, there is but one day of seven to be observed for the Sabbath, one day only after six working days, and not two after five. And since it is the ancient and unrepealed institution of God, that men should labour six days of the week, and observe but one day for the Sabbath; then surely, if we should labour but five days of the week and keep two for the Sabbath, we would expressly violate the law. So that no Christians need to have the least scruple about the abrogation of the Jewish Sabbath.

But though the seventh day be now divested of its sanctity, and hath no more claim to the Sabbath, having resigned all its dignity and privileges to the first day of the week, the New Testament Sabbath; yet still it hath the honour of ushering it in, and serving as a preparation day for it. As the Jewish typical worship ushered in the evangelical spiritual worship; and the Jewish deliverances from Egypt and Babylon were preparatory to that more glorious and general one from hell and destruction by Jesus Christ, which is this day commemorated; so the Jewish seventh-day Sabbath serves to usher in and prepare us for the glorious festival of the Christian Sabbath, which is to continue while Christ hath a church upon earth, being the only day appointed to be kept in remembrance of him, and as serving to usher in and prepare us for that far more glorious and celestial Sabbath above, which shall never have an end.

O then endeavour by all means to obtain and keep up a high esteem of the Lord's day, that day which God hath exalted above all the days of the week, and above all the Jewish Sabbaths and festivals whatsoever. Of them, in comparison with the Lord's day, we may say in allusion to that word, Heb. i. 11, 12, "They perish, but thou remainest; and they all wax old like a garment, and as a vesture thou hast folded them up, and they are changed; but thou shalt (notwithstanding all the malice of men and devils) continue the same, and thy years shall not fail." These were but as morning-stars to usher in the sun. Other festivals, in all their royalty, are not arrayed like thee. All the graces triumph in thee; all the ordinances conspire to adorn thee; the sacred Trinity delight in thee: the Father ruleth thee, the Son rose upon thee, and the Spirit hath overshadowed thee. Thus is it done to the day which the King of heaven delighteth to honour; and what shall be done to the man that delighteth to dishonour and put contempt upon thee?

Surely, as "God will not hold him guiltless" that breaks the third commandment "by taking his name in vain;" so he will not hold him guiltless that breaks the fourth commandment by spending his day in vain. And though the breakers of this commandment may escape punishment from men, or may even escape outward judgments from God in this world; yet there is a day coming, when he will call them to account for it. Oh sinners! the day of the Lord is like to be a dreadful day to you that despise the Lord's day.

QUEST. VI. What is that proportion of time which is to be separated and allowed for the Sabbath-day? and when doth it begin and end?

ANS. The fourth commandment requires one day in every seven; by which we are not to understand only the artificial day from sun-rising to sun-setting, or from the break of day until the darkness of the night come on, and think then the Sabbath is over, and that we are no longer bound to abstain from our own works; and far less are we to think that the Sabbath is no longer than the time of public worship, and that we are at freedom from the work and duties of the Sabbath when that is over: this some say in words, and many more in their practice.

But, consider what absurdities would follow hereupon: for, if no more time be allowed for the Sabbath but the time of public worship; then it would follow, that God requires no private or secret duties from us on that day, since these will need some more time. But that cannot be; for, if private and secret duties be required of us on week days, then much more on the Sabbath-day.

Again, it would follow that some must keep longer Sabbaths, and others shorter; nay, the Sabbath of many shall not be above an hour or two of the day; for there are ministers and people who are scarce so long at public worship. But the whole day is the Lord's, and not a part only. You will have your servants to work the whole six week-days for you, from morning to night, and not be contented with their working an hour or two only of these days: so neither should you yield less to God than you require for yourselves. Nay, if attendance on the public worship were all that is requisite on this day, by virtue of the commandment, it would follow, that a man would be loosed from the obligation of the commandment, if he were in a place of the world where God is not publicly worshipped.

But all these things being absurd, I do upon solid ground assert that the whole natural day, consisting of twenty-four hours, is to be set apart for the Sabbath-day; and that we ought to measure this day, and begin and end it as we do other days, that is, from midnight to midnight; during which time we are to abstain from our own works, and sanctify the Lord's Sabbath: for the fourth commandment binds us to consecrate the seventh part of every week to the Lord, who challengeth a special property in one of seven, and asserts his just title thereto, saying, "The seventh day is the Lord's:" and also, Isa. lvii. 13, he expressly calls it, "My holy day." It is all holy; and therefore no part must be profaned or applied to common uses. It is all the Lord's: and so it is unlawful for us to rob him of any part of it, and alienate it to our private use.

OBJECT. But who is able to spend the whole twenty-four hours in religious duties?

ANS. I do not say that this is to be done without any intermission; for we do not this in following our employments on other days. A due proportion of every day is to be reserved for the natural support of our bodies, and particularly for moderate eating and sleeping, which are works of necessity, and must be allowed on the Sabbath as well as other days; with this difference only, that, whereas they are done on other days to enable us for labour, they are to be done on the Sabbath to strengthen us for holy duties; and so cannot properly be called our own works. Neither can the doing thereof be called a taking of God's time to our own use, since this contributes to our better spending of God's time, and is truly necessary for God's service on the Sabbath. But, besides the time requisite for the works of necessity and mercy, the whole natural day, as above described, is holy unto the Lord, and ought to be employed in religious duties; and not a part of the day only. Both Sabbath morning and Sabbath night should be spent in prayer and praises, as is plain from the 92d Psalm, which is intituled "A psalm or song for the Sabbath-day;" ver. 1, 2, we are told, that "It is good to give thanks unto the Lord, and show forth his loving-kindness in the morning, and his faithfulness every night." But more of this afterwards, when I come directly to treat of the sanctification of the Sabbath. And before I do this, I judge it necessary to answer some objections brought against the morality of the Sabbath, and the change of the day.

Quakers, Familists, and others, holding that there is no difference of days, and so denying the divine authority of the Sabbath, I shall consider what they say.

SOME OBJECTIONS AGAINST THE FORMER DOCTRINE ANSWERED.

OBJECT. 1. Every day ought to be a Sabbath to a Christian, and so there is no need of a set day.

ANS. Though Christians should serve God, and walk with him every day, yet they cannot make every day a Sabbath for the public worship of God, since God calls them to other necessary work and business thereupon, which are inconsistent with the solemn spiritual employment of the Sabbath.

OBJECT. 2. Paul, in his epistle to the Galatians, and elsewhere, condemns the observation of days under the New Testament.

ANS. The apostle speaks only of the Jewish Sabbath and festivals, which were shadows of things to come, and abolished by Christ's coming; but not of the Lord's day, which the apostle himself observed, and did particularly recommend to the Galatians for their observation, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2.

OBJECT. 3. The Sabbath was given as a type or sign only to the Jews; therefore it must be abolished with the rest of their types and ceremonies.

ANS. 1. The Sabbath is indeed said to be given as a sign betwixt God and his people, Ezek. xx. 12. But that is not confined to the people of the Jews, (except as to the seventh-day Sabbath only, of which I spoke before,) but to be extended to all God's people to the end of the world.

2. There is a great difference betwixt a sign and a ceremony, which is an alterable thing. The rainbow is called a sign, Gen. ix. God's moral precepts are called signs, Deut. vi. 8. Yet none will say that these are ceremonies, or alterable things.

3. Some signs are ceremonial and alterable; others are moral and perpetual. The Sabbath is not a sign of the first, but of the latter sort. Indeed, all the signs and types of the sacrifice of the Messiah, and justification by Christ to come, were nailed all to the cross with him, and abrogated; but all signs were not of this kind. The rainbow is given as a sign of the world's preservation from a deluge, and is perpetual. The ten commandments are given as probative signs of our obedience, and are perpetual; and so is the Sabbath. Indeed, the Sabbath is a more peculiar sign than any of the rest of the commandments, and therefore is emphatically called a sign several times in scripture. 1st. It is a sign of God's special love and favour to his people. The Sabbath is a great blessing and privilege to them; for which Nehemiah gives God thanks in a special manner, Neh. ix. 14, of which more afterward. 2d. It is a sign of that eternal rest above, provided for the people of God. 3d. The religious observation of the Sabbath is a declarative sign of our sanctification; therefore it is said, Exod. xxxi. and Ezek. xx. that the Lord gave his people Sabbaths and signs, that "they might know that he was the Lord that sanctified them." So that it is plain from these, that the Sabbath is a sign to us as well as to the Jews.

OBJECT. 4. But (say Quakers and other sectarians) there is no holiness in days, one time is not better than another; and therefore the Sabbath doth not differ from other days in the week.

ANS. I grant one day is not holier than another in itself, (as one place is not more holy in its own nature than another,) yet it may be holier in respect of its use. Thus the Sabbath-day hath a relative holiness in it, as it is designed and appropriated to God's use and service, and therefore must not be alienated to uses of our own; for this would be sacrilege, which is a heinous crime. Hence it is, that the Lord doth expressly call the Sabbath a holy day, Isa. lviii. 13.

OBJECT. 5. "But (say they) doth God require us to be more religious and godly at one time than another?"

ANS. There are some times that God requires us to give ourselves more to religion, and to express it more by outward acts of worship, than at other times. I grant, that we ought always to be religious, and to serve and worship God every day of the week; but God, in his wisdom, hath thought fit to set apart a certain season, wherein he requires more of the solemn, external, and visible exercises of religion, and performance of holy duties, than at other times. The reason of his so doing I mentioned before.

SOME OBJECTIONS AGAINST THE CHANGE OF THE DAY ANSWERED.

OBJECT. 1. "The seventh-day Sabbath was instituted in the state of innocence; therefore it is to be held as moral, and unalterable."

ANS. The institution of the Sabbath, or consecration of "one day in seven to the Lord," may be hence concluded moral and perpetual, since the reason and ground of it is such, as was shown before; but it will not follow, that the determination of the precise day of the week is moral and unalterable also, since the Lawgiver, who appointed it, not only could, but actually hath altered it, as was shown already. Every thing that God bid or forbid our first parents, in a state of innocence, was not moral or unalterably good or evil in itself, as appears from the instance of prohibiting to "eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil;" this was a law merely positive, and alterable in itself. Lastly, Though the Sabbath of the seventh day was appointed in the state of innocence, and probably would have continued unalterably, if the fall had not intervened, and no greater work than that of the creation had been wrought; yet, after the fall, God made the seventh-day Sabbath peculiar to the old economy, or dispensation of the covenant, and alterable, together with it, upon his accomplishing the far more glorious work of our redemption.

OBJECT. 2. "The Israelites are enjoined to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations, 'for a perpetual covenant,' Exod. xxxi. 16."

ANS. 1. This may be understood of the Sabbath indefinitely, and not of the seventh-day Sabbath.

2. Granting the seventh-day Sabbath were meant here, yet the perpetuity attributed to it is not absolute, but periodical; denoting only a great length of time; for so we find it ascribed to circumcision, the show-bread, and other things which were to be abolished.

OBJECT. 3. "There is no express precept for keeping the Christian Sabbath in the New Testament."

ANS. 1. The Lord doth not give express command for every particular duty in his word, but hath thought it sufficient to afford us plain scripture consequences, whence we may gather it.

2. There was no need of any new express precept to be left on record, since all the Christians understand themselves to be expressly obliged by the fourth commandment to observe one day of seven as a Sabbath unto the Lord. And, for the particular day, the example of Christ, and of his apostles, (who delivered nothing but what they received from their Master, 1 Cor. xi. 23,) was sufficient to enter the church upon the uniform observation thereof: and, being once begun, they could not easily mistake in the continuance of it. The scripture, indeed, mentions the change of the day, and the keeping of the Christian Sabbath, but briefly, and by short hints, because it was a thing universally known to the whole church.

These things, concerning the morality and perpetual obligation of the law for the Sabbath, being premised, I come, in the next place, to the chief thing which I designed to consider, viz.—The sanctification of the Sabbath: and there to show particularly how this holy day should be sanctified in a due and suitable manner.

CHAP. II.

CONCERNING THE SANCTIFICATION OF THE SABBATH.

THERE is a twofold sanctification of the Sabbath, mentioned in the fourth commandment, the one by God, the other by man.

As to the first, God hath already sanctified it, as is recorded in the close of the commandment: "The Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it." His blessing and hallowing the day are both of the same import, and signify these two things:

1. The Lord's distinguishing this day from others, and his setting it apart from common unto sacred uses and employments. He hath honoured it with his royal stamp, and consecrated it for the work of heaven.

2. His pitching upon the Sabbath as the day whereon he doth remarkably bless and sanctify men, by filling his ordinances with the special blessings and graces of his Holy Spirit, and making them effectual to our sanctification.

This is a blessed day, and a day of blessing. For as it is our duty on this day to meet together, and bless God, so it is God's promise this day to meet with us, and bless us. He will rain blessings upon the observers of his Sabbath, grant them his presence, and make them joyful in his house of prayer.

As to the second, the sanctification of the Sabbath which is required of us, this is either negative or positive. The first consists in a holy rest; the second in holy exercises upon the Sabbath.

Before I proceed to consider these, I shall lay down some cautions for the right understanding of the fourth commandment, and for preventing mistakes. Wherefore, when God doth here appoint us six days of the week for our labour, and one day for his worship, we must not think that it is God's meaning, 1. That no part of our six days is to be spent in religious exercises; for, under the law, there were set portions of every day consecrated to divine worship, in the tabernacle and temple. Nor, 2. Doth he mean that no whole day besides the Sabbath may be set apart for imploring God's mercy in time of distress, or returning thanks to God for some special favour or deliverance, when the providence of God calls us to it. For we find God himself enjoining the observation of other days beside the seventh, Exod. xxxiv; Lev. xxiii; Num. xxviii, and commanding cessation from labour on these days. It is not the design of the fourth commandment to lay us under a peremptory or indispensable obligation of labouring in all the six days throughout; but only to enjoin us not to labour on any other day but these six days, and to do all our works upon them, so as we be not hindered from serving God in a solemn manner on the seventh.

SECTION I.

CONCERNING THE HOLY REST REQUISITE ON THE SABBATH.

This holy rest upon the Sabbath consists in a total abstinence from all worldly employments and recreations, and from whatever work, business, or action, that may any wise prove a hindrance to the worship and service of God upon that day. This is plain, not only from the fourth commandment itself, but from many other passages of scripture, particularly Jer. xvii. 24; Isa. lviii. 13.

I shall here propose some questions upon this subject to be answered.

QUEST. I. Are no sort of works lawful on the Sabbath-day?

ANS. There are three sorts of works ordinarily excepted, as not prohibited by the fourth commandment, viz. the works of piety, of mercy, and of necessity.

1. The works of piety, that is, such bodily actions or labour as are necessary and subservient to the performance of divine worship, or contribute to order or decency therein; these are lawful and necessary on the Sabbath-day. Such were "the killing of beasts, washing and preparing of sacrifices, the convoking the people to worship by blowing of trumpets, making short journeys to attend worship," &c. under the law. So now, under the gospel, ministers toiling their bodies in preaching and praying, people travelling to church, the ringing of bells, and the like, are lawful on the Sabbath-day.

2. Works of mercy and charity are lawful this day, yea, and necessary also; for, seeing the Sabbath is instituted as a memorial of God's great love and mercy to us, we are bound upon it to show charity both to the souls and bodies of men, and mercy to the very beasts also. So that "the feeding of our bodies, our beasts, and using means for the help of man or beast in distress, and preserving of their lives, the visiting the sick, making collections for the poor," and the like, are lawful on the Sabbath-day: for the Jews had allowance for these under the law, so have we now under the gospel.

3. Works of necessity and great emergency, which could not be foreseen, nor provided against the day before, and cannot be delayed to another day; such as "fleeing from enemies, or defending ourselves against them; quenching fire, dressing meat, putting on our clothes," and the like; these are also lawful on the Sabbath. The Maccabees of old did not decline to fight on the Sabbath-day, nor did the Jews, long before their days. For the Jewish writers tell us, that the overthrow of Jericho was on the Sabbath; which seems to be founded upon Josh. vi. 3, 4, where it is said, "They shall compass the city six days; and on the seventh day the walls of the city shall fall down, and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him." Only take these cautions concerning such works: see that the necessity be real, and not pretended, and that ye have no secret complacency in its falling out. Take heed that it be not a necessity of your own bringing, and which you might have foreseen and prevented the week before. And, when ye are doing these works of necessity and mercy, endeavour to keep your hearts in a spiritual frame as much as you can, and study to do them without giving scandal or offence to others, and then dispatch them as soon as possibly you can, that ye may attend to the main work of the day.

QUEST. II. What are these works and actions, then, from which we must rest and abstain upon the Sabbath?

ANS. We must not only take special care this day to abstain from all such sinful works and actions as are unlawful upon any day; but we must also rest from all worldly business and actions, whether employments or recreations, although they be such as are lawful on other days. But, more particularly,

1. We must rest from all sorts of servile work or worldly employments that tend to our profit or advantage; such as making journeys, merchandizing, or travelling to markets, carrying burdens, fishing, working mills, ploughing, sowing, reaping, &c. and, in a word, all parts of men's ordinary callings. See Neh. xiii. 15—17, and downwards: "In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the Sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; as also wine-grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the Sabbath-day: and I testified against them in the day where they sold victuals. There dwelt men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish, and all manner of ware, and sold on the Sabbath unto the children of Judah and in Jerusalem. Then I contended with the nobles of Judah, and said unto them, What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the Sabbath-day? Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city? yet ye bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the Sabbath," &c. The Jews were strictly prohibited to do any work this day, even the least work of any sort; manna must not be gathered, nor a few sticks for a fire; nay, the materials for the tabernacle must not be prepared this day, Exod. xxxi., nor any thing that might be delayed or done upon another day. Let none think that such a total cessation from secular business would tend to their worldly disadvantage; for none were ever losers in this respect, by laying aside their own labours to attend God's worship and service upon his own day. As God took care of Israel's safety, while they came up to Jerusalem three times a-year to attend the solemn feasts which he had instituted; so that at these times none of their enemies should make any attack upon them, or so much as desire their cities, according to his promise in Exod. xxxiv. 24; so will that same God, by his kind and watchful providence, take care that his people sustain no damage in their worldly affairs through their dutiful observation of this holy day. Nay, on the contrary, they have found this practice to be even profitable to them, with respect to their outward temporal estate. And there is good ground to think it will always be so; for, the more conscientious any man is in sanctifying the Sabbath-day, the greater blessing he may expect from God upon his labour on the six days: and it is not your own labour or toil, but the "blessing of God that maketh rich," Prov. x. 22. Judge Hale, and other godly persons, have attested the truth of this point from their own experience, as I have showed before.

I. The Lord, in his word, is very peremptory and particular in enjoining this cessation from labour on the Sabbath; and because he knows the eagerness of men's hearts upon the world, and their readiness to encroach upon his holy day with their worldly labour, he condescends upon these seasons wherein they have most temptation thereto, and requires them in "earing time and in harvest" to rest on the Sabbath, Exod. xxxiv. 21. Though those be the times when we are most engaged with worldly business, yet he will have us in midst thereof punctually to observe the Sabbath, and prefer the pleasure of communion with God in his ordinances to the joy of harvest, and to expect that harvest work will prosper the better for our religious observation of the Sabbath in harvest time. Also, the Lord specifies these seasons, because then we are under greater obligations to strict keeping of the Sabbath than at other times; because, 1st. The bodies of servants and cattle are then more toiled than at other times; and so have the more need of rest. 2d. People then have less time to worship God in their families and closets on week-days, because of the greatness of their labour; and therefore have need to improve the Sabbath the more diligently. 3d. In harvest we partake more of the fruits of God's bounty than at other times; and therefore should be the more thankful to God for his mercies, and especially for Christ, the mercy of mercies, who alone doth both purchase and sweeten all our mercies to us.

Now, is it not matter of deep regret that (notwithstanding God's special commandment, and our manifold obligations to the contrary) our churches in many places should be thinner, and fields thronger with idle people wandering therein in time of harvest, than at other times of the year?

OBJECT. When the weather is unseasonable and tempestuous through the week, doth it not become a work of necessity to sow or reap on the Sabbath, for preserving of food to man and beast?

Ans. If some particular men's crops were in hazard of being carried away, or lost by the inundation of a river, or the like, it were a work of necessity to endeavour the preservation of them upon the Sabbath; because the dispensation is extraordinary, the case not common nor general, and the damage irrecoverable in any ordinary way. But, as for sowing, reaping, or gathering in upon the Sabbath, (whatever be pretended from the season or weather for it,) I judge it unlawful, because the case is common and general; the hazard proceeds from the ordinary providence of God; and there is ground to expect God's sending better weather, according to the gracious promise, which we ought not to distrust, Gen. ix. 22, "While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest shall not cease." But if any distrust God's word, and ineroach upon his holy day with their labour, let them consider that God can easily blast the works of their hands, and east their business farther behind than their neighbours, who believe and wait upon the Lord. I have a certain account of a rich farmer in this nation, not many years ago, who in harvest-time (the weather having been very bad for some time before, and proving fair and dry on Saturday and the Lord's day) would needs cause his servants yoke his horses, and fall to the leading of his corn upon the Sabbath evening: but it pleased the Lord that he soon got other work to do; for that very night his house and goods took fire, and so their labour was quickly stopped, all hands being called to be employed in quenching of the fire. Many other instances might be given: but I proceed.

II. We must rest not only from all worldly employments on the Sabbath, but also from all worldly recreations, according to the word of God, and our Confession of Faith and Catechisms. But this point being much impugned and disputed by many, I shall treat it as distinctly and satisfactorily as I can.

Recreations are twofold, 1st. Some are natural and necessary, such as the refreshing our bodies with meat, drink, and sleep. These are recreations we cannot live or do business without upon any day, and therefore are both lawful and necessary upon the Sabbath; especially since we are thereby better disposed for performing the duties of the day. But, 2d. There are recreations which are voluntary and not necessary, freely chosen by people for their bodily pleasure and diversion; such as sports, pastimes, or games, whether more public or more private, such as playing at cards, dice, chess, tables, &c. or any sort of carnal music, such as whistling, singing, or playing on an instrument, or putting off the time with worldly converse, jesting, laughing, telling idle stories, walking and talking idly in the streets, or seeking our pleasure in the fields, though it be after public worship is over. Now, all such recreations being our own works, and for our own pleasure, and not subservient to the duties of God's worship, but hindrances thereto, are unlawful on the Sabbath-day, as being expressly contrary to that rest required in the fourth commandment, and to that plain word in Isa. lviii. 13, 14, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable, and shalt honour him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasures, nor speaking thine own words—then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob," &c. Now, can there be anything more directly levelled against carnal recreations, idle talking, walking, &c. on the Sabbath-day than this is? "We must turn away our foot from doing our own pleasure on it," that is, by travelling or walking for pleasure or recreation; nay, we must neither do our own ways, speak our own words, nor find our own pleasures on this day. But if people will, notwithstanding hereof, allow themselves to enter into idle diversions and loose recreations upon the Sabbath, I see not how they will free themselves of open rebellion against God: for God commands us to remember the Sabbath-day, not to delight ourselves by carnal recreations, but to keep it holy by divine exercises; and to spend it otherwise, is plainly to trample upon God's authority, and declare war against him.

OBJECT. But those who are in favour of Sabbath-day recreations, will tell me, that they condemn all such recreations in time of public worship, as well as we do: for the fourth commandment obliges us duly to attend public worship on the Sabbath, and forbear all worldly employments or recreations in time thereof; but, when that is once over, we may lawfully divert and recreate ourselves with such recreations as are modest and decent, and not unlawful for Christians on other days.

Ans. This supposes that the Sabbath lasts no longer than the public worship of the day, the contrary whereof I made evident before, and shall evince more fully afterwards. I showed that we are obliged to keep holy the whole Sabbath-day, not only the time of public worship, or from sun-rising to sun-setting, but the whole natural day, consisting of twenty-four hours. This being the seventh part of our time, and of the week, it is the Lord's, and consecrated for his use and service; and consequently no part of it is to be alienated from him, or applied for our pleasures or recreations.

I shall further confirm this truth by some more arguments.

I. If it was unlawful for God's people under the Old Testament, to spend any part of the Sabbath in carnal pleasures and recreations, it is unlawful for us also under the New: but the former is true; and therefore the latter. That such recreations were prohibited to the Jews, I believe none will deny, that is either acquainted with their ancient rules and constitutions, or that reads and believes the scriptures, particularly the fourth commandment, and Isa. lviii. 13, forecited. All that remains for me to prove is, that we are bound to abstain from those recreations upon the Sabbath, as well as the Jews; which I do thus: whatever the Jews were obliged to do upon moral reasons and grounds, that we are bound to do as much as they; but the Jews were bound to abstain from carnal recreations on the Sabbath, upon moral grounds, which concern us as well as them. I showed before, that the reasons of the fourth commandment are moral, and reach Christians as well as Jews. I mentioned five of them, and truly every one of them levels as much against worldly recreations on the Sabbath-day, as against worldly employments. I shall not resume them all here, but only insist a little on two of them.

1st. God's liberality in allowing us six days for our own use: this reason binds us as much as the Jews, to consecrate one day to the Lord for his service. God hath given as gracious discoveries of his bounty to us as to them; and shall we be so ungenerous or ungrateful as to encroach upon God's time, or rob him of any part of it, more than they? The very light of nature, and principles of sound reason, besides the commandment of God, plead strongly for this: that, since the Lord hath liberally given us six days for our use, we should, without grudge, give him one day for his service; and, since he gives us six whole days, it continues morally just and rational, that we should give him his one day whole too, and that we should spend as much of his day in holy duties as is ordinarily allowed on other days for servile labour, and that is the whole day, except what is allowed for necessary bodily refreshments, viz. eating and sleeping.

The second reason I shall insist on is, the Lord's propriety in the Sabbath, or in one day of seven. This reason binds us as much as it did the Jews; the Lord's right to a day in seven is the same that ever it was, otherwise the morality of the fourth commandment is not the same; but I have already demonstrated the contrary. The Christian Sabbath is called the Lord's day, as well as the Jewish Sabbath was called "the holy of the Lord," Isa. lviii. 13, to show that his propriety and title is the same. And it is observable, that the Lord in that one verse, calls it twice his holy day; and it is from this that the Lord takes the principal argument, which he there uses against carnal recreations on the Sabbath; "Ye shall not speak your own words, nor find your own pleasures on this day." Why? It is my holy day, the holy of the Lord: the seventh part of the week is mine, unalterably, set apart for holy uses, consecrated for my holy service. This argument is moral, and perpetually obliges all men, Christians as much as Jews. For, if a day in seven be dedicated to God, certainly every part of it, yea, the whole of it, belongs to him; and to alienate any part of it to our own use or pleasures, is sacrilege, and a direct infringement of the morality of the fourth commandment. The Lord tells us, Lev. xxvii. 28, "That every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord." Here is a day both by God and man, solemnly and perpetually devoted to the Lord; and accordingly the Lord, Isa. lviii. 13, asserts his just right and title to it, and twice in one breath calls it his holy day, and upon this account, prohibits carnal recreations upon it. And must it not be great presumption for any creature, to venture deliberately to rob his Creator of his just property, and put that which is holy, and solemnly consecrated to God, to common use? Remember what Solomon says, Prov. xx. 25, "It is a snare to the man who devoureth that which is holy, and after vows to make inquiry;" that is, it is a most dangerous thing, it brings heavy guilt, even God's curse and vengeance, upon the man that doeth so. Thus you see how the morality and unalterable reasons of the fourth commandment restrain Christians from carnal recreations on the Sabbath, as much as the Jews. The standing and perpetual rule, which God hath there laid down, can never be altered to the world's end. Still God hath one day, and man hath six; but if we take any part of God's day to our own use, more than the works of necessity and mercy require, then we have more than our six, and God hath less than his one, which is contrary to the commandment. Moreover, if it be in the power of man to alienate any part of this day from God, why not the whole of it? and so the Sabbath might come to be wholly abolished, which is absurd.

OBJECT. 1. The memory of Christ's resurrection on the Lord's day, calls us to more joy and gladness upon our Sabbath than the Jews were called to upon theirs.

ANS. This says nothing for carnal sports or recreations. It is not a worldly joy but a spiritual joy that we are called to on this day; such a joy as is expressed in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs. Again, if our mercies be this day greater than those the Jews had to commemorate, then we are in gratitude obliged to a more strict and holy sanctification of the day, to the honour and glory of the God and Fountain of our mercies; with which, I believe, no serious Christian will think carnal recreations very consistent.

OBJECT. 2. But these recreations are no where forbidden in the New Testament.

ANS. It is sufficient if they be forbidden in the Old Testament; for the Old Testament is our rule, as much as the New, in actions which are moral, or not ceremonial; and I see not what shadow of ground there is for calling abstinence from carnal pleasures on the Sabbath a thing ceremonial, or less binding upon us than the Jews. But moreover, if we compare the 58th chapter of Isaiah with the 56th, it will manifestly appear that the Lord, in enjoining his people strictly to observe the Sabbath, and abstain from carnal pleasures thereon, hath a respect to gospel-times after the Messiah's coming. Isaiah was a most evangelical prophet, and still had the gospel-times in his eye; wherefore some call him the evangelist Isaiah: so that, in recommending Sabbath-sanctification, and calling the Sabbath God's holy day, he doth not confine himself to the Jewish Sabbath, which was soon to be abolished; but hath an eye to the evangelical Sabbath, which was to continue to the end of the world,

Again, this is confirmed by the practice of the primitive Christians: they thought it unlawful to spend any part of the Lord's day in unnecessary diversions from holy things; yea, they accounted the strict sanctification of this day the prime character of a true saint. Augustine saith, "It is not enough that we keep three or four hours of this day, but that we observe the whole day." The ancient Christians did not think the work of the day was over when the public worship was ended. The younger Pliny tells us, "That they used this day to meet before day-light, and sing their hymns to Christ." And Tertullian, in his Apology, makes mention of their night prayers. They thought themselves bound to begin the work of the day so early, because Christ rose this morning before break of day. They neither thought nor pleaded that they had more freedom for worldly pleasures, or were less obliged to holy exercises this day, than the Jews upon their Sabbath.

Nay, if we consider things narrowly, it will be found, that Christians are under greater obligations to a strict and holy sanctification of the Sabbath under the gospel, than the Jews were under the law, for several reasons.

1. We have not only the creation, as the Jews had, but we have also the redemption of mankind, which is a greater work, this day to commemorate. Now, if the Jews were obliged to celebrate the day which was instituted for the memory of the creation, by a total abstinence from worldly employments and recreations; much more are we bound to a strict sanctification of the day which is instituted for commemorating of both creation and redemption. We have far greater mercies to commemorate this day than the Jews had, viz. "the redeeming love of a crucified Jesus, and his glorious victory over death and hell;" and consequently have greater work and employment, and ought to be the more active and busy in doing it; and also more delightful work, and therefore should be the less inclined to weary in performing it.

2. We have a far more pleasant and excellent manner of worship to perform upon the Sabbath than the Jews had. Their worship was attended with manifold rites, washings, and sacrifices, which were both chargeable and toilsome to their bodies; but ours is spiritual, pleasant, and easy.

3. The Jews had many other festival days to observe, by a strict and holy rest, beside the Sabbath; but, under the gospel, God hath freed us from the yoke of all other festivals, and hath instituted none but the Lord's day, which, in gratitude, we ought to observe more strictly and religiously than the Jews.

4. By baptism, we come under more strict and solemn engagements to keep God's commandments, than the Jews; and also we have more special promises of his Spirit to help us in keeping of them, than the Jews had. For, in the New Testament times, the Spirit is poured out in a larger measure than in the Old.

So that from the whole I infer, that if the Jews under the Old Testament were bound to keep the whole Sabbath-day, and wholly to abstain from their own pleasures upon it, yea, count the service of the Sabbath a delight, according to Isa. lviii. 13, though in itself it was burdensome: much more ought we, under the gospel, to keep the whole Sabbath strictly, and call it a delight, when the work and service of it is so pleasant and easy.

II. Another argument, which I shall bring against the foresaid Sabbath-day recreations, shall be taken from the nature and greatness of the Sabbath-day's work; and I shall form it thus:

If the work of the Sabbath be so necessary, weighty, and various, that it requires the whole day to be spent therein, and challenges all our soul's faculties to be employed thereabout; then carnal recreations are unlawful thereupon:

But the former is true; therefore, &c.

The connection of the major proposition is evident; for that which is weighty and necessary ought always to take place of that which is not so.

As for the minor proposition, that the work of the Sabbath is so great and necessary, is plain, if we consider, that the Sabbath is the great market-day of heaven; upon which we ought to take in, and lay up provision for our souls for the rest of the week, yea, for eternity itself. It is the usual day of sinners' conversion and acquaintance with God: it is the day wherein we have our sins to bewail, our needs to get supplied, our hard hearts to get melted, our dead affections to get raised, our guilty consciences to get disburdened, our dark minds to get enlightened, our weak graces to get strengthened. We have this day God's word to teach our families, our children to instruct, Christ's love to commemorate, death and judgment to provide for, and our Redeemer to treat with about the saving of our souls. In a word, this is a day wherein we are to make visits to God, and receive visits from him. Now, I do appeal to every serious soul, that knows anything of real godliness, if these things be not so weighty and necessary, as to require the whole of the day, and the attendance of all our powers and faculties. And if so, then we are bound carefully to avoid everything that may prove an avocation or diversion from doing them.

III. Another argument may run thus:

If the worldly circumstances of the generality be such as they can have but little time through the week for worshipping God, minding their souls, and preparing for eternity; then it is their duty closely and diligently to employ the Lord's day for these ends, in which God grants them freedom for the same:

But the former is true; therefore, &c.

The connection of the major proposition is certain; for, if our whole lives be little enough for accomplishing the great work of our salvation, the seventh day, or seventh part of our time, is never to be thought too much.

And for the truth of the minor proposition, that the circumstances of the generality are such as above represented, I do appeal to the experience of the whole country where we live. How many poor men are there every where, tradesmen, tenants, servants, workmen, &c. whose worldly poverty and necessities are so great and many, that they can scarce get so much spare time from their work and labour through the week, as is sufficient for eating and sleeping? They are commonly so toiled through the day, that, at night, they are hardly fit for anything but sleep. Now, what time have these through the week for holy duties and religious exercises? What time for reading and praying, and learning the principles of Christianity? But since God is graciously pleased to give them the Sabbath, in which they may retire from the world, and employ themselves wholly in the foresaid religious concerns; have they not the greatest need, closely and diligently to spend and improve the whole Sabbath therein, without any kind of unnecessary diversion from the same?

Are there not many poor servants, whose masters are so severe, that they will not allow them half an hour in a day to serve God, or mind their souls? and should they not greedily lay hold on the opportunity of the Sabbath for these ends, and let no part of this blessed day pass away idly? Now, for ministers or others to tell such people, that the whole Sabbath-day is too long for the foresaid spiritual exercises, and teach them to spend away part of it in carnal recreations or idleness, in my opinion, is a most compendious way to promote atheism, ignorance, and profanity amongst them. And, doth not daily experience confirm this sad truth? Do we not see, that profaning the Sabbath opens a door to all profanity? and that in those places where people neglect the Sabbath, or spend the half of the day in recreations and idleness, there ignorance and immorality of all sorts abound, and family worship and piety are neglected, whereas, on the contrary, in those places where the whole Sabbath is closely observed, and recreations discouraged, there we see Christian knowledge, morality, the fear of God, and family godliness, flourish and prosper? Ocular experience shows us that the fourth commandment is a hedge about all the rest; and the religious observation of the whole Sabbath-day, is the most effectual method for promoting Christian knowledge and universal piety. People may hear a sermon or two on a Sabbath, and yet lie still in their ignorance, if they spend the rest of the day in idleness and recreations, and neglect the private means of reading, praying, catechising, conference, repetition of sermons, &c. I never expect to see knowledge or piety flourish in congregations or families, till these means be used, and pains taken, after the public worship is over, to instruct children and servants. Oh! doth not the lamentable ignorance of many poor souls plead aloud for the strict and diligent observation of the whole Lord's day? Had ministers and others a due sense of the misery and perishing state of ignorant souls, I am sure they would press it more, and never set up to teach them carnal recreations on this day.

O poor men, servants and labourers, in the name of God I exhort you to spend more of God's day in heaven's work. You have little time through the week for it; therefore God, in pity to your souls, looses you this day from your weekly work, and cries to you from on high, "Come up hither;" lay aside the thoughts of things below, and "set your affections on things above." As your bodies rest this day from labour, let your souls think on eternal rest in heaven, and use all the appointed means for attending to it.

IV. A fourth argument I make use of is this:

If God prohibits worldly employments on the Sabbath, then certainly he discharges carnal recreations:

But the former is true; therefore, &c.

The minor proposition is undeniable; so that all I have to prove is the connection of the major proposition, which may be easily done thus. The great reason of prohibiting worldly employments on the Sabbath is, because they hinder the holy employment of the soul, and would interrupt the duties of the Sabbath. But if carnal recreations hinder the duties of the Sabbath, and spiritual employment of the soul, as much as servile labour; then by parity of reason they are forbidden also. But so it is, that they hinder as much, yea, more than servile labour would do. Nay, I may be bold to say, that a man may be more serious, and have his mind more exercised with heavenly meditations, when ploughing, sowing or threshing, than when he is about carnal entertainments, recreations, or pastimes; or when he is in vain promiscuous company, jesting, sporting, and telling stories, or walking and talking idly in the streets or fields. These far more distract the heart from God's service, than servile labour doth. A man will find himself more indisposed for prayer and holy duties after them, than after the works of his calling. It was the sense of this that made Augustine say, "That it were better for maids to spin, or for men to plough, than for them to dance and sport on the Sabbath-day." He very well knew, that carnal pleasures are inconsistent with devotion, and wholly unfit the soul for communion with God, which is the work of the Sabbath. Hence we see, lovers of pleasure, and lovers of God, are set in opposition, 2 Tim. iii. 4.

I might go on to multiply arguments to this purpose; but this truth is so clear from sound reason and the word of God, and particularly from Isa. lviii. 13, to such as believe the scriptures, that I think it almost needless to say any more.

But, as this truth hath many adversaries, (and no wonder though Satan muster up all his forces against it, since it levels so directly against his kingdom,) I shall endeavour to answer the chief objections brought against it.

Particularly, there is one J. S., who calls himself a presbyter of the Episcopal church of Scotland, that in his pamphlets upon the Sabbath, lately published, pleads for Sabbath-day recreations, both as lawful and dutiful, after the public worship is over; providing (as he qualifies them) there be nothing immodest or indecent therein, nor too much time spent thereby. Though he neither tells how much time he allows for them, nor what are the immodest or indecent things which he disallows in them; but leaves every man to his own construction and choice therein.

I shall consider the strength of the arguments adduced by him and others, for these recreations; and I shall begin with the chief one.

OBJECT. I. To hinder these recreations after sermon, were to bind us, who are the disciples of Christ, to as strict a rest, and as burdensome an observation of the Sabbath, as were the Jews under the law, which were to judaize, and build that again that which Christ hath destroyed.

ANS. 1. The fourth commandment being moral and perpetual, as hath been proven, doth oblige us to as strict a rest and cessation from worldly actions, as it did the Jews. I grant indeed, the Pharisees invented a great many superstitious additions to the rest of the Sabbath, which were not of divine appointment, and would have all to conform thereto, as if they had been divine laws. They assigned such a precise space for a Sabbath-day's journey; they frequently would not allow the relieving of men's bodies, and beasts in distress this day: some came this length, that though they allowed beasts to be fed or watered, yet, if any of them fell into a ditch, they must not draw him out on this day, but feed him where he was till the Sabbath was over. Nay, I have read of Jews so ridiculously superstitious, that they would not allow themselves to be drawn out of pits or dangerous places into which they had fallen on the Sabbath, and therefore have smarted with death for their folly. Nay, further, they taught, that it was unlawful to defend themselves against their enemies this day; by which means they sometimes became a prey to them. Till Mattathias the priest better instructed them, as we are told by Josephus, and the author of the first book of the Maccabees.

I say, these were nothing but human additions; for the same things were lawful to the Jews on the Sabbath, that are allowed to us, viz. works of piety, necessity and mercy; as manifestly appears by the commentary which Christ gives upon this commandment, both by his words and actions. Christ defends his practice in healing, and his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on the Sabbath; and shows, that the works of necessity and mercy, the relieving of men and beasts in distress, were lawful on the Sabbath. Our blessed Saviour, by his reasoning against the Pharisees on this subject, intends only to reprove their superstitious additions, and to show what things were lawful to the Jews on the Sabbath from the beginning, but not what things are now lawful to us under the gospel; for he gives no more liberty for worldly things this day than what was before, since he "came not to destroy the law."

2. I grant indeed, that our Saviour hath freed Christians under the gospel from the Jewish method of celebrating the Sabbath, by a typical service and ceremonial worship, consisting of sacrifices, washings, and manifold rites, which were a burdensome yoke. Now, to re-introduce abrogated ceremonies on the Sabbath, is (I confess) to judaize, and rebuild what Christ hath destroyed; and whoever are chargeable with this in any degree, let them see to it. But what man will call abstaining from carnal recreations on the Sabbath, an abrogated Jewish ceremony? or compare the strict sanctification of the Lord's day, by the pleasant evangelical sacrifices of prayer and praise, to the burdensome method of observing the Jewish Sabbath? Christ hath told us, that his "yoke is easy, and his burden is light;" and all his experienced disciples will set their seal to the truth of it.

For my part, I do not see how a man can own the morality and unalterable obligation of the fourth commandment, and not grant that we are as strictly tied to moral duties on the Sabbath as the Jews, and consequently to the same holy rest and diligence in the service of God upon it; since the change made by Christ's coming is only in circumstantial or ceremonial things, viz. the day of the week, and the nature of the service or sacrifice requisite upon it.

OBJECT. "But, besides the nature of the service and worship, there were several peculiar things required of the Jews upon the Sabbath, not binding upon us. Particularly, concerning the not dressing of meat, going out of the place, kindling of fire, bearing of burdens, the nature of the punishment of Sabbath-breaking, double sacrifices," &c.

ANS. 1. If any of the foresaid things were typical or ceremonial, then indeed it is abrogated by Christ's coming, and not binding upon us. But this will no wise alter the case with respect to abstaining from carnal recreations on the Sabbath, which can never be reckoned typical or ceremonial; it being what is perpetually moral, and necessary to the suitable sanctification of this holy day, in all ages of the world.

2. Let the foresaid instances be narrowly considered, and it will be found that there is no such peculiar thing therein as is commonly imagined.

I. As to dressing of meat on the Sabbath, the only place whence the prohibition of it is inferred is Exod. xvi. 23, concerning the preparing of manna. There are several interpreters, who think that the dressing of it on the Sabbath is not here forbidden; but that they are there ordered to lay up a part of it undressed for the Sabbath. But granting, as the most part of interpreters do, that the dressing of the manna is there discharged, this will not infer a discharge of dressing any kind of meat on the Sabbath: since there were some things peculiar to the manna, beyond other meat: For,

1. There was a particular promise made concerning it that was not made concerning other kinds of food, viz. that it should not spoil nor corrupt. For, in that hot country, dressed meat could not easily be preserved good and wholesome over night.

2. There was much more servile work requisite in preparing manna than other kinds of food; it behoved to be "grinded in mills, beat in mortars, and baked in pans," Num. xi. 8. Now, so much servile labour about preparing of food was not fit upon the Sabbath, since it did not tend to the rest or refreshing of the body, but rather to the toiling of it; and likewise it took up many hands, and would have hindered them from sanctifying the day. So that there is no peculiarity in this prohibition; for, were we in their case, and had manna to feed on, it were not lawful for us to prepare it on the Sabbath, more, than for the Jews: but it is certain that they did dress other meat on the Sabbath, that required not such servile labour. Only we are taught by this prohibition, as well as the Jews, to be careful to prepare that meat, which requires much toil and pains, before the Sabbath come; and so to order matters about our bodily provisions the day before, that servants may be as little hindered from sanctifying the Sabbath, and the work of the day as little interrupted as possible.

II. As to the second instance, the prohibition of "going out of their places on the Sabbath, Exod. xvi. 29," it is plain from the context, that it is to be meant of going out to seek manna, it being an unnecessary servile work, and therefore unlawful on the Sabbath-day. For though the Jews were restrained from going through the streets or fields on the Sabbath, for worldly business, recreation, or putting off the time; yet not from all walking or travelling, when either the works of piety or necessity required it; for a "Sabbath-day's journey" was allowed, Acts i. 12. The Pharisees indeed stinted it to two thousand cubits, (which some make one mile, others two, according to the different cubits in use among them) as this was to be the distance of the utmost part of the camp of Israel in the wilderness, from the tabernacle, to which they were bound to repair for worship on the Sabbath-day. But this was no good warrant for stinting the Sabbath-day's journey to such a precise space; since it must be either more or less, according to the distance of people's dwellings from the public ordinances, to attend which a person may go many miles, and not profane the Sabbath. The Shunammith woman, as appears from 2 Kings iv. 23, used to travel on the Sabbath to the prophet Elisha, to attend public worship, and wait on his teaching.

III. As to the prohibition of "kindling fire," Exod. xxxv. 3. If we consider the place and context, we will find that it is only kindling of fire for servile work, particularly for the work of rearing up the tabernacle, that they were then about, which is there forbidden. This is the opinion of Vatablus, Junius, and Termellius, and the best commentators. For God is here giving directions for making the tabernacle; and, to prevent their thinking that the nature of the work, or haste required in doing it, would justify their working at it on the Sabbath, he first discharges all working on that day, verse 2, and then more particularly, verse 3, he forbids the work of kindling fire, as that of smiths, founders, or any others, for preparing materials for the tabernacle. And so he will have that work, though for a sacred use, give place to that which was more immediately sacred and necessary, viz. the present sanctification of the Sabbath. This doth not prohibit kindling of fire for the works of necessity or mercy, which presently tend to the better sanctifying of the Sabbath; since this, for the servile work of the tabernacle, would have hindered the present sanctification of it; whereas kindling of fire for warming our bodies, preparing meat, or for showing light, do not hinder, but tend to promote the sanctifying of the Sabbath. Yet we should take care that we do not extend our liberty this way too far, so as to make solemn feasts on the Sabbath, which require much servile work, and hinder the duties of the Sabbath. For though we be not forbidden on the Lord's day to kindle a fire for dressing meat, yet we must beware we make not such a flame as shall kindle the fire of God's wrath against us on that day.

IV. As to the bearing of burdens on the Sabbath, Christ hath given no more liberty to us this way, than to the Jews; for though he commanded the impotent man on the Sabbath, John v. 10, "to take up his bed and walk," yet this was no carrying of a burden for any secular design, but a mean required for glorifying of God, and publishing the miracle.

V. As to their punishing of Sabbath-breaking with death, Num. xv. this belonged to the judicial law, which was peculiar to the Jewish commonwealth, and doth not bind other nations, except so much of it as is of universal moral equity; for the peculiar circumstances of nations require peculiar statutes and punishments for some particular crimes. But, in the next place, there appears to have been some speciality in that Sabbath-breaker's case; for we do not find that Sabbath-breaking was always so punished afterwards. If we read verses 30 and 31, we see God threatening death to all such as sin presumptuously, and with an high hand: and in the very next verse, the Sabbath-breaker is brought in guilty; which makes it probable that his crime was attended with the aggravation of presumptuous sinning.

VI. As to the double sacrifices required on this Sabbath, "two lambs in the morning, and two in the evening," Num. xxviii. 9, 10. I grant they were a heavy burden, in regard of the great expense and bodily toil the Jews were put to thereby, from which Christ hath happily freed us. But, excepting what was typical and ceremonial in their worship and sacrifices, there is nothing here peculiar to them; for otherwise we are still as much bound to double sacrifices on the Sabbath as the Jews. We are bound to double our devotion, our prayers, our praises, &c. this day, beyond other days. Yea, as I showed before, we are more called to it than the Jews; which also is confirmed from Ezek. xlvi. 4, 5, where, instead of the four lambs required on the Sabbath in Moses's time, we see that in Ezekiel's temple-service, which points at gospel-times, the Sabbath offerings were to be "six lambs and a ram;" intimating not only the continuance, but the advancement of the Sabbath-sanctification in the days of the Messiah, and that Christians should exceed the Jews in zeal and diligence in keeping of the Sabbath, and should multiply duties, and offer up a greater plenty of spiritual sacrifices, and be more active and intense about the works of the Sabbath, than they were. And good reason for it, since we have both the creation and redemption to commemorate this day, and a more excellent worship to perform upon it.

But I proceed to examine the rest of J. S.'s arguments for Sabbath-day recreations.

OBJECT. II. "Our Saviour saith, that the Sabbath is made for man, and not man for the Sabbath," Mark ii. 27.

Ans. This word furthers not his purpose; for Christ adduceth it in defence of his disciples "plucking the ears of corn on the Sabbath," for satisfying their hunger, which was a work of necessity; and not in defence of carnal diversions and recreations.

But, that we may take up the true meaning of the passage, we must consider, that, if by Sabbath be understood the true sanctification of the day by sincere worshipping and serving of God, then certainly man was made for it. But, if Sabbath be taken, according to the Pharisees' sense here, for the mere external rest of the day (as Christ certainly understands it in this place) then indeed the Sabbath was made for man; this external rest being but a mean for the true sanctification of the Sabbath, and designed for the special good of man, partly that his body might have some repose from labour, and chiefly that he might have a solemn opportunity to worship God, and hold communion with him. Now, says our Saviour, it were unreasonable to think that a law, intended for a privilege and benefit to man, should be improved to his hurt and ruin. The great design of the Sabbath, pleads for "works of necessity and mercy;" for how can God be served, or the soul profited on this day, if care be not taken for preserving the life, and supporting the body, in order thereto? But how this text authorises carnal diversions on the Sabbath, I see not; unless one should say, that Christ meant when he said, "The Sabbath is made for man," that it is made for his corporeal pleasures; which is most absurd, and directly contrary to Isa. lviii. 13.

OBJECT. III. "The hindering of men from Sabbath-day recreations, is an encroachment upon our Christian liberty."

Ans. I would gladly know what he means by Christian liberty. I take the gospel sense of it to be this, that Christ hath purchased for believers under the gospel, not only liberty from the dominion, guilt, and punishment of sin, the bondage of satan, and sting of death; but also hath liberated them from the yoke of the ceremonial law, to which the Old Testament saints were subjected; and likewise from the curse of the moral law; yea, and from the power and obligation of it too, as a covenant of works; so as they are neither to be justified nor condemned thereby. But that he hath obtained any liberty to us from the obligation of the moral law, as the rule of life and manners, more than the Jews had, I know no orthodox Protestant that will assert it. Now, if the fourth commandment be a part of the moral law, (as J. S. owns,) to pretend to any freedom from the strict observation of it, and what is truly moral in it under the gospel, is unchristian licentiousness, and not Christian liberty. Christ never purchased a liberty to us, to be less religious, or less diligent in prayer, praises, and other duties, than the Jews; for this were no true liberty. Our true liberty lies in a readiness to obey the holy will of God, our only rightful Lord; and in being in a capacity to pursue our chief good and great end; and the more we are disabled from this, the more we are in bondage. And hence it is, that the Psalmist saith, Psal. cxix. 45, "I will walk at liberty, for I seek thy precepts." But for any, under pretence of Christian liberty, to walk loosely and licentiously, is to destroy the end of Christian liberty, which is, "That, being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, we might serve the Lord without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life," Luke i. 74, 75

OBJECT. IV. The restraining of these recreations is not a good plan for promoting godliness; for, instead of this, it drives people to the other extreme.

Ans. 1. Though it were good policy, I am sure it is bad divinity: for, we must not do evil that good may come of it.

2. It is no new thing for men's lusts and corruptions to grow more impetuous, and be the more irritated, by the restraints and prohibitions of God's holy and just laws, Rom. vii. 8. Yet no Christian ever pleaded that these laws should be either dispensed with or slackened upon this account; but still owned the fault to be in our own corrupt nature, and not in God's excellent laws. If all these precepts were to be dispensed with, that are grating to the lusts of carnal men, then few of them would be binding; for every spiritual duty is unpleasant to them.

3. If inquiry be made into the state of the flocks of those ministers who use this policy, I apprehend it will be found to have but very bad success in promoting godliness, or even morality, either on Sabbath or week-day. Nay, on the contrary, these Sabbath-day recreations will be found a policy of hell, wherever the experiment is tried, for banishing piety, and promoting all sorts of profanity. Whereas, in those places where they are conscientiously suppressed, Sabbath-holiness, family worship, and true piety, are known to be in a flourishing condition.

4. If magistrates and ministers would cordially join hands in the execution of civil and ecclesiastical laws against Sabbath-breaking and profaneness, the imperious eruptions of men's lusts on the Sabbath would soon, through the blessing of God, be effectually dammed up and restrained. A resolute resisting of the devil is the best way to overcome him; whereas, yielding to him in any degree, is the ready way to be vanquished by him.

OBJECT. V. The Christian Sabbath (saith J. S.) is a festival, and consequently solacing ourselves by a cheerful and mutual conversation together in our houses on that day (if there be nothing immodest or indecent thereon, nor too much time spent thereby) is not only lawful, but dutiful also.

ANS. 1. I suppose he means the convening of friends and neighbours to carnal feasts and entertainments on the Sabbath, and holding good fellowship together, after the manner of the world: for, if he meant any other conversation, I think he would not caution against the spending of too much time therein; for there is little need of any such caution with respect to spiritual conversation: alas, there is little time spent therein. J. S. had employed his pen much better, if he had recommended this sort of conversation on the Sabbath. For that of a carnal sort, people are apt enough to learn without a teacher.

2. I freely own the Lord's day to be a festival, but it is for the soul, not for the body. This is the day in which Christians are brought into the banquetting-house; but the fare is celestial, the dainties spiritual. On this day they are feasted and filled, but it is with the fatness of God's house, and the rivers of his pleasures. This day they are made joyful, but not with carnal joy and mirth; the pleasures are spiritual, the joy is divine. I do not say that this day ought to be kept as a fast-day for afflicting the body; no, it is necessary the body should be seasonably refreshed and supported, that it may be serviceable to the soul in the work of the day and service of God, and may call the Sabbath a delight, rejoice in God's goodness, and be cheerful in the celebration of the love and praises of our Redeemer. But to say, that set feasts, carnal entertainments, and good fellowship, are proper duties on the Lord's day, is strange doctrine; for then I see not how carnal mirth and jollity can be excluded; and so God's holy day shall be turned into a carnival, destructive to the blessed design of it. Modest and honest provision for our tables on the Lord's day, is what I do not discommend: but I say, "Set feasts, sumptuous entertainments, and too liberal partaking of the creatures, are not proper on this day; as they are apt to indispose us for the duties of the day, by rendering the body dull and sluggish, and inclining us to drowsiness and sleep;" as also, the preparing them detains servants from the ordinances, and diverts them both from public and private duties necessary for the sanctifying of the Sabbath. It is observable of our blessed pattern, Jesus Christ, that though he frankly went into the houses of Pharisees, and others, on week-days, when invited; yet on the Sabbath-day, it is only said, he went into one of their houses to eat bread, Luke xiv. 1, that is, to take such moderate refreshment as was suitable for that day, and the work of it; teaching us, that on this day we should, like Moses and Jethro, with the elders of Israel, Exod. xviii. 12, "eat bread before God," that is, with a deep sense of his all-seeing eye, and special caution against all manner of excess, or anything that may indispose us for holy duties.

Moreover, observe what manner of conversation Christ had at this Sabbath-day's refreshment. He indeed solaced himself and the company with a mutual and cheerful conversation, but it was wholly spiritual and heavenly, concerning the feast provided for us in the gospel. This was suitable Sabbath-day's conversation, that needed not J. S.'s caution against spending too much time therein.

But J. S. is so zealous for those Sabbath-day recreations and entertainments, that he is not content to prove the lawfulness of them, but he will have them binding on us, as necessary duties. But I would fain know how any man will prove the dutifulness of them. Pray, where is the commandment for them? where is the advantage of them? wherein do they promote the great ends of the Sabbath, God's glory and souls' edification? I think I have clearly proved the contrary. I shall only add this word; I make a supposition, that a poor soul is brought under a law work, or deep convictions, like the jailor, by means of the sermons on the Lord's day: will any man say, that it would be his duty, presently after, to go to these feasts, entertainments, and recreations, and thereby hinder or quench the operations of God's Spirit on his soul? I would rather think it his duty to retire from the world and company, to prayer and self-examination, in order to entertain and cherish the Spirit's work on his heart.

OBJECT. VI. But these recreations and entertainments will not hinder the sanctification of the Sabbath, but rather help to quicken and prepare us for our succeeding devotions.

ANS. I am persuaded that those who exercise themselves to godliness, and are acquainted with the power of it, will not talk so; nay, they will tell, from their sad experience, that the meeting of promiscuous companies on the Lord's day, for carnal entertainments, vain walking, talking and sporting, are so far from fitting us for after devotions or spiritual exercises, that they directly tend to deaden the heart, suppress convictions, quench any warmth of affections and liveliness of frame wrought in us by the public ordinances, and so render us the more indisposed for spiritual employments. Instead of quickening and disposing our minds for returning to God's worship, they the more increase our aversion thereto. Experienced Christians can tell, that private meditation, reading, or Christian conference, are far better means to fit us for our evening devotions on the Lord's day, than carnal recreations.

OBJECT. VII. Some intermission for recreation is needful; for we cannot be employed in spiritual exercises a whole day. This would be a great toil to the spirits, especially of such who have been sore toiled with servile labour through the week. Nay, the best are ready to faint and weary in the continued exercise of piety.

ANS. 1. The extent of God's precepts is not to be measured by our ability or inability; neither can our impotency, to give obedience to God's commandments, in the least invalidate or weaken the authority thereof.

2. By the same argument, the Jews might have pleaded that they were not bound to rest the whole Sabbath, nor spend the whole day in religious exercises; for they were liable to the same infirmities that are incident to us.

3. I frankly allow what refreshment is necessary for supporting nature, and for the better performance of the duties of the Sabbath: but, for the foresaid carnal diversions, they are so far from being necessary for furthering the work of the Sabbath, that they are great hindrances thereto.

4. If labouring people need recreation for their bodies, then let them have some time on weekdays for it.—If for their minds, I know no such fit recreation as the joyful commemoration of the love of Christ, and our redemption from hell and wrath through his blood, and the cheerful singing the praises of our Maker and Redeemer, which is the very work of the Sabbath. Is it not a recreation for Christ's sheep to feed in his green pastures, and to be led by him beside the still waters? to behold the waters of life, clear as crystal, flowing betwixt the banks of ordinances? to get a pleasant prospect from mount Nebo, of the promised land? Is it not a recreation for a condemned man, to come and hear his pardon pronounced? for a hungry man, to get pleasant food and heavenly dainties? for a sick man, to get all his diseases healed? Must it not be a carnal and stupid heart, that will call these a burden or weariness? There are many who weary not to spend whole days at markets, in buying and selling; nay, whole days and nights in gaming and drinking: and, will you call a day spent in such pleasant and refreshing work a toil, which is the highest privilege of a rational creature? Surely, no workman can be so glad of a day's ease from his sore labour, as a believer should be to have a day's release from his worldly business, that he may freely and entirely converse with his God and Saviour, and rejoice in his bounty and redeeming love.

5. Every Sabbath we meet with many unavoidable interruptions, which take us off from the duties of God's worship, though we go not to contrive unnecessary diversions and recreations for this end. There is much of every Sabbath spent in preparing food, dressing and feeding our bodies, going to the church, and returning from it, attending children, cattle, &c. O how many are our avocations and intermissions in serving our Creator and Redeemer on the Lord's day, which we cannot shun! And shall we think the rest of the day too much for this important work, that we must go seeking carnal diversions to drive it away?

6. I grant, the best are ready to grow weary of duty, because of the aversion of our corrupt nature to that which is good; but carnal recreations will never cure this aversion, nor overcome that weariness, but will certainly indulge and increase the same. The best way to cure weariness (next to the grace of God) is practice and experience in religion, and sincere wrestling and striving against it. Resisting overcomes it; but giving way to it doth increase it.

7. The Lord knows the carnality and weariness that our hearts are naturally prone to in the work of the Sabbath; wherefore, for remedy thereof, he hath graciously appointed variety of exercises on the Sabbath-day, that, when we weary of one, another may be our recreation. Are you weary of hearing? then recreate yourselves with prayer: if of that, then recreate yourselves with singing of God's praises; if of that, then recreate yourselves in reading God's word, and other good books: if of that, then recreate yourselves with meditations: if you weary of that, then recreate yourselves with Christian conference, repeating the sermons, instructing your families, &c. If you weary of public duties, then go to private; if of these, go to secret duties. Is there not here a delightful variety of pleasant spiritual employments, sufficient to recreate ourselves with for one day, without needing the help of any sensual diversion, to put off the precious time of this blessed day? How think you to spend a whole eternity in spiritual exercises, when you weary so much of one day? Whatever carnal men think, I am sure a godly soul will be far from counting this work a burden: hearing and reading the scriptures is a far less burden to him, than recreations and pastimes would be; for God's "testimonies are his delight, and he rejoices in them more than in all riches," Psal. exix. Yea, nothing in the world is such a burden to him on the Sabbath as his ill heart, his little delight in the Sabbath, and shortcomings in the duties thereof; and nothing such a pleasure and recreation to him, as when he can win above these, and get his heart lifted up in the ways of the Lord.

I am sure, it is no unpleasant work that God calls us to on the Sabbath; who, but a wicked man, will count it a wearisome thing to think on Christ, and his dying love? to hear the sweet messages of free grace, and rejoice in the foresights and foretastes of his everlasting love. You know the black character of those, who of old called Sabbath-work a burden, and said, "when will the Sabbath be gone?" Amos viii. 5. This temper stands in opposition to gospel-heliness: therefore I think, J. S. and every gospel minister should be so far from indulging it, by giving way to carnal recreations and diversions, that he should do what lies in his power to reprove, discourage, and remedy it. And if ministers would be at pains to preach and pray with life and awakening seriousness, and afford their people a pleasant variety of wholesome discourse concerning Christ and eternity, it would be a far better way to cure their weariness, than to prescribe carnal recreations on the Lord's day. For this is a cure that both strengthens the disease, and is as bad as the disease.

OBJECT. VIII. "But walking in the fields on the Lord's day seems to be a harmless practice; why will you not allow of that?"

ANS. Whenever the works of piety, necessity, or mercy require it, it is allowable; but to do it idly for putting off the time, or for worldly employments or recreations, is what the word of God condemns. It is not only lawful, but dutiful to walk abroad, if it be for attending public ordinances, visiting the sick, or other Sabbath duties; for then it is not for finding our own pleasure, which is disallowed by Isa. lviii. 13; Exod. xvi. 29. And, by the same rule, I cannot condemn persons in ill health walking abroad, or taking the air, if their health truly require it; for the Lord loves mercy rather than sacrifice. Nor do I condemn a person's going to the fields this day, to have opportunity (like Isaac) in the evening, for secret meditation and prayer, when he wants conveniency for it within doors; for a walk thus improved, may be a walk to heaven, and is very consistent with walking with God. Only take these two cautions;

1. If you walk abroad this day, choose to do it alone as much as possible; for people going in troops to the fields occasions idleness, vain talking, sporting, and mispending precious Sabbath-time. The society of vain persons helpeth to embolden one another in sin and folly, and maketh them more incapable of spiritual exercises, than when single and apart. Yea, I am persuaded, that these companies of people, who so commonly go a walking together on the Lord's day, do not so much as pretend to be spiritually employed. Alas! they who know them best, can tell that they are most unfit for it at such occasions. Should any come and speak to them about death and eternity, Christ and their souls, or propose any serious question concerning the sermon they have been hearing, I fear he might expect to be mocked and laughed at by them for his pains.

2. Let your walking abroad, in any of the foresaid cases, be so ordered, that it may not give scandal, nor ensnare others. Study to do it so privately, that others may not be hardened or encouraged in their loose recreations, on this day, by your example. For even these things which are lawful, and otherwise necessary in themselves, are not to be done when they may prove a scandal or temptation to others to sin; for, in such cases, we ought to deny ourselves of our lawful liberty.

OBJECT. "We find two of Christ's disciples travelling to Emmaus and back again on the Lord's day, and Christ met with them, and did not reprove them for it," Luke xxiv

ANS. This was the first Lord's day of all, and was not then fully instituted, or at least, made known to the disciples; for they were not then assured of Christ's resurrection. Again, walking abroad this day, for promoting the works of piety, for declaring God's glory, or preaching the gospel, is not unlawful. And such was this walking of our Saviour, and his two disciples on their return to Jerusalem this day.

Now, having fully considered this point, of the negative sanctification of the Sabbath, or the holy rest requisite upon it; I proceed to treat of the positive sanctification of the day, and of the holy exercises required therein.

SECTION II.

CONCERNING THE POSITIVE SANCTIFICATION OF THE SABBATH, AND THE HOLY EXERCISES REQUISITE UPON IT.

The rest of the Sabbath is not a lazy idle rest. No; it is a holy active sort of rest that is required upon it. Though we cease from works of one kind, yet we must be diligent in works of another kind.

What I have to say on this head may be summed up in the following directions.

1. Concerning the disposition and frame of the soul, needful for sanctifying the Sabbath.

2. Concerning the holy duties requisite upon the Sabbath.

3. Concerning the special order, method, and manner, wherein these duties are to be performed.

4. Concerning those particular sins, whereby the sanctification of the Sabbath is hindered, or the Sabbath profaned.

DIRECTION I.—CONCERNING THE FRAME OF SPIRIT FIT FOR SANCTIFYING THE LORD'S DAY.

The most suitable frame and disposition of soul, which I can recommend for sanctifying the Sabbath-day, is that of John the divine, Rev. i. 10, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." It is a most comprehensive expression, and a noble pattern for our imitation; wherefore I shall inquire into the meaning and import of it. It is probable it may imply something extraordinary with respect to John; he might be in some singular spiritual ecstacy or transport, which ordinary Christians cannot attain to: nevertheless, the expression imports something attainable, and which ought to be endeavoured by all true Christians on the Lord's day.

To be in the Spirit, may be taken either as respecting the Spirit of God, or our own spirits, or both. For certainly both the Spirit of God, and our own spirits, are necessary, and to be much employed, in the sanctification of the Lord's day. Wherefore, taking the expression as including both, I conceive, to be "in the Spirit on the Lord's day," imports these things:

1. A special dependence upon God's Spirit for conduct and assistance, in order to the right performance of the duties of the Sabbath, and exercise of the graces therein: for, without the Spirit's aid, we can neither pray, praise, hear, read, or do any thing aright.

2. The "serving of God with our spirits," as Rom. i. 9, or "worshipping him in spirit," John iv. 24, and performing the duties of the Sabbath with inward sincerity of heart. "The Lord desires truth in the inward parts." He saith, "My son, give me thy heart;" not, give me thy ear, thy tongue, thy lips, thy hands, or thy knees; for these may be given without the heart: but the heart can never be bestowed without these as its attendants. This is so necessary in all our duties and approaches to God, that God saith of it, as Joseph did of Benjamin, "Unless ye bring your hearts along with you, ye shall not see my face." You may observe Sabbaths, hear sermons, sing psalms, put up prayers, &c. but all will be to no purpose, Isa. i. 11. God would rather have the heart without the body, than the body without the heart. Soul-prayer, when it is alone, is accepted; but woe to bodily prayer, if it be alone.

3. A solemn retiring ourselves from the world, and abstracting our thoughts from earthly things, that we may be fitted for more immediate approaches to God, and intimate converse with him on his own day, wherein he uses to deal more familiarly with his people than at other times.

4. A laying ourselves open to the influences and operations of the Spirit of God, waiting for and thankfully entertaining his motions, convictions, reproofs, and consolations, when they are allowed to us in the ordinances; and carefully guarding against every thing that may in the least grieve or offend the Holy Spirit.

5. A more than ordinary intenseness of heart and affections in the duties of God's worship. On Sabbath days, especially, we should be "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord;" we should call in all our straying thoughts and affections, praying with the psalmist, Psal. lxxxvi. 11, "Unite my heart to fear thy name;" and Psal. lxxx. 18, "Quicken us, and we shall call upon thy name." This day we should put forth our spiritual strength to the utmost, perform every duty, and exert every grace, with the greatest intenseness; we ought to love God with the most sublime affections, obey him with the purest intentions, pray to him with the most fervent importunity, and praise him with the most spiritual elevation of heart. Nay, do it in some suitable proportion to the greatness of that God, "with whom we have to do" in so solemn a manner on the Lord's day; for, Psal. cl. 2, we must not only "praise him for his mighty acts;" but "praise him according to his excellent greatness;" we must worship him like himself.

6. A willing and cheerful performance of Sabbath duties: we ought to call the Sabbath "a delight, holy and honourable," and go this day with "joy to draw water out of the wells of salvation," and be "joyful in the house of prayer." Holy David was not satisfied this day with a bare approach to the altar, but he must "go to God as his exceeding joy," Psal. xliii. 4. And ought not believers under the gospel more especially to do this on the Lord's day, who have God in human nature to go to, and have the glorious achievements of condescending and redeeming love to commemorate this day?

The Lord requires us to perform the duties of this day with a frame of mind suitable to the spirit, freedom, and liberty of the gospel, guarding against the servile frame of spirit which the Jews had in the observance of the duties of the law. For "we are not come unto the mount that burned with fire, and was terrible to behold; but unto mount Zion, the city of the living God." In the service of this day, we ought to keep up impressions of God as most accessible, familiar to us, and dwelling in our own nature, and as one that doth not so much regard our outward performances, as the inward frame and sincerity of our hearts. The Pharisees pretended to great strictness about the outward observance of the Sabbath: (and hence they presumed frequently to censure Christ and his disciples' practices on this day) but they were strangers to inward sincerity, and love to God. It is the willing mind and honest heart in Sabbath performances, that God chiefly regards, not a pharisaical strictness.

7. Being "in the Spirit on the Lord's day" implies, the having of the graces of the Spirit in a more lively exercise this day than ordinary. And therefore, we ought this day solemnly to invite the "north and south winds of the Spirit to come and blow upon our gardens, that the spices thereof may flow out;" and that, particularly in all our approaches to God, we may be possessed with a holy awe and reverence of God's majesty and greatness, and a deep sense of our own baseness and naughtiness, and have our faith acting vigorously upon God's goodness and mercy in and through Christ, our hearts melting with evangelical contrition and repentance, our love and spiritual desires flaming forth in all our acts of devotion; nay, all our graces and affections should be this day elevated more than ordinary to God's special honour and glory.

8. A more than ordinary spiritual and heavenly frame of soul, suited to the work of this day. Since this day is wholly dedicated to God, and spiritual duties are the only work of it, our frame upon it should be more heavenly and divine, than upon any other day, or when going about the duties of God's worship at any other time; we should this day be much viewing and admiring, with thankfulness, the dying "love of Christ," and the glorious "work of redemption" completed this day by his resurrection. We should be living this day above the world, and within view of heaven, making this day a little emblem and prelude of the everlasting rest of the saints above.

9. It imports, that there is something of an universal sanctity and holiness peculiarly requisite upon this day. Now, this sanctity must be universal, with respect to ourselves, with respect to the day, and with respect to the duties of it. 1st. With respect to ourselves; all our thoughts, words, and actions this day, should be God's in a special manner; all that we are, all that we have, all that we can do, should be wholly devoted to God's worship and service on this day, Isa. lviii. 13. God would not only have our hands tied from working, but also our tongues from talking, and our minds from thinking on worldly things this day. 2d. With respect to the day; we should spend the whole of it in holy duties, either public, private, or secret. It is not for an hour or two only, that we must study to be specially holy, but through the whole day; we should count every moment of Sabbath time precious, and suffer none of it to be lost that we can save, still aiming to be doing something for God and our own souls. 3d. With respect to the duties of the day; we should esteem them all, and make conscience of them all, since they all have a divine stamp upon them; reading, hearing, prayer, praises, communicating, meditating, conferring, catechising, giving alms, &c. God is to be found in every one of these duties, and therefore none of them is to be neglected. And, when we find him not in one of them, we must seek him in another; and, if we conscientiously go the round of duties, we shall surely "find him whom our souls love," Cant. iii. 4.

Lastly, This expression of being "in the Spirit on the Lord's day," imports the performing the duties of it with pure and spiritual ends, viz. "to glorify God, and enjoy him." God is the sole object of our worship, and he must be the principal end of it too. In our worship we must seek him, Heb. xi. 6, not ourselves. It is natural for man to worship God for self ends; we often perform duties, not only to be seen and esteemed of men, but also to be seen and valued by God for them, Isa. lviii. 3, "Wherefore have we fasted, (say they,) and thou seest not?" &c. They did not perform duties to glorify God, but to obtain a reward for themselves, and have a righteousness of their own to found and plead upon. Let us study to be denied to our own duties, and guard against a selfish and legal spirit in our Sabbath-day's performances. This will be a dead fly to spoil the ointment, and will keep our best duties from being savoury to God. Let us study then to perform them all "in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter," Rom. vii. 6. Let us use them all as means for bringing God and our souls together, as means for obtaining communion and fellowship with God, and holding special intercourse with him, which is the only way to fit us for glorifying God both here and hereafter.

DIRECTION II.—CONCERNING THE HOLY DUTIES REQUISITE UPON THE LORD'S DAY.

THE duties necessary upon this day are either public, private, or secret.

I shall not meddle with the duties of public persons as such on the Sabbath, or what is specially incumbent upon magistrates or ministers upon this day, in their public stations, but shall insist only upon those duties required of all Christians in common.

QUEST. I. What are those public duties required of us upon the Lord's day?

ANS. They are those which we are bound to perform in the public assemblies of God's people: and indeed the Sabbath is instituted chiefly for the solemn performance of the duties of God's worship, in the public meetings of his people: for the Lord hath a special delight therein: "he loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob; and wherever two or three are gathered in his name, he will be in the midst of them."

Why? It is in the assemblies of God's people for public worship, that God receiveth the highest praises from us; and hence the Psalmist saith, "I will give thee thanks in the great congregation: I will praise thee among much people. And in his temple doth every one speak of his glory," Psal. xxxv. 18; xxix. 9. And as in public worship God receiveth the highest praises, so there it is he bestoweth the richest mercies, Psal. lxxv. 4, "Blessed is the man whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts; we shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house," &c. O what good things are contained in that word, "the goodness of thy house!" there is pardon, peace, love, grace, life, light, strength, comfort, &c. Now, the public duties of the Sabbath, recorded in scripture, for which God's people ought to meet and assemble that day, are various; and particularly, they are to meet together for reading and expounding the word of God; for preaching, hearing, praying, praising, partaking of the sacraments, collecting for the poor, &c.; for all which we may see Lev. xxiii. 3; Psal. xcii.; Isa. lxvi. 23; Luke iv. 16; Acts xiii. 14, 15, 27, 44; xv. 21; xvi. 13; xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 12. But particularly,

I. Hearing the word publicly read and preached with reverence and attention, is a principal duty on the Sabbath; nay, our life depends upon it, Deut. xxxii. 46, 47. It is the great mean God hath appointed for the conversion of souls, Rom. x. 14, 17. Whatever men think of it, it is the powerful instrument of our salvation, Rom. i. 16. The waters of the sanctuary run only through the channels of the word; the mines of grace are found only in these climates where the gospel sun shines. The Lord, if he pleased, could immediately, by his Spirit, break open sinners' hearts; but he hath determined to honour his word in this work, as is plain in Lydia's case, Acts xvi. 9, 10, 14. Reading the word and sermons at home is good; but hearing the word preached is the ordinary mean God hath appointed and promised to bless for conversion. And if this be slighted, or prove ineffectual, no other way can be contrived for it, as we are told, Luke xvi. 29, 31. So that though a glorified saint or angel should come down from heaven, and preach upon the beauty of Christ, and glory of heaven, in the most lively and demonstrative manner; yet, if a preached gospel do not persuade sinners, neither would that. Or, though a damned soul should come up from hell, and preach the evil of sin, and torments of hell, in the most pathetic manner; yet neither would that persuade, if the word do it not. Why? the one is God's instituted mean, the other not. Let us then have an high esteem of God's ordinance, and embrace all occasions for attending it. "Be swift to hear," Jam. i. 19. Let none dare to count that mean, weak, or despicable, which the wise God hath instituted to save souls, 1 Cor. i. 21, "It pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe." And how comes believing but by hearing? Reading good sermons (as one says) is like milk cold out of the dish, but preaching is like milk warm from the breast, which is far more nourishing to the child. Let us always, then, as "new born babes, desire this milk, that we may both live and grow thereby," 1 Pet. ii. 2.

II. Another of the public duties of the Sabbath is public prayers with the congregation.

Prayer is a principal part of God's worship, and therefore is frequently put for the whole, Zech. viii. 21, 22; Acts xvi. 23. Hence God's temple of old was called the house of prayer. Public prayer is most necessary for averting judgments, obtaining blessings, and preserving love and unity among Christians; also it is a solemn owning the God whom we serve in the face of the world, and so highly glorifies God. The bountiful Lord is well pleased to see many beggars thronging at the beautiful gate of his temple, waiting for an alms from his hand. And their joint prayers are most prevalent with him, far more than private prayers: for a petition presented by a single subject, prevails not so much as that which is made by a whole city. Peter is cast in prison to be executed, Acts xii., but the church meets and prays him out of his enemies' hands. The united prayers of the church are most powerful to procure God's blessing and presence; therefore, reader, see that you make conscience in joining therewith, and be not absent from them. It is a most graceless practice in some, they either come not into the church till the public prayers be over, or they go out after sermon before public prayers be made. I am sure, such can expect nothing by the sermon but a curse, since they join not with the prayers for a blessing upon it to themselves or others.

III. Duty is the singing of psalms, and praising God with the congregation. Praising God by singing, is often enjoined in scripture; yea, no less than four times in one verse, Psal. xlvii. 6. It is comely for the people of God; they are called singing birds, Cant. ii. 10; they are such as should sing all the months of the year; yea, even in the dead month of affliction. So did Paul and Silas in a prison at midnight, when their backs were sore with scourges, and their feet fast in the stocks, Acts xvi. 25. But in a special manner, singing praises to God is our duty in public assemblies, Psal. cxlix. 1; Luke xxiv. 53. And in these, "both princes and people, young men and maidens, old men and children," are bound to act a part in this heavenly concert, Psal. cxlviii. 11—13. And, above all days, the Sabbath is most proper for this duty, Psal. xcii. title; exviii. 24. It is a day of thanksgiving and holy joy. We have God's praises to celebrate for the wonders of creation and redemption, we have the glorious victories of the Captain of our salvation to extol and magnify; and therefore the duty of singing praise this day is highly necessary. By this duty we not only glorify God, but we edify one another, Col. iii. 16. The melody and conjunction of many serious souls, tend to raise and elevate the heart. Yea, it was one mean of Augustine's conversion; he says, "He wept when he heard the psalms sung by the church."

Singing is a reading with meditation, and gives free vent to the thoughts and affections, and helps to excite and actuate the graces; it is the breath or flame of love or joy; it is the eternal work of heaven, the music of saints and angels there, Rev. v. 9—11; xv. 3. And what are church assemblies here, but the place of our apprenticeship and preparation for heaven? I know nothing in the world that more resembles heaven, than a company of God's people harmoniously singing his praises "with grace in their hearts, making melody to the Lord;" for them the soul rejoiceth in divine goodness, meditates on divine promises, extols divine excellencies, and mounts up to God in acts of faith and love. Let us then make conscience of this heavenly duty in the public assemblies, and perform it with heart and tongue; for were it not a rare exercise, God would not honour it to be the only work of heaven, to the exclusion of prayer, repentance, reading, hearing, communicating, &c.

IV. Partaking of the sacraments is another public duty of the Sabbath.

1. The first day of the week, our Christian Sabbath, is the proper day for celebrating the memorial of redeeming love in the Lord's supper, Acts xx. 7. This was the ordinary practice of the primitive Christians in ancient times: and, because of their constant breaking of bread on this first day of the week, it was wont to be called "the day of bread," August. Epist. 118. So fired were the hearts of Christians in those early times with love to, and zeal for their glorious Redeemer, who had so lately poured out his blood for their redemption, that when they assembled together upon the first day of the week, the day he had instituted for his honour, they could not think of parting until, by the breaking of bread, according to his example, they had celebrated the memorial of his dying love, his atoning blood, his victorious resurrection and triumphant return; which also they designed as a pledge of their mutual love to and communion with one another. And though these first Christians were animated with more life and love, and were habitually in a better frame for partaking of this love-feast than, alas, we now are; yet we must own, that we are under the same obligations of love and gratitude to our dying Redeemer, and have the same need of the frequent application of his blood, and of a confirmed interest in his death, that they had; and consequently ought to dedicate many more Lord's days to the celebration of this memorial feast of his supper, than now we do. Especially seeing the partaking of this ordinance is the proper work of the Lord's day, and one special design of the institution of this holy day.

2. Baptism is most proper on this day: the day is holy, and the sacrament is holy. Children should be brought to the congregation, and baptized in face thereof; for, since baptism is the door to Christ's house, it is fit to be entered when the family is convened, or the church assembled, that so the receiving of new members thereto may be homologated by them; that the parents' engagements may have the more witnesses to them, and the children have more prayers put up for them; and also, that the whole congregation may be edified by this solemn ordinance, and excited to remember and improve their own baptisms. Of which afterward.

As to the feasting part of this solemnity, I do not think it proper on the Lord's day: this may well be delayed till the day after.

V. Making public collections for the poor is a proper duty on this day, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2. This day being instituted to keep up the memorial of Christ's infinite charity to mankind, and for our meeting to receive new blessings and mercies from him, we are, in gratitude, bound on this occasion to be liberal to his poor: this doth not wrong, but promote our Sabbath-day frame. Let no Christian then neglect this duty, which is so plainly commanded by Christ, and has been practised by the Christian church for nearly these two thousand years.

Think it not enough that you give something privately to the poor this day, and that this may excuse you from any public contribution. This would be a slighting of an express commandment, and making one duty to jostle out another; and besides, would tend to frustrate Christ's institution of deacons and church-rulers, who are appointed to receive and distribute the collections for the poor, according to their various necessities. When the apostle enjoins the Corinthians to "lay by them in store on the first day of the week, that there might be no gatherings when he came;" it is plain, he chiefly means their depositing their charitable contributions with the church-rulers. For, if it were not so, there would still be need of gatherings when he came.

I grant indeed, it were very proper for every man, besides the public charity he gives on the Lord's day, likewise to set apart something this day, and lay it by him in store, according to his gains and income through the week, as a stock or fund out of which he might give to pious and charitable uses, as occasion should require; and so, the stock being prepared beforehand, you will give the more bountifully and more willingly to such uses, than otherwise you will find in your hearts to do. If not only rich men, but even tradesmen, labourers, and servants, would thus lay up every Lord's day some very small thing by them, they might, without any sensible damage to themselves, have somewhat to give to proper and needy objects. And I am persuaded this would not be the way to impair, but to increase your means.

QUEST. II. What are the private duties required of us upon the Lord's day?

ANS. It is not enough that we spend some part of the Lord's day in public worship; but since (as I proved before) the whole day is consecrated to God, the rest of it is also to be kept holy, and taken up in holy duties, in private and secret.

Domestic and private duties are necessary on this day, both for preparing us for the public ordinances, and for improving and reaping advantage by them.

These duties are, family worship, by reading the word, singing the praises, and calling upon the name of God, family catechising, repetition of sermons, Christian conference, &c.

I. Family worship is a duty incumbent on masters of families every day, but more especially upon the Lord's day. It is to be regretted, that there should be any need to adduce arguments to prove this: but since there are some who call themselves ministers, who either deny it, or else have not so much conscience or courage directly to assert it in their preachings or writings; (they neither press the performance of this duty, nor reprove the neglect of it in others; and, as it is generally said, they do not practise it themselves; whereby many are encouraged to slight family worship, and think it no necessary duty, to the great hindrance of the advancement of piety,) I shall therefore prove it to be the duty of all masters of families, especially on the Lord's day; and that, in the first place, from the fourth commandment.

The fourth commandment is principally directed to masters of families, because families, as such, are chiefly to be concerned in the keeping of it, both negatively and positively. For as the commandment enjoins every master of a family, with "all that are within his gates, his son, his daughter, his man-servant," &c. to forbear all manner of work on the Sabbath; so it likewise enjoins them to "remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy." Now, to keep the "Sabbath holy to the Lord," without all doubt, implies the worshipping of God: this cannot be understood only of worshipping of God in the public assemblies, for these cannot be always had; yet still the commandment for sanctifying the Sabbath is binding on families. Again, the public worship takes up only a part of the Sabbath; but families are bound to sanctify the day throughout. This cannot be duly done by the members of the family worshipping God apart in secret; for families, as such, are bound to do it. The commandment binds a master to do it jointly with his family, as well as it binds a minister to do it jointly with his congregation. Moreover, if the commandment did only bind a master of a family to worship God in public, and in secret, upon the Sabbath, then he would be no further concerned in sanctifying the Sabbath than any other member of his family; also, he would sanctify the Sabbath as much in communion with the members of other families as those of his own, which were most absurd. But it is plain, that the commandment lays it especially on the master of the family to take care of the sanctifying of the Sabbath in his family; which must be by worshipping God, as well as by resting from labour; otherwise he would do no more than is required of the beasts. And this he can never account for, unless he do it in communion with his family, go before them in it, and by his example direct and encourage them in the holy worship and service of God upon his holy day. We have Joshua's practice sufficiently explaining this precept, Josh. xxiv. 15. He saith not, "My house shall serve the Lord;" but, "I and my house will do it;" that is, we will jointly worship God, and sanctify his Sabbath, which are the principal parts of his service. This he would do, and we ought all to do, though there were no public worship in the world. And this is confirmed by Lev. xxiii. 3, which requires the Sabbath to be religiously observed in all our dwellings or private houses, as well as in holy convocations; by every family apart, as well as by many families together.

But I shall demonstrate the indispensable necessity of this duty of family worship, from several other topics.

I. The light of nature and sound reason plead for it on many accounts.

1. It teacheth that all societies should jointly honour their founders. Now God is the Author and Founder of families, Psal. lxxviii. 6, "God setteth the solitary in families;" and ought not families to worship him who instituted them, and that for this very end, that "they might glorify him, and show forth his praise?"

2. The light of nature teacheth masters of families to use all proper means for preventing the hurt of the family, and rescuing them from danger: and it is plain, that family prayer is a special mean for this effect. The light of nature taught the heathen mariner, with his ship's crew, Jonah i. 4, to use joint prayers to save them in a storm: and we see it was the master of the ship that called this duty. Now, shall a heathen master of a ship do more in his society, by nature's light, than a Christian master of a family will do in his, who is privileged with the clear light of the gospel?

3. The light of nature teacheth men to do all they can to promote the good of their families, to provide food and physic for their servants and children's bodies. And doth it not teach them also to use means to preserve their souls from wrath, and further their eternal well-being? And what mean more proper for this end, than family worship and conjunct prayer? O masters of families, your examples herein will have happy influence upon your children and servants, both to excite them to pray, and teach them how to pray.

4. Nature's light directed the heathens to have their Lares and Penates, or household gods, whom they worshipped in a special manner, and to whom they offered sacrifices for the protection and welfare of their families: so we find in scripture, that Laban and Micah had their teraphim or household gods. Now, though these were vain helpless gods, yet it shows they believed a necessity of family worship. Alas! heathens will rise up in judgment against many who are called Christians.

II. We are commanded in scripture to "pray every where, and with all manner of prayer," 1 Tim. ii. 8; Eph. vi. 18. Now, if we must pray in all places, then surely in our families: if with "all manner of prayer," then surely with "family prayer."

III. Masters of families are bound to love God "with all their hearts, and their neighbours as themselves;" and consequently are bound to bring their families along with them to the worship of God. God's people are filled with such love and zeal, that they frequently call the inanimate creatures to join with them in God's praise, Psal. lxi. 34; cxlviii. 2, &c., and how much more should they call their neighbours and fellow-Christians? How oft doth David invite and exhort others to praise God with him? And will not masters of families, who love God and their neighbour, invite and exhort those to whom they are so nearly related, to join with them in the praise and worship of God?

IV. Families have many joint errands to the throne of grace, which call for joint family prayers and praises. They often sin together, and therefore it is fit they confess and mourn together. They need many family blessings, and it is fit they jointly seek them. They are exposed to many family dangers, therefore they should jointly deprecate them. They receive many family mercies, which call for family thanksgivings. They work in their employments and labour together, and it is very fit they seek a blessing on them together.

V. All churches ought to worship God in a joint and solemn manner. Now, the Spirit of God frequently calls Christian families churches; which honourable title they would by no means deserve, if they had not communion together in the worship of God.

VI. It is plain from 1 Tim. iii. 4, 5, 12, that as ministers are bound to rule the church, so masters of families are bound to rule their families; which is not only by instructing them, but going before them in God's worship, and being their guide and mouth in prayers and praises. For every head of a family is a prophet, priest, and king, in his own house. He is a prophet to teach and instruct his household, a priest to intercede and pray for them, and a king to protect and govern them; and especially, to maintain God's worship and true religion among them.

VII. It is clear from 1 Pet. iii. 7, that husbands and wives are bound to pray together, and consequently the whole family. For there they are exhorted from strifes and contentions, because of their tendency to hinder their conjunct prayers.

VIII. The examples of the saints in scripture do invincibly prove family worship to be our duty. We read not only of Abraham's instructing his household, and commanding them to worship God by themselves, but also wheresoever he sojourns with his household, "builds an altar," and with them "he calls on the name of the Lord;" as is clear from Gen. xii.; xiii.; xxi. 33. I took notice of Joshua's family devotion a little before. David, Psal. ci. saith, "He will walk in his house at home, with a perfect heart;" and we find him coming home from the public worship, 2 Sam. vi. 20, to bless his own family, which was certainly to go about family worship with them, and pray for God's blessing on them. We find Daniel about this work three times a day, Dan. vi. 10. It was open family prayer which he performed; for, if it had been secret prayer, strangers would not have known so well of it, nor would they have found him at it, as it is said they did. So great a prince would have had servants in his outer rooms, to have stopped them ere they came so near as to hear him at his secret devotion. We have our great pattern, Jesus Christ, singing psalms, and praying with his family, viz. his disciples, Matt. xxvi. 30; Luke ix. 18; John xvii. This was Cornelius' practice, Acts x. 2, it is said, "He feared God with all his house;" which implies, that he "worshipped God with all his house," for fearing of God comprehends worship.

Lastly, We find Paul, Philem. ii. 3, making mention of the church in Philemon's house, which was his religious praying family: and then, ver. 22, he speaks of their joint "prayers, through which he trusted he should be given to them."

Since then the duty is so clear, let us be concerned and zealous to promote the worship of God in our families. Consider how zealous some are to promote a false or superstitious worship. God bids the prophet look and wonder at their diligence, Jer. vii. 17, 18. There we see both fathers, children, husbands, wives, and all are taken up about it. Where, alas! is there any family so earnest for the true worship of God?

OBJECTIONS AGAINST FAMILY WORSHIP ANSWERED.

OBJECT. 1. We pray in secret, and that is sufficient.

ANS. 1. This is not sufficient, as hath been proven; one duty will not supply the want of another. Family prayer is your duty, as well as secret prayer; and you ought to go the round of duties, and slight no known duty, if you would prosper in any duty.

2. Secret prayer, O man, would be your duty, although you had no family; yea, although you had no tongue nor faculty of speech. O master of a family, why hath God blessed you with a family, and with the faculty of speaking, but that you might be more capable to glorify him with and before others? Hath not Christ, in that excellent pattern of prayer, taught you to pray conjunctly, by saying, "Our Father which art in heaven, give us this day our daily bread?" Have you any charity to your neighbours, any love or pity to the souls of your family, and will not take them along with you to the throne of grace? Did you enjoy any communion with God in secret, or taste any sweetness in the duty; would you not invite them to come, taste and see that God is good, and partake of the same heavenly cheer with you?

OBJECT. 2. We have not gifts to pray before others.

ANS. 1. The great Hearer of prayer doth not look to gifts as we do; no, he looks to the heart. Say not then, because you cannot pray as a minister, or such a gifted man, that ye will not pray at all; bring a humble and broken heart to God, and he will accept of you, though you had but two or three words, or broken sentences. It is not fine words, or eloquent expressions, that God is delighted with; it is the sincerity of the heart.

2. Use the one talent, trade with it, and it will increase; do as you can, and God will teach you to do better; I never knew any that tried it sincerely, but God helped them. Can ye not say with the disciples, "Lord, teach us to pray?" Yea, say but the Lord's prayer, if ye can say no more, and, if ye do it sincerely, more shall be given.

3. Make use of the helps which God affords you for prayer. 1st. Acquaint yourselves with the scriptures, frequently read the Psalms, and particularly the xxv. li. lxxxvi. cxix. psalms, and others, where you will find variety of fit expressions and petitions to be used in prayer. Take with you these words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, they are the most acceptable words. Likewise study the ten commandments, view the large extent and meaning of them, the duties required, and sins forbidden in each of them, and they will furnish you with vast matter for confession and petition. Also study the Lord's prayer, and the import of the several petitions thereof, for there are many petitions wrapt up in every one of them. 2d. Study well the attributes and works of God, and they will afford manifold matter, both for prayer and praises. View the work of creation; and more especially, the work of redemption, the eternal contrivance of it, the glorious Mediator, his nature, his offices, life, death, sufferings, and infinite love; his fulness, graces, offers, promises, and well ordered covenant; and then, I am sure, you will not be barren of suitable matter, and words for prayer. "A very child (as one saith) when he sees a merchant's pack opened, where there are variety of things which he desireth, will learn, without book, to say, O father, buy this, or give me that." So the soul will not want what to say, that sees the treasures and riches of Christ opened. 3d. Study to be acquainted with yourselves, your hearts and lives: consider your state and circumstances both in soul and body, and the providences of God towards you. Think upon the vanity and inconsistency of all worldly things, the frailty of man, and brevity of life; and particularly, think much on the four last things, death, judgment, heaven, and hell, and you will have abundance of matter for prayer.

Besides all which, there are four words ye should always keep in mind when you go to prayer, which would prove a lasting fountain for suitable matter to you, viz. your sins, miseries, wants, and mercies.

1. Your sins. Have you not a great multitude to confess, and seek mercy for, sins original and actual, of omission and commission, of heart and life? What indwelling corruptions, and heart-plagues have ye to lament, hardness, deadness, carnality, unbelief, backsliding, hypocrisy, &c. Look into your lives, and behold what sins ye have committed, and what duties ye have omitted, and make particular confession of them.

2. Your miseries. How many have ye to complain of, and beg deliverance from in prayer? Are you not born in a lost state, a child of wrath, an heir of hell, under an unsupportable burden of unpardoned guilt, most loathsome and polluted in God's sight; under the tyranny of Satan, liable to all the miseries of this life, cares, toils, losses, crosses, sickness and death; yea, exposed to the wrath of God, the curses of the law, the sword of justice, to a strict and severe judgment-seat, to unquenchable fire, and everlasting burnings, and to banishment from God's favour and presence to all eternity?

3. Your wants. Are ye not poor beggarly sinners, full of wants and necessities? "In us dwells no good thing."—Do you want the bread of life, the balm of Gilead, pardon of sin, peace with God, deliverance from wrath, a new nature, a soft heart? Do you want "eye salve, white raiment, gold tried in the fire?" Do ye want "faith, love, repentance, victory over lusts?" &c. And have ye not matter for prayer and supplication? Have ye not temporal wants to lay before God? Ye can tell them to your friends, and complain to them, though they afford you little help; ought ye not far rather go to God with them, who is both able and willing to help? Do you want health to your bodies, bread to your families, provision for your children, a blessing on your labours? Then seek them from God: "The ravens cry to him, and he hears them," how much more will he hear you?

4. Your mercies. God daily loads you with his mercies; they are new to you every morning: it is of the Lord's mercies, that your houses are not consumed with fire, in the night, and ye buried in the ruins thereof; that sudden death doth not smite your children, servants, cattle, or relations; that you waken in safety every morning, and not in everlasting flames. Doth not the Lord set a hedge about you, and all that you have, and preserve you from devils, enemies, and manifold dangers; give you health and strength, bless the work of your hands, cover a table for you, and rain manna about your tents? And have you not plenty of matter for thanksgiving? Yea, he hath contrived a way to save you, sent his Son to redeem you, makes pressing offers of his salvation, and waits patiently for your repentance. Now, if you think on these mercies, can you want words in prayer to bless God for them? I say then, remember your sins, miseries, wants, and mercies; and ye will never be scarce of matter for prayer.

OBJECT. III. "We have not confidence to pray before others."

ANS. 1. Mind what Christ saith, "They that are ashamed of him before men, he will be ashamed of them before his Father in heaven."

2. Many are ashamed to pray before others, who are not ashamed to sin, curse, swear, get drunk, and break the Sabbath before others.

3. Why should you be ashamed to pray before your own family, these you constantly converse with, and of whom you have the command? Will you have confidence to plead this frivolous excuse at the day of judgment?

But, lastly, You will not plead such excuses in things relating to the body. If your children and family were starving for want of bread, ye would neither want words nor confidence to make known your case to a rich friend; if you were mortally sick or wounded, you would freely tell your case to a physician; if ye were drowning, ye would call aloud for help: and now, when ye and your families are ready to perish in your sins, will ye not make known your case to God, and cry with the disciples, "Lord, save us, or else we perish?" The common beggars, that go from door to door, will rise up against you: they think no shame to cry at the rich man's door, hear them who will; they want not words enough, ye need not teach them what to say; their pinched bowels make them both eloquent and importunate; they weary not to stand and cry, though they be but expecting a small morsel. And shall we, whose needs are far greater, whose expectations are far higher, want words or confidence to cry and knock at God's door, since he declares that our importunity is nowise a trouble but a pleasure to him? Are not everlasting life, and deliverance from hell, worth the seeking? Shall men do more for the welfare of their dying bodies, than we for the salvation of our immortal souls?

OBJECT. IV. "We have not time to spare for family worship, our labour is so great, and business so throng."

ANS. 1. Is not the worship and service of God the greatest business you have to do in the world? All other things are trifles in respect of this.

2. Better want time for sleeping, for eating, or any thing, than want time for this, which is far more necessary than any thing else.

3. God in his providences, may soon cast greater hindrances in the way of your worldly business than this, as ye suppose, would be. He may send fevers among children and servants, that will stop your labour much longer than a little time spent daily in family worship would do. When sickness or death comes, they will not be put off by telling that you have no time for your labour to be sick; no, ye must find time to be sick and lie on beds, though it were in the throng of harvest. And must ye, whether ye will or no, find time to be sick and die; and will ye find no time to pray with your families, in order to prepare you and them for sickness and death? And further, it is likely, that if ye prayed more in your families, your labour would be less stopt by sickness and other troubles; you should have fewer crosses and perplexities in your business; and, whatever they were, you might expect they would be sanctified. Family prayer would be a sweet vent and ease to the mind, under all family cares and anxieties.

4. Family prayer will not hinder your business, though in the throng of harvest. What stop would it be to your work, to be every morning and evening a quarter of an hour upon your knees with your family? Nay, it would further it, and procure a blessing on the work of your hands. And I have observed, that in those parts of the nation where husbandmen and tradesmen take time for family worship, they are in a more flourishing condition in worldly things, than in those parts where it is neglected. Remember, that all the success of your labour depends on the special blessing and providence of God, and there is no way more likely to obtain this than family prayer. If God vouchsafe not his blessing, your labour will be labour in vain, Psal. cxxvii. 1, 2. How soon may God blast all the labours of prayerless persons?

5. Whatever you pretend from want of time on week days, to excuse you from family worship; yet there is no shadow for this objection upon the Sabbath-day, in which you have no other business but to serve and worship God. He is graciously pleased to free you this day from your labour, that ye may apply yourselves entirely to his worship without distraction. O ye are straitened for time through the week for family and secret prayer, be busy on the Lord's day in the performance thereof, and be thankful to God for allowing you this day for these exercises.

In the name then of the great God, who hath founded families, and is the God of all the families of Israel; and in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, in whom only the families of the earth can be blessed; I beseech and conjure all you that are masters of families, to honour the Creator and Redeemer of the world in your families; erect him a family-altar, and dedicate your houses to be temples for the worship of God. Perform this duty conscientiously every day, but more especially upon the Lord's day; let your family sacrifices this day be doubled. I shall add some more motives to it.

I. This is the way to procure you all sorts of family blessings. Would you have God to build your houses, bless your substance, dwell in your families, and be a guard to them night and day? Would ye have your relations comfortable, your affairs successful, and your enjoyments sweet? Then set up, and keep up family worship, make your houses little churches.

1. You may expect family protection. If you, by family prayer, lodge your families "under the shadow of the Almighty, you need not be afraid of terrors that fly by night or by day:" for you are under the tuition of him "that keeps Israel, who neither slumbers nor sleeps."—Praying families are preserved from many more evils and mischiefs than they are aware of; sometimes divine providence makes a visible distinction between them and others. I have read of a little town in the canton of Berne in Switzerland, consisting of ninety houses, that in the year 1584 was all destroyed by an earthquake, except the half of one house, where the master of it, with his family, were at the time on their knees at family prayer. This is a noble pillar for supporting your houses.

2. You may expect family provision; "your bread shall be given you, and your water shall be sure; you shall dwell in the land, and verily have food." God feeds the ravens that cry to him, and will he not much more feed Christian families that cry, "Lord, give us this day our daily bread?" O poor tradesmen, who can hardly get your credit kept and families maintained; O poor tenants, who can scarcely get your farms, and children provided for, by all your sore toil and labour; will you try family prayer sincerely? I dare say, that the Lord, who "blessed the house of Obededom, and all that pertained to him, because of the ark of God which he lodged," will from that day forth bless you, prosper the work of your hands, and make your affairs more successful: it will not hinder your labours, but procure a blessing on them. I say then, make a fair trial, and I hope in a little time you shall find a sensible change in your affairs. Some have observed this in their experience.

3. You will have the more comfort and satisfaction in your family relations; this is the way to keep up your authority among them, and to procure you more respect from them. If a master of a family exert his authority to bring those under his charge to attend family worship, he will find them more observant of his other commands; children would be more obedient, and servants more faithful; the fear of that God, whom they daily worship with you, would be an awe-band upon them, to do their duty to you, and act for your interest.

II. Family worship is an excellent mean to advance religion and reformation through the whole land. If every one would begin with his own family, reform it, and plant piety therein, what happy cities and parishes would we soon have? If ye would recover decaying piety in the land, and banish cursing, swearing, drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking, &c. out of the town and parish where you live, then begin with your own family; set up prayer and religion therein. Satan and vice will not dwell contentedly beside prayer. The way to make a clean street is, for every house to sweep before their own door. Religious families are excellent nurseries to the church, and seminaries of piety. Do you wish then to see religion flourish, and reformation carried on? and do you desire to be instrumental therein? then worship God, promote piety in your own family. Your example might influence your neighbours about you to the like; it would excite your children and servants to secret prayer; and, when they come to get families of their own, they will readily do as you do, and so will their children and servants after them. And thus you will be instruments of handing down religion to the rising generation, and for "turning many unto righteousness." O! if God would persuade the hearts of people, both in town and country, to set about family worship, how soon would religion put on another face? The streets and fields would not be so thronged with old and young on the Sabbath, people walking and discoursing idly, and boys playing and sporting themselves; the church would be better frequented, and people more attentive and devout in time of sermon and public worship. Family worship also, is a notable help to prepare us for public worship, and the right observation of the Sabbath.

But the domestic sanctification of the Sabbath, enjoined by the fourth commandment, includes more duties than prayer, reading the word, and singing of psalms in families: and so I come to speak of others.

A SECOND DOMESTIC DUTY ON THE SABBATH IS FAMILY
CATECHISING AND INSTRUCTION.

MASTERS of families are bound to instruct and teach those under their charge, viz. their children and servants, in all things necessary to salvation. Yea, they are bound, not only to instruct them in the knowledge of the principles, but also to enjoin upon them the performance of the duties of the Christian religion, and to admonish and reprove them for the neglect thereof. The necessity of this duty may be proved by many arguments.

1. From the law of nature, that binds us to do what we can to promote the welfare and happiness of our children and families, and to help them, when in misery and distress. Children are a part of the parents wrapt up in another skin; and therefore parents should do for them as for themselves. It is not enough that ye provide for their bodies; for the very birds and beasts do this; nay, even "the sea-monsters draw out the breast, and give suck to their young ones!" Lam. iv. 3, but you ought to provide for their souls, which are their better part, yea, a thousand times more precious than their bodies. You would think it barbarous cruelty in a parent to suffer his child or servant to starve for want of bodily food; O but it is far more cruel to suffer their precious souls to perish and starve for want of spiritual food, or necessary instructions.

2. From the clear light of God's word, that binds this on masters of families as a duty. We see the fourth commandment obligeth masters to be answerable for their children and servants, touching the sanctification of the Sabbath, and the service of God on that day; which certainly imports their instructing them in their duty. The Lord commits their souls to their care, and they must account for them to him. When God gives any of you a child, he charges you, as Pharaoh's daughter did to Moses's mother, Exod. ii. 9, "Take this child, and nurse it for me; and I will give thee thy wages." Or, as the prophet said to the king, 1 Kings xx. 39, "Keep this man; if by any means he be missing, thy life shall go for his life." If this child or this servant perish in his sins or ignorance, through your neglect, his blood will I require at your hands. Nay, we have express scripture precepts binding you to this duty; read Deut. vi. 6, 7; Prov. xxii. 6; Eph. vi. 4. Also, we have the examples of the saints, who were careful in performing this duty. God takes special notice of it in Abraham, to his everlasting commendation, Gen. xviii. 19, "I know him, that he will command his children, and his household after him; and they shall keep the way of the Lord," &c. It was David's practice, Psal. xxxiv. 11; Prov. iv. 3, 4; and also Hezekiah's, Isa. xxxviii. 19.

3. You are concerned, in common justice, to instruct your children, that ye may, so far as lieth in you, repair the injury done them, by your conveying original corruption to them. Has God provided a cure for them in the gospel, and will ye not do so much as show it to them? If you had rashly given a wound to any of their bodies, would ye not in haste provide a cure, or send for a physician? and will ye do nothing for their souls, that are dying of the wounds of sin given them by you?

4. It doth highly contribute to advance Christ's kingdom in the world, to train up a seed for his service. This is likely to prove a more successful mean of reformation, than any other that can be used, either by magistrates or ministers, laws or sermons. Therefore, as Pharaoh sought to destroy the Israelites by killing their young ones; so Satan, who is filled with spite against the kingdom of Christ, knows there are no such compendious ways to ruin it, as by perverting youth, and suppressing family religion: this is a blow at the root, which causes him to employ all his power and policy this way.

5. It is also very much for your own interest and comfort, to instruct your families in the knowledge of Christ, and ways of religion. Ye may expect that your children and servants will prove dutiful to you. Well educated children will take care of their parents in time of old age, sickness, or poverty: whereas those that are not so, often neglect their parents in the foresaid cases, or wish them dead. If you conscientiously instruct your children and servants, God will reward you for it, even in this life. Abraham, as we heard, made conscience of it; and God blessed him with a dutiful son, Isaac, and a faithful servant, Eliezer of Damascus. What an unparalleled instance have we of Isaac's profound obedience to his father's commands, in submitting patiently to bear the wood, yea, to be bound, and laid upon the altar to be sacrificed? And, what a wise and faithful servant was the steward of his house, Eliezer, whom he trusted with all he had, and with the great concern of his son's marriage, which he managed with great prudence and integrity, and prayed earnestly for the good success of it? So that, if ye sow the seeds of piety in children and servants, yourselves shall reap the fruit thereof, even in this world.

Again, it will be very comfortable to you on a death-bed, to leave a religious praying family behind you. What though you leave your wife and children poor? yet if you leave them praying, God will provide for them while here, and ye shall shortly have a joyful meeting with them in heaven. Your children here will "rise up and call you blessed;" they will praise you, and follow your pious example: and as you took care to hand down religion to them, so will they do to their children and servants, when they come to get families; and, when you are blessing God in heaven, they will be blessing God for you on earth. Nay, they will meet you at a judgment-seat with blessings in their mouths. Your children will bless God that ever they had such parents; your servants will bless him that ever they had such masters, that ever they saw your faces, or came under your roof. It has been known, that many, at a dying hour, have blessed God for determining their lot to fall into such and such religious families, where first they became acquainted with Christ and religion.

A THIRD DOMESTIC DUTY ON THE LORD'S DAY IS GODLY CONFERENCE.

ACCORDING to Isa. lviii. 13, we ought not this day to speak our own words; and consequently we ought to speak religious words, and entertain spiritual discourse, when we are together, concerning Christ and heaven; or about the sermons we have heard, telling one another what we remember thereof, and that which did edify us most.

Godly conference is well pleasing to God; he notices and records all the good words his people speak, Mal. iii. 16. When the two disciples going to Emmaus were about this exercise on the Lord's day, Christ is so well pleased, that he comes to them, and makes the third man; he entertains them with heavenly discourse, and opens their understandings to know the scriptures. We see, when Elijah is so employed with Elisha, 2 Kings ii. 11, he is taken up and transported gloriously into heaven. This is a heavenly exercise, and the employment of the glorified in heaven. It was Christ's work, when he was transfigured on mount Tabor, and met with Moses and Elias: he conferred with them upon the blessed subject of his death and sufferings. O how holy and fruitful was Christ always in his discourse! "His lips dropped as the honey-comb, and his tongue was as choice silver." He spiritualized earthly things, and turned them into heavenly instructions; when he conferred with the woman at the well of Samaria concerning the water of that well, John iv., he quickly drew her from ordinary water to the water of life. And, when eating bread in the Pharisee's house on the Sabbath-day, Luke xiv., he discoursed of eating bread in God's kingdom: so let all the disciples of Christ on this day imitate his example: see that your speech be seasoned with grace, and your lips like those of the righteous that feed many. Speak much this day to the commendation of Christ, and invite others to acquaintance with him; and, when you see it for edification, communicate the experiences you have had of his love; "Come here, all ye that fear God, and I will tell what he hath done for my soul," Psal. lxxvi., and thus one live coal will help to kindle another.

Upon this day of holy rest, Christians should be oft thinking and speaking of the everlasting rest above, and conferring together of the way to it, and their meeting there. Do you believe you are going to that rest, and yet never speak of it? If two or three of you had entered into an agreement to go to America, and seek the gold mines which are there, would ye never be speaking of that country, or desirous to hear of it before your going? O Christians! are ye shortly to be "caught up together in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so to be for ever with the Lord?" and will you not "comfort one another with these words?" according to 1 Thess. iv. 17, 18. It hath likewise been the practice in many places, when religion comes to be in esteem, for young persons to meet together in the evening of the Lord's day for godly conference upon spiritual subjects, or the sermons they have heard, and for prayer and praises to their mutual edification. And it is always observed, that such religious meetings on Sabbaths or week-days are set up in parishes where the gospel begins to thrive, just as naturally as birds draw together in spring; young converts are Christ's "singing birds," Cant. ii. 12.

And the scripture affords good ground and warrant for such meetings, Mal. iii. 16; Psal. lxi. 16; cxix. 63; Jer. xxiii. 35; Acts xi. 5, 12; Heb. iii. 13; x. 24, 25; 1 Pet. iv. 10.

A FOURTH DOMESTIC DUTY ON THE SABBATH IS A HOLY CARE IN MASTERS OF FAMILIES TO RESTRAIN ALL PROFANATION OF THE DAY BY CHILDREN AND SERVANTS, OR ANY WITHIN THEIR GATES.

THE fourth commandment expressly requires this. Though you be not magistrates, yet God has clothed you, who are heads of families, with power and authority in your families, to see to the honour of this day. Use it then for God, as ye will be answerable. Let none under your charge profane this holy day, by working, sporting, or playing; or by idleness or neglect of the duties of the day. See that they duly attend public ordinances and family worship; suffer them not to be absent therefrom.

O masters of families, concur frankly with the minister of the parish to suppress the abuses of this day: you will see them, and know of them, when ministers cannot. Testify against them in your stations, and this will make the minister's work the more easy. O what a sad thing is it in many places, to see ministers left to fight against sin alone, without having one to join with them, or once open a mouth against it! Hence it is that many are turned impudent in sinning, particularly in Sabbath-breaking, and value not a minister's rebuke. Alas! have ye neither love to God nor your neighbours' souls? Have ye no concern for God's glory, nor grief to see him dishonoured? Have you no charity to your near relations, no love to your own children, no concern for your servants or nearest neighbours, no desire to keep them from falling into everlasting burnings; that you will not speak one word to prevent it, or warn them of their hazard?

Let none say, with cursed Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" For God requires you to be doing good to all in your station, and to love your neighbour as yourself. And the fourth commandment expressly makes you accountable for all within your gates.

OBJECT. I have stubborn servants that will not be restrained by my admonitions or reproofs.

ANS. 1. You should be more careful in the choice of the members of your family, and particularly of your servants, since God gives you a free choice in this matter. Consider David's care therein, Psal. ci. 6, 7, "Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me; he that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me. He that worketh deceit, shall not dwell within my house; he that telleth lies, shall not tarry in my sight." Do ye think that he or she is fit for your service, that cares not for God's service? Can you expect a blessing on the work of their hands, who are enemies to God? A godly servant (though I confess he is rare enough to be found) is a greater blessing than many think; he not only works for his master with his hands, but with his prayers, as did godly Eliezer, Gen. xxiv. 12, and to be sure he did his master Abraham as good service by his prayers as by his prudence.

But, 2. If it be your lot to be concerned with stubborn and disobedient servants, let them know that you have authority from God to oblige them to keep the Sabbath, by attending ordinances in public and private, and to restrain them from profaning this day; and, if they will not be reclaimed, to expel them from your house. If they neglect or mismanage your work, would ye not use your power and authority with them, to cause them help their faults? And, were you in as good earnest for God's service on the Sabbath, as for your own upon week days, I am persuaded ye might bring your children and servants to serve God, and keep this day far better than they do.

QUEST. III. What are the secret duties requisite upon the Lord's day?

ANS. It is not enough that we worship God this day in conjunction with others, whether in the congregation or in families: the right sanctification of the Sabbath includes secret duties also, such as prayer, reading, meditation, &c. That religion is not true, which is all visible to the world; for the life of religion lies in the secret intercourses which are betwixt God and the soul, that the eyes of men do not penetrate into. Secret duties are the best trial of our sincerity; the Lord, that seeth in secret, takes special notice of them, and, if duly performed, he will openly reward them. Let us therefore make conscience of them, and that especially upon God's holy day, which is entirely set apart for holy duties: and labour to time duties so this day, as one duty may not jostle out another. As you must not let family duties interfere with public duties; so you must take care that secret duties do not interfere with family ones. But, more particularly:

1. Secret prayer is a duty necessary on the Lord's day, both for preparing us to attend the public ordinances, and for improving and reaping benefit by them afterwards. I do not mean, that this duty is to be confined to the Sabbath only: no; it is necessary every day, according to David's example, Psal. lv. 17; but that it is especially requisite as a part of the worship of this day. Prayer is so necessary, that it is put for the whole worship of God, Acts ii. 21. It is the character of a converted soul, "Behold he prays," Acts ix. 11, but it is the mark of an atheist, that "he calls not upon God," Psal. xiv. And, in a special manner, secret prayer is what every carnal man hath an aversion to. The devil can allow men their church prayers, their family prayers; but, closet prayers he cannot bear with, especially when they are frequent and constant, because they are too much an argument of sincerity. A hypocrite takes no delight in secret prayer, nor in any duty but what is seen of men, and will gain him a name. But, reader, if thou art sincere, thou wilt consider that God's eye is upon thee in private, as well as in public; and therefore wilt seek to approve thyself to God in secret duties, as well as public. As secret prayer was our Saviour's constant practice while on earth, so it was his special injunction to all his followers, Mat. vi. 6. You need not fear that your secret prayers will be forgotten. No: God is every where: he has an ear to hear your secret groans, and an eye to see your secret tears: yea, he has a bottle to preserve them, so as a drop of them shall not be lost.

In our secret addresses, which are more stated and solemn, let us carefully remember the three parts of prayer, confession, petition, and thanksgiving. Let us confess the sins we are guilty of, cry for the mercies we want, and thank God for those we enjoy. Let us mind that this is not only a commanded duty, but our dignity and privilege. What an honour is it for dust and ashes to be allowed access to the great God! for a worm to speak freely to its Creator! for a poor beggar to converse familiarly with the King of heaven? O sinner, would not all thy neighbours envy thee, if thou wert so honoured by an earthly king? Be exhorted then to value and make use of this liberty?

2. Consider at what a dear rate Christ hath bought this freedom for us. How much did it cost him to erect a throne of grace, to which we may repair with confidence? And, shall not we make use of this privilege with thanksgiving?

3. Consider the profit of it: it is like the "merchant ship, Prov. xxxi. 14, that brings our food from afar." By it we trade with heaven, and bring down Christ's unsearchable riches. It is a key to open the treasure of God's mercies to us in the morning, and to lock us up under God's protection at night. By it we prevail with God, screen ourselves from wrath, and put Satan to flight. In a word, prayer is a key to heaven, a shield to the soul, a sacrifice to God, and a scourge to the devil.

4. It is the way to make up and preserve acquaintance with God, which will be of great use to you in the time of trouble, or at the hour of death. It is no small encouragement to you to address one for help, with whom you have had long acquaintance and familiarity, and of whose kindness you have had frequent experience. But, prayerless man, it will be a most melancholy case, when you are going out of the world, to be put to cry to that God you have been an utter stranger to all your life; or to be forced to appear before that God you never loved, or desired to converse with; or to be fain to challenge acquaintance with him, who will utterly disclaim you, and say, "Depart from me, I never knew you." But, O praying soul! that hast acquaintance with God, death will have another view to thee; thou mayest look on it, as Jacob did on the waggons sent to carry him to his friend Joseph, and say, "Now I am going to God, whom I know; I am going to meet with that Friend, with whom I have had a long acquaintance, to whom I have paid many a visit, and with whom I have had sweet secret converse, and whom I have longed to see, and who will embrace me in his arms, and welcome me to glory."

5. Consider what a mercy it is, O man, that God is yet calling thee to prayer, and continuing thee in the land of prayer, when so many thousands, as deserving, are beyond prayer, and lost for ever. O then pray now, while thou hast time to pray, health to pray, helps to pray, and encouragement to pray. Read the gracious promises of life and salvation to you, if you do it, Psal. lxxix. 32; Rom. x. 13. Make this world a time for prayer, and the next shall be a season for praise. Dost thou think to be saved without prayer? Dost thou expect to have thy life without begging it at God's hands? O what oil will it add to thy flames in hell, when conscience will tell thee, if thou hadst prayed, thou hadst not been there? Well then, now thou hast a season for prayer; but, remember, it will not always last: if thou improve it not, expect that God will turn a deaf ear to you in the day of your calamity, at a death bed, or a tribunal. Read, and tremble at that word, Prov. i. 26—28. God says, "He will not hear you when you cry." And, if he refuse to hear you then, who will hear you? Angels will not, saints will not, nearest relations will not, hills and mountains will not: and, what a wretched, forlorn, and forsaken creature wilt thou be? There will be none to own thee then, if thou acquaint not thyself with God by prayer now. See the answer the foolish virgins got, when they came after the door was shut, Matt. xxv. See what an answer the rich man got, when he begged for "a drop of cold water to cool his tongue," Luke xvi. "Seek God, then, while he may be found: call on him while he is near:" otherwise your late untimely cries will not be regarded.

OBJECT. "O, say some, we have not the gift of prayer, we cannot pray."

ANS. I have said enough in answer to this a little before. I shall only add one word. Art thou a Christian, O man, and canst not pray?

Thou mayest as well say, thou art a scholar, but canst not read; a soldier, but canst not fight. Prayer is as essential to a true Christian, as breath is to the body. Why? prayer is the very breathing of the soul to God. So it is called, Lam. iii. 56. O man, have you nothing to say in prayer? then go to God, and tell him so; sit down on your knees, and say, "Here is a poor ignorant creature, that cannot pray; Lord, teach me to pray." The publican made a very short prayer, Luke xviii. "God be merciful to me a sinner;" yet it was accepted, since it came from an humble heart. Oh! if your heart be broken, your words will be accepted, although they be broken and few. The silliest beggar will find something to say at your door, though he expect but a crumb; and can you find nothing to say at God's door, when you have a soul to save, a hell to shun, and Jesus Christ and a kingdom in your view?

But, besides that sort of secret prayer which is more stated and solemn, there is prayer that is more sudden and ejaculatory, when we lift up our hearts to God with some short petitions, on any occasion or emergency. Ejaculatory prayers are useful on every day, but you should have them more frequent on the Sabbath-day. For, since on this day you must "not think your own thoughts, or find your own pleasures," heavenly breathings and pious ejaculations should issue forth continually; by seeking pardon for such a sin, strength against such a lust, victory over such a temptation, and grace to spend Sabbath-time suitably. Are you going to the church, or returning from it? Are you reading, hearing, communicating, praising, or about any other duty? be frequently making use of this kind of prayer, particularly begin and end every duty with it; look up before for assistance, and look up after it for acceptance, and that infirmities in it, for Christ's sake, may be pardoned. These prayers, of all others, are the freest of distraction, they being put up and over before ever Satan be awakened to tempt us. As for other prayers, our preparations to them, though only by the alteration of our posture, give notice to Satan what we are about to do; but ejaculatory prayers are so quickly darted up to God, that they will be in heaven before Satan can shoot any of his darts against us. They are used to keep up communion with God in the intervals of other duties, and for keeping the heart in the fear of God all the day long. As the priests, under the law, were not only to "offer up the morning and evening sacrifice duly," but "to keep the fire burning on the altar all the day;" so we must not satisfy ourselves with solemn and stated duties only, but should study to keep in the fire always by holy thoughts and ejaculations. Christ saith of the spouse, that "her lips drop as an honey-comb," which is either still dropping, or in a continual forwardness to drop. Some of God's people have more devotion this way in their shops, than others have in their closets; and while walking in the streets, or working in the fields, than others have when praying on their knees: they have stricter communion with God this way at their common tables, than others have at a communion table.

A SECOND SECRET DUTY ON THE LORD'S DAY IS READING OF THE SCRIPTURES AND OTHER GOOD BOOKS.

THIS is a duty necessary every day, but especially on the Lord's day: it is the character of the blessed man, that "his delight is in the law of the Lord, and he meditates therein both day and night," Psal. i. This should be particularly verified of us on the Sabbath. Read the word, that you may be taught what to believe of God, what duties you owe to God, and what sins you are guilty of against him. Who can set forth the excellency and usefulness of it? It is a glass to discover our spots, a lamp to guide us in the dark, a fire to warm our cold affections, a magazine to supply us with armour against our spiritual enemies. It is a physic garden, wherein grow all sorts of medicinal herbs for our spiritual maladies. The promises are as fragrant flowers and spices in this garden; believers take many a pleasant walk among these beds of spices. It is an apothecary's shop, out of which we may have eye-salve for our blindness, sovereign cordials in all our soul distresses. David found this to his sweet experience, Psal. cxix. 50. "This is my comfort in my affliction, for thy word hath quickened me." Here are suitable cordials for all our various cases, be it desertion, temptation, poverty, sickness, reproach, persecution, &c. Here are the waters of the sanctuary for cleansing us from our pollutions. Here is the heavenly rain, for making soft and tender our hard hearts.—The scriptures are both food and physic to our souls; here is meat for strong men, and milk for babes. "The two Testaments, as Augustine saith, are the two breasts which we must suck for spiritual nourishment." And there are none of God's children that will call them dry breasts or empty cisterns; they have often afforded them strength, nourishment, light, life, and comfort: O how highly have God's people in all ages prized God's holy word, and the liberty of reading it! It hath been "sweet as honey to their taste." I have read of one who, being a prisoner in a dark dungeon, when light was allowed him for a short time to take his meat, he would take his Bible, and read a portion of it, saying, "He could eat without light, but he could not read without it." I am persuaded there is no better way in this world for improving the faculty of sight, and benefit of light, than by reading the word of God. So far as time can allow you upon the Sabbath, I judge it very profitable to read other good books also, such as our Confession of Faith, Vincent's Catechism, Vincent on the last Judgment, Guthrie's Trial of a Saving Interest in Christ, Alleine's Alarm, Baxter's Call to the Unconverted, Pearce's Preparation for Death, Fox's Time and the End of Time, Doolittle's Call to Delaying Sinners, Baxter's Saints' Everlasting Rest, his Poor Man's Family Book, Gray's Sermons, Flavel's Touchstone of Sincerity, his Saint Indeed, Mead's Almost Christian, the Treatises of Doolittle, Campbell and Henry upon the Sacrament, Rutherford's Letters, the Fulfilling of the Scriptures, Clark's Martyrology, Beard's Theatre of God's Judgments. These, and such like books, next to the Holy Bible, I recommend to the perusal of all private Christians, as being easy and plain to common capacities, and some of the most generally useful, instructing, awakening, soul-searching, and heart-warming pieces, that I have seen among human writings, and which have been blessed to the edification of many thousands.

A THIRD SECRET DUTY ON THE LORD'S DAY IS MEDITATION UPON DIVINE SUBJECTS.

THIS duty is proper every day, much more on the Sabbath, which is set wholly apart for divine employments. It is the character of the blessed man, that "he meditates in God's law day and night," Psal. i. 2. It is a useful and necessary duty; it excites the affections, and quickens the graces; it strengthens faith, Psal. cxix. 92. It nourishes hope, and inflames our love; deep musing makes the fire to burn. Meditation is a great help to every duty, Psal. cxix. 59. It helps to read and hear the word aright, and to know the truths thereof practically; it helps to pray, and yields matter to the tongue, Psal. xlv. 1. It prompts us to confess sin, and mourn for it, Psal. li. 3.

Be persuaded then to engage your hearts to this necessary but much-neglected duty; for, though it be most useful and profitable, yet I know no duty more slighted and forgotten. The best of God's people have cause to lament this most bitterly before the Lord. Who can say with David, Psal. cxix. 97, "O how love I thy law; it is my meditation all the day." As for the generality of the world, they have no sense of the obligation of this duty upon their spirits; they live without thinking, and that proves their ruin. O! if sinners would retire from company, and spend some little time now and then in secret thinking, it would, through the blessing of God, work some change in them. I remember a passage I have read of a dying father, that on his death-bed left it as a charge upon his only son, who was a great prodigal, "That he should spend a quarter of an hour every day in retired thinking;" and, to encourage him to undertake it, he gave him liberty to choose any subject he pleased. The son thinks this an easy task, and engages to do it; and accordingly sets himself to perform his promise. One day he thinks on his bypast pleasures, another day he contrives his future delights: after a while, he begins to reason with himself what was his father's design in laying this task upon him; at length he thinks his father was a wise and good man, and therefore intended and hoped that, among the rest of his meditations, he would some time or other think of religion. When this had truly possessed his thoughts, one thought and question comes upon the back of another, about his bypast life and future state, that he could not contain himself in so short a confinement as a quarter of an hour, but was that night without sleep; yea, and afterwards could have no rest, till he became seriously religious.

O careless sinner, if you think it too much to spend a quarter of an hour every day, I would beg it of you to spend a quarter of an hour every Lord's day in retired thinking upon some spiritual subject. Who knows what it might produce? Do you say this is a hard task? Will it not be far harder to lie in hell a whole eternity thinking on your bypast folly, when there is no remedy? O sinner, will you perish for want of thinking?

Be not scared at the difficulty of it; for though at first this duty seem hard, and corrupt nature show aversion to it, yet press your heart to it, and afterwards you shall find it pleasant. Though it be difficult to climb this mount of meditation, yet, when once we get up, we will be ready to say with Peter, on the mount of transfiguration, "It is good for us to be here." David found it so, "My meditation of him shall be sweet," Psal. civ. 34. The more we meditate on God, the sweeter we will find him. Yea, so sweet did he find this duty, that he spent whole days in it, Psal. cxix. 97; and, as if the day had been too little, he borrows a part of the night too, Psal. lxxiii. 6.

OBJECT. Alas! (some say) our minds are barren of good thoughts.

ANS. 1. If you would accustom yourselves more to the duty, you would have less ground of complaint this way.

2. When your hearts are barren, there are two subjects you can never exhaust. Fix your thoughts upon any one of them, viz. God's mercies to you, and your sins against him. The Psalmist acknowledges them both to be innumerable in the same psalm, Psal. xl. 5, 12.

QUEST. What subjects of meditation are most proper for the Sabbath-day?

ANS. Natural things may be spiritualized, and common things may afford us ground for spiritual instructions, if we had our eyes enlightened, and minds spiritually exercised. But it is fit that on the Sabbath, we choose those subjects of meditation that are most edifying, and most suitable to the great ends of the day. In general, we ought this day to think upon God, upon ourselves, and upon eternity. But more particularly,

I. Meditate upon the goodness of God: both that which is common, and manifested to you in his works of creation and providence, and that which is special and distinguishing, discovered to you above others. That this is a suitable subject for the Sabbath, is clear to any that reads the xcii. psalm with its title.

1. Think upon his common goodness to us, represented in that great mirror of the creation. He hath made the world a commodious habitation for us, arched it over with the bespangled heavens, and floored it with the solid earth. He hath set up great lights in it for our accommodation. He hath placed a tabernacle for the sun, at a due distance from the earth and the upper heavens, to enlighten the stars above and enliven the earth below. And, that we might neither be starved with cold, nor burnt up with heat, he gives us the clouds as fans to screen us from the scorching heat, and as cisterns to water the parched ground. He gives us the wind to purify the air, the sea to be a pond for fish, the valleys to be granaries for corn, the mountains to be a treasure of minerals, the rivers to be as veins to carry refreshment to every part of the earth. Let us admire both the goodness and wisdom of God displayed in his wonderful works, Psal. civ. 24, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches." The Psalmist also saith, "The heavens declare the glory of God," Psal. xix. 1; and indeed we may look up and read it in these shining capital letters of sun, moon, and stars. His being is legible in their existence; his wisdom in their frame; his power in their motion; his goodness in their usefulness; and his faithfulness in their continuance. The book of nature, as well as the scriptures, shows much of God to us. "This book (as one saith) consists of three leaves, heaven, earth, and sea; the creatures therein are so many letters whereby we may spell out the attributes of God: some whereof are capital letters, and more legible than others. Man is a capital letter on earth, the sun in the heavens, and the whale in the sea."

Again, we ought to meditate upon his goodness manifested in his works of providence. He hath curiously formed us in the womb, and carefully watched over us therein. He preserved us several months in that dark cell, without air or breath. He brought us safe out of it, and presently thereafter provided two bottles to sustain us; and ever since hath succoured us in distress, rescued us from danger, supplied us in wants; yea, he hath set us at his own table, and made us live upon his cost, Acts xvii. 28. He hath given us all the creatures for our use and service, yea, the most glorious of them; the angels are our ministering spirits, the lower heavens serve to give us breath, the middle heavens to give us light and heat, and the highest heavens afford us a dwelling-place. The sun shines, the fire burns, the wind blows, and the water flows; nay, all the creatures are at work, both day and night, and all for the service of a poor worm of the earth.

If a friend give us our bread for a month or two, we think ourselves much bound to him; but how much more beholden are we to God, who keeps an open free table for us all the days of the year, and all the years of our life, and even to us when enemies to him? Behold, those who have their mouths opened wide against God, he mercifully puts bread in their mouths! How great is God's goodness to us! and, how great is our ingratitude to him! I know not which of them we should most wonder at. God gives us peace, money, health, and wealth; but, instead of serving him therewith, many offer them up in a sacrifice to the devil and base lusts, according to Hos. ii. 8. God gives some folk strength, and they waste it among harlots; to others money, and they waste it in drunkenness and prodigality; to others power, and they waste it in oppression; to others honour, and they abuse it to pride and vain-glory. Many make use of the mercies of God as darts to shoot against the heavens; they pervert and misapply them for dishonouring God, wounding Christ, and grieving the Spirit; for debauching their bodies, damning their souls, and dashing both tables of the law in pieces before God's face. And yet, even while they are doing so, God is guarding them by his providence, and feeding them by his bounty. "O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works," to such undeserving and ill-deserving creatures! We ought this day to "triumph in the works of his hands," according to Psal. xcii. 5, and cry, "Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him?"

2. Meditate this day upon God's special and distinguishing goodness to us beyond others, both with respect to soul and body: he hath not dealt so with any nation as with us. Both our national and personal mercies are singular, and ought this day to be remembered by us. Hath not God delivered many of you from death, when some dangerous accident, or violent sickness, was threatening to break the slender twig of life, and to let yon fall into the grave, and into hell both at once? Hath he not mercifully recovered you, and given you further space and place for repentance.

Hath not God long preserved this land from the famine, sword, and pestilence, and such destroying judgments as have been making havoc in other nations about us, laying heaps upon heaps? God hath secured our lives, liberties, and estates from rapine and violence, and lengthened out our peace and tranquillity, when other nations have been turned into a seat of war and sea of blood.

Consider the goodness of God to us this day, that we are not among the Jews or Pagans on the earth, that never heard the news of Christ; or among the damned in hell, who are beyond the reach of the offers of Christ. Let us also bless God, that we live not under the Old Testament times, but under the New; not under that darker and harsher dispensation of the covenant by Moses, whose first miracle was the "turning of water into blood;" but under the clearer and sweeter dispensation of the Messiah, whose first miracle was the "turning of water into wine," that cheers the heart of man; and hath mercifully freed us from the heavy yoke of Levitical sacrifices and ceremonies.

Let us also this day thankfully remember God's goodness in delivering us from the yoke of antichristian tyranny, popery, idolatry, and persecution, and frequently blasting the hellish plots and contrivances of our enemies against the gospel and Protestant religion, and preserving us from being invaded in our consciences, or cut off from the wells of salvation, and barred from the springs of ordinances, and having our teachers murdered or driven into corners. Let us bless God, that we have the peaceable enjoyment of pure ordinances under the protection of Protestant magistrates, and are allowed to serve God according to our consciences, to read the bible in our own tongue, and examine the doctrines delivered to us by this rule; and that we are not under the tyranny of bloody papists, forced to hide or burn our bibles, to bow to stocks and stones; or otherwise in hazard ourselves to be burned in fires, or banished our native land.

Let us bless God that we live in a land of light, "a valley of vision," while others about us "sit in darkness, and in the region of the shadow of death;" and that he allows us such rich gospel feasts, while others are visited with cleanness of teeth, and a famine of the word of God: that every Sabbath-day there is a free market of grace publicly proclaimed in our ears, whilst others enjoy silent Sabbaths; yea, though we have slighted his goodness, and loathed the manna and honey-comb, his goodness is renewed and continued with us. "What shall we render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards us?"

II. Another subject of meditation upon the Lord's day, is the work of man's redemption, this day completed by Christ's resurrection.

This is a subject the angels are still prying into; and ought not we much more, who are the persons immediately concerned? Christ never testified such love to them, he never forgave them one sin, he never shed one drop of blood for them; and shall not we, for whom he poured out streams of blood, and to whom he hath forgiven ten thousand talents, be employed in prying into this mystery?

1. Meditate upon the spring of this work, God's infinite free love, that moved him to pity lost mankind, and contrive a way to redeem him; when, in the meantime, he passed by a world of fallen angels, who were the elder brothers by creation, had a more natural claim to the inheritance, and might have been far more serviceable to their Maker than we. Yet, behold, there is not one word of their redemption, no sacrifice provided for them; there is not one devil spared, not one of all the thousands of fallen angels recovered; God presently took vengeance on them all. But O how did his bowels yearn, his heart pity, and his eye spare poor fallen man in his miserable condition! He, indeed, drove Adam out of paradise, but it was a wonder he drove him not presently out of the world into hell, where he had a little before plunged far more excellent creatures than Adam was. Christ took not on him the nature of angels, but he was content to clothe himself with the rags of human flesh, that he might become our Saviour. O glorious incomprehensible love!

2. Think upon the wise contrivance of our redemption. It would have eternally nonplussed the wisdom of angels, to find out a method how to satisfy God's justice, and secure man's happiness both at once; how to save the life of the law-breaker, and yet maintain the honour of the Law-maker. But here is a way to do both, here is a device for reconciling justice and mercy, and satisfying both their demands. Sin is severely punished, as justice required; and yet the sinner is pardoned, as mercy pleaded. It would never have entered the thoughts of angels, that God would have parted with his Son and their Lord, to die a cursed death for vile worms; it would have been blasphemy for any to have thought or spoken it. Though fallen man might have had the liberty to choose any way of redemption he pleased, he could never have proposed this. Indeed, when he had been perishing, he might have cried, O Son of God, have mercy on us; but who would have said, O Son of God, come make thyself a man, come die a cursed death, come suffer hell's pains for me? This noble device originated only in the breast of the eternally wise God; for, had he waited till men or angels had devised a way for our redemption, we had been miserable to all eternity. But what do I speak? the wonders of man's redemption can never be told. Here is a large subject for meditation and admiration, that can never be exhausted by men or angels to all eternity. Let this work be the delight of our souls, especially on the Lord's day. O believers, think much this day upon the love of your Redeemer; remember what he hath done and suffered for you; consider how much he hath given and forgiven to you; view what he hath laid out and laid up for you; think what he hath performed and promised to you; and so you will not want matter of meditation.

III. Another subject of meditation on the Lord's day is our state, and here we may take a view of man's fourfold state. 1. What he once was in a state of innocency. 2. What he now is in a state of nature. 3. What he may be in a state of grace. 4. What he shall be in a state of glory.

1. O sinner, retire this day and think on your misery. If thou be yet in a state of nature, thou art without God and without Christ in the world, thou sleepest and walkest in danger of hell; thou liest still under the heavy load of unpardoned guilt, there is not one of all the numberless millions of your sins forgiven, and they are heavier than ten thousand millstones hung about your neck; for every one of them hath the fearful curses of the law hanging at them; and in the mean time thou liest on the very brink of the fiery furnace, like a man sleeping on the top of the mast in time of a storm; there is but one step betwixt thee and eternal death, nothing but a rotten thread of life keeps thee from dropping into everlasting burnings. Thou knowest not, when thou risest in the morning, but ere night thou mayest make thy bed in hell; and when thou liest down, thou canst not tell but thou shalt wake in the flames; all the men in the world, nay, all the angels in heaven, cannot assure thee of the contrary. O what a doleful condition is this, to be always in a state of damnation, not sure to be one hour out of hell! A serious meditation upon your natural state, O sinner, might cause your heart of stone to tremble.

But hast thou any happiness while thou art on this side of hell? No surely, for your best worldly comforts and enjoyments are accursed to you: "Thou art cursed in the city, cursed in the field, cursed in thy basket and thy store, cursed in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy ground," Deut. xxviii. 15. Nay, every bit of bread thou eatest, the curse of God goes down with it. All your blessings turn into curses, and your mercies into judgments: "your table is a snare to you, the word is the savour of death," and the sacraments are seals of condemnation to you. The best actions you perform are but an abomination to God; they bring the more guilt upon your head, and treasure up the more wrath against you. Better you had perished in infancy than continue to live in a Christless state; for, the longer you live, still the more miserable you are. Every day, every night, every hour you live, you heat the furnace hotter by your new actions, which are all sins, even the very best of them. O is this a state to be continued in? Canst thou lie down contentedly to sleep another night in this condition? God forbid that thou live and die in this state; for, if thou dost, thou wilt rise in the same condition at the last day. Nay, your state then will be more dreadful than ever, for then thou wilt see above thee the Judge frowning, beneath thee hell gaping, within thee conscience gnawing, without thee the world burning; on the right hand your sins accusing, on the left hand the devils terrifying, the good angels keeping thee out of heaven, and the evil angels pulling thee down to hell. O poor Christless soul, continue to think on this subject till your heart begin to melt, your eyes to weep, and your tongue to cry, "O what shall I do to be saved! O that I knew where to find Christ: O to be found in him! I would give ten thousand worlds to be sure of this, it will be terrible if death or a tribunal find me before I be found in him." Is it not worth your while to spend some time upon this soul-concerning subject? Hath not God given you reason for this very end, and will you not exercise it? Can you think to be saved otherwise? Do you expect that God will carry you to heaven like a stone, or save you without or against thy will? Doth the world and your bodies deserve to be remembered the whole day, or whole week or year throughout? and doth not God and your soul deserve to be thought on one day in the week, or one hour of the day? Say not that you have no spare time for this work: for, if you will spare none of your own time for it, I beseech you to spend God's time well this way. Is it not better to spend some part of the Sabbath in thinking upon your soul's state, than in thinking upon the world? Spiritual things, alas! trouble you little on week days, and why should worldly things intrude upon God's day?

2. Think upon your happiness, if you be in a state of grace, and in Christ; you are delivered from sin's guilt, from Satan's fetters, from the law's curses, from death's sting, and hell's terror. Thou hast now peace with God; justice itself is thy friend; all thy enjoyments are sweetened by Christ's love; all your afflictions sanctified by his blood. God himself is your God, your Father, your Friend, your Portion; yea, all things are yours.

IV. Death is a proper subject to be meditated upon on the Sabbath-day; for, in the xcii. Psalm, wherein the exercises of the Sabbath are described, God calls and teaches us to consider our latter end. First, the end of the workers of iniquity, who, though they spring up as grass, and flourish for a season, shall yet in the end be destroyed for ever, verse 7, 9. And again, the latter end of the godly, whose horn, though it be abased to the dust for a while, yet in the end shall be exalted. It is one principal work of ministers this day, to be proclaimers of mortality, and remembrancers of death, according to Isa. xl. 6—8. So then it is our duty every Sabbath to have serious thoughts of death. Think with yourselves, what if this be the last Sabbath that ever I will see on earth? I may be called to die, before I be called to hear another offer of Christ. Have I obeyed the gospel summons this Sabbath, to come and embrace Christ, or to surrender my heart to him? What if I get a summons by death to come and appear before him before the next Sabbath? this I cannot obey. Death is a bold messenger, he cannot be withstood; when he comes and takes a man by the throat, the proudest, stoutest, and strongest in the world, must go, whether willing or unwilling, all is one. There are many in the world, at the church, in health this Sabbath, who will be on a death bed, or in eternity, the next; and, why may not I be one of them?

Think seriously upon your latter end. Think what will be your case in a parting hour, where you will take up your lodging, whether in Abraham's bosom, or in the devil's arms? "O what will be my thoughts, when I am taking my last look of husband, wife, children, and relations? What will be my cordial, when the world fails, when friends are weeping about my bed, when my senses are losing their office, my heart and eye-strings are breaking, and all turning dim and dark about me? O, what if my sleepy conscience awake then, and my old buried sins revive and fall on me, to tear me in pieces?" O what will Christless sinners do in that hour, when there is but one single step betwixt their departing souls and the state of devils? O it is fearful to die in your sins, as it is threatened, John viii. 24. "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." O better die in a dungeon among toads and serpents, than die in your sins; for these are serpents that never leave stinging, and will fasten so upon thee, as never to part with thee again; they will go to the grave with thee as thy companions, to a tribunal with thee as thy accusers, and to hell with thee as thy tormentors. O it is terrible to die out of Christ, and without sight of an interest in him; to make a leap in the dark over a bottomless gulf, not knowing where your feet may light; or to launch into the great ocean of eternity, without sight of a landing-place for your soul. O how will the poor soul shrink back into the body in such a case, when it begins to awaken out of its dream, and look out into another world, saying, "How shall I venture forth, where I see nothing but darkness and horror, or a flaming sword ready to meet me?"

Think upon the continual hazard you are in of death; its arrows are flying thick about you, and many are falling slain on every hand of you; and God knows but the next dart may hit thee. And what if thou be unprepared, and hell follow the pale horse?

Think upon the sottish stupidity of many, who though they stand tottering day and night upon the brink both of the grave and hell, yet can spend whole weeks, yea months, without a serious thought of eternity. Yea, in the house of mourning, and in the sight of the dead, they can think, talk, jest, and laugh, and never have one grave thought or word about their latter end. Foolish sinners are rightly compared to a company of blind men dancing about the mouth of a very deep pit, which they do not perceive, nor hear the groans of those who fall to the bottom of it: now and then one drops in, but still the rest continue the dance. This day a swearer dies, and tumbles into hell; the next a drunkard, the next a whoremonger: but still their companions in sin go on in their mad career, till they drop in too.

Think what a fearful surprise death is to many careless sinners; it lights upon them like a falcon out of the air; they must flit, and they were not thinking on it; they have their lodging to seek, and they know not where. O it is sad to be turned out of the clay tabernacle, and to be put to knock, and cry, "Lodging, lodging for God's sake;" and yet get no other answer but a frown, or, "Depart from me, I know you not!" What cause have we to pray, "Lord, let us not have our work to do, when our day is done; our weapons to seek when the enemy is at the gates, our oil to buy when the market is ended, and the bridegroom come."

Think also upon the happiness of a dying believer, who can go forth half way and meet death, and bid it welcome, as a friend. Death ends his sorrow, and begins his joy. It is an outlet to misery, and an inlet to happiness; it frees him of his greatest grievance in the world, that is, sin. As sin was the womb that brought forth death, so death is the tomb that buries sin; thus God, in his wisdom, causes the daughter to destroy the mother; and hence it is, that death is put in the believer's inventory of goods, 1 Cor. iii. 22. "Death is theirs." It is their Father's servant sent to carry them home to their Father's house:

a palace all bespangled with light, where they shall sigh no more, and, which is infinitely better, where they shall sin no more for ever. They shall be troubled no more with an ill heart, nor a tempting devil; they shall complain no more of darkness, and distance from God; but shall spend a whole eternity in praises, doxologies, hosannas, and hallelujahs to God and the Lamb. Think on the blessed change, O believer, that death will make in thy circumstances ere long. It will transport thee from a cottage to a palace, from a wilderness to Canaan, from a stormy sea to a safe shore, from a vile dunghill to a glorious city, a city whose walls and foundations are of precious stones, its streets of gold, and its gates of pearl; whose light is the Lamb, and whose temple is God. Hast thou not cause then to love the Lord Jesus Christ, who has provided this city for thee, and found out a way to it; who by his death has unstinged death, and by his blood has paved a way through its dark valley for thee to walk in, and fear no ill? O believer, fear not though the trance be somewhat dark, the passage is safe, and the end is light; the day is short betwixt thee and home, 'tis but wink and see God.

Lastly, Think often how holily and spiritually you will wish you had spent this day, when you come to a death bed, and death and eternity begin to stare you closely in the face. You will then begin to wish, O that I had spent more of my time, and especially of the Lord's day, in meditation and prayer! O if God would try me again, how serious and diligent would I be! Consider, on the other hand, what a pleasant death-bed the righteous will have, who have spent the Sabbath religiously! what satisfaction they will have in the review thereof! and what comfort in the prospect of an everlasting Sabbath above, to which they are hastening! They will be rejoicing when others about them are weeping; they will be smiling when their eye-strings are breaking, and inward strength failing. They will be longing to be with Christ, which is best of all. It was a choice saying of one near death, "My head is in heaven, my heart is in heaven, it is but one step more, and I shall be all in heaven." And must not the latter end of such be peaceable and pleasant? Many, doubtless, with Balaam, would wish to die their death, however ill they like their life; many, like that young man, who said to his loose companion (after they had visited holy Ambrose on his death-bed, and saw how cheerfully he was triumphing over approaching death) "O that I might live with thee, and die with Ambrose!" But it is vain to think to dine with Satan and lusts in this world, and hereafter to sup with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven; "for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," Gal. vi. 7.

V. Another subject of meditation on the Sabbath-day is the saints' everlasting rest and employment in heaven. You are called this day to have frequent thoughts of it, since the Sabbath is an emblem thereof, and serves to keep us in mind of it. Take care then, O believer, to spend every Sabbath in the view of heaven, and live every Sabbath as it were to be your last, and behave this day as one that believes you may be in heaven before the next Lord's day, celebrating an eternal Sabbath.

Let your worship this day below put you in mind of that more perfect worship above, where you shall see him whom you worship, and enjoy immediate communion with him. O the difference betwixt that worship there, and ours here, is great! There is no weariness there in beholding God, no wanderings nor excursions of the heart from God, no inclinations there to drowsiness or sleep in worship, no dull or low conceptions of God, no deadness of heart or frame; their harps are never out of tune, their hearts are always up, and fit for the high praises of God. There is no note lower there than "Glory to God in the highest;" every saint sings his hallelujahs on the highest key, and all of them join harmoniously in the work of praising God with one heart and soul. Are congregational assemblies of saints so pleasant on earth, especially when they jointly and melodiously sing God's praise? O what will it be then, when they all meet above in that great "general assembly of the church of the first born," together with the "innumerable company of angels," and there with one heart and voice sing God's praises? How ravishing will it be to hear that eternal music of the bride-chamber, that sweet melody of the church triumphant, where there is no jarring string, no displeasing sound, no discord between heart and tongue, no willows there to hang their harps upon, no bad news to be heard, no sad sight to be seen, no evil to be felt or feared to all eternity. Poor discouraged believers, are ye now troubled with ill hearts and vain thoughts? Are ye plagued with wandering and wearying hearts in duty? These complaints ere long shall be taken out of your mouths; read Eph. v. 27, the church above "hath neither spot nor wrinkle." Once the glorified saints' faces were as black and wrinkled as yours, but now they have none: once their hearts were as bad as yours, but now they are as fixed "pillars in the temple of God, they go no more out."

Take a view this day, by faith, of the glorious company above; behold Christ upon his white throne, Paul with his crown of righteousness, and all the faithful ones in Abraham's bosom. How gloriously they shine in the kingdom of their Father! The sun is a very glorious creature, but it would be useless there, it would not be seen for the brightness of the Lamb; nay, every saint shall be as glorious as that sun. Who can tell the happiness of the inhabitants of that place, where every head wears a royal crown, every hand a palm of victory, every eye overflows with joy, and every tongue with songs of praise? O believer, think with yourself, what a difference there is betwixt your state and theirs! "Oh, I am sighing, they are singing; I am sinning, they are serving God; I am groaning out my complaints, they are trumpeting forth God's praise; I am in darkness, and cannot see God; they dwell in light, and see him face to face. O my Lord, must I stay behind, when they are going? Must I lie groaning and sighing here, while they are triumphing above, and dividing the spoil? My Lord is gone and left the earth, and entered into his glory; my brethren and friends are gone to their blessed rest, and must I wander in the wilderness, absent from home, far distant from my Father and my God? Shall I be satisfied in this state? No, I will look after them with a longing eye; I will lie knocking at the gate till God open to let me in; I will still pant, breathe, and cry, O Lord, how long! How is my pilgrimage prolonged! How am I detained in this valley of tears, wandering in the dark, and can scarce get any sight of Canaan! When shall the days of my banishment be finished, that I may get home to my country and friends above? O when shall I sit at the fountain-head, and drink plentifully of the living streams that make glad the city of God?"

O believer, rejoice in the forethoughts of that day, when thou shalt meet with thy Father and thy brethren, and when thou shalt see thy elder Brother on the throne ready to pass sentence in thy favour. O how sweet will it be, when he is frowning and thundering against the wicked, to see him turn and smile on thee as thy Redeemer! O what love will be in his looks! what melody will that sentence sound in thy ears, "Come, ye blessed of my Father!" &c. How ravishing a surprise, O believers, will it be to meet with your godly acquaintances, with whom ye prayed, praised, and conversed here! O then, may ye rejoice together and say, "This voice of joy we now hear, is not like our old groans and complaints, nor like the oaths, curses, and reproaches our ears were grated with on earth. What is become of our hard hearts, our worldly unbelieving hearts? Where are all our lusts, corruptions, temptations, and burdens now? What is become of a body of death, indwelling sin that lay so long on us a dead weight? What is become of the church's enemies we often complained of?" O! these are all gone, they shall trouble you no more; you shall triumph over them, as Israel did on the other side of the Red sea, when they saw the Egyptians drowned and lying dead upon the shore. These Egyptians, O believer, whom thou once sawest to thy great vexation and trouble, "thou shalt see them again no more."

I might mention many other subjects of meditation proper for the Sabbath; such as the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, the worth of the soul, the sufferings of Christ, the last judgment, and many others, which the sermons you hear that day will bring to your remembrance. But, fearing that I have been too tedious already upon this head, I must pass them, and proceed to another private duty necessary on the Lord's day.

THE FOURTH DOMESTIC DUTY ON THE LORD'S DAY IS SELF-EXAMINATION.

THIS duty is near of kin to the former, it being a sort of reflexive meditation, the mind turns inward and communes with itself, according to Psal. iv. 4. It is absolutely necessary that we should take some time to commune with ourselves, and ask what we are, what we have been, and what we have done, Jer. viii. 6. And is not the Sabbath a fit time for this duty, when we retire from the noise of the world, and are not disturbed with secular affairs? This is a most important duty, and nearly concerns our eternal well-being; but yet it is a duty very much neglected. Many have lived fifty or sixty years in the world, that never spent one hour in communing with their own hearts. There are many going out of the world, who never yet began to inquire why they came into it, and never yet asked the question at their souls, Are you to flit hence, or live here for ever? Why came you hither, and where are you to lodge when you go hence? Many live in a crowd of worldly business, are hurried from one thing to another, leap out of their beds to the world in the morning, and from the world to their beds again at night, and so never find one minute on the week-days to take their soul aside; and for the Sabbath, though they have time for it, yet such is their aversion to the work, they shift it all they can, and avoid meeting with themselves; they rather converse with any in the world, than with their own hearts. It is against self-love and carnal ease for a man to turn his own accuser and judge: therefore many would rather drudge and toil their bodies whole days and weeks at the sorest labour, ere they spent one quarter of an hour at this exercise; and so they live their whole lives strangers to themselves. We would think it strange to hear of two men that conversed every day for fifty or sixty years' space, and yet all this while did not know one another; and yet this is the case betwixt many and their souls; for as long as they have lived together, they are utterly unacquainted, they never turn inward to converse with themselves, they have no serious thoughts about their own state or condition. It is said of the rich man in the parable, Luke xvi., that "in hell he lift up his eyes," as if he had never considered nor bethought himself till that time; and indeed it is the want of retired consideration, and people's serious bethinking of themselves, that is the ruin of many thousands. O then, resolve in God's strength, that, in spite of the devil and your own corruption, you and your souls shall have a meeting, and live no longer asunder; that ye will imitate David, Psal. exix. 59, "I thought on my ways, and turned my feet to thy testimonies." Seeing then ye have free time for this duty on the Lord's day, take your souls aside, and inquire into their state; say, "O my soul, where art thou? Art thou under a covenant of works, or a covenant of grace? Dost thou belong to Christ's family, or the devil's? Art thou in the narrow or broad way? Suppose I should die this night, (for God knows if ever I shall see the morrow's light,) what hope will I have in a dying hour? Where will death land me? Whether with God in heaven, or with devils in hell? Would Christ smile on me in the dark valley, or be my Advocate at God's bar? Is there any saving change yet wrought on my heart and life by a work of conversion? God forbid I undergo my great and final change till this happy change be wrought. Can I say, I am not the man that once I was; 'once I was blind, but now I see?'" Study and inquire into the marks of the converted and unconverted, with the greatest seriousness and anxiety of soul, and see which of them you can apply to yourself; cry, that God may open a window in your breast, to let you see into your own heart and soul's state; and, whatever you be deceived in, beg it of him, that he may not suffer you to be deceived in this momentous point, where your soul and your all is at stake. And, if you find yourself in a bad state, "give no rest to your eyes, no slumber to your eye-lids," till, in God's strength, you resolve on a thorough change.

It is also incumbent on every private Christian on the Lord's day, to practise the works of charity and mercy, both to the souls and bodies of men. Study to promote the edification of others by good counsels, instructions, admonitions, and reproofs. Comfort the afflicted, supply those that are in straits, visit the sick and those that are in misery. These are proper duties on the Sabbath, and God is highly pleased with them, Jam. i. 27. If we practise these duties conscientiously, we may both do good and get good; we may both give direction and comfort to the distressed, and receive instruction and comfort to ourselves. Though we may not inquire at the dead, yet we may learn many wholesome lessons from the dying. And would to God that both the persons visiting and visited were more spiritual in their converse than ordinarily they are! for then this duty would be found very edifying and profitable. But if, when we visit the sick this day, we spend the time in worldly discourse, and not for the spiritual advantage of the sick, and others present, we profane the Sabbath, instead of sanctifying it.

Do we see some oppressed by continual slumbering and sleeping, when death is supposed to be near, so that they cannot think on their everlasting state? Let this teach us to remember our latter end, and awake our souls to their work, while we are in health.

Do we see others troubled with ravings? Let it teach us to employ our reason for our soul's advantage while we have the use of it.

Do we see some sadly discomposed with extreme pains and agonies; Let it mind us to dispatch our work while health and ease remain with us.

Do we observe their sight failing, tongue faltering, or hearing growing worse? O let this teach us to "make a covenant with our eyes," and turn them "away from beholding vanity;" to use our tongues for God's glory, and beware of abusing them now, while we have the use of them; and to employ our ears for hearing spiritual instructions, while they are in case for it.

DIRECTION III.—CONCERNING THE SPECIAL ORDER, METHOD, AND MANNER WHEREIN THE DUTIES OF THE SABBATH ARE TO BE PERFORMED.

THE Lord requires us, not only to take heed to the matter of our duties, but also to the manner of them; not only to do what is good, but to do it well. As we must seek God in due ordinances, so we must seek him in a due order, 1 Chron. xv. 13. Very much depends upon the circumstances of our actions, therefore we must look narrowly to them.

That we may take a view of the sanctification of the Sabbath complexly, and the order and circumstances of the duties therein required; there are three things to be considered:

1. What is requisite in order to prepare for the Sabbath before it come.

2. What is requisite in performing the duties of the Sabbath when it is come.

3. What is requisite at the end of the Sabbath, or when the work thereof is over.

I.—CONCERNING OUR PREPARATION FOR THE SABBATH.

As to the first, that it is needful to prepare for the Sabbath, cannot be denied, if we consider the word remember prefixed to the commandment, "Remember the Sabbath to keep it holy." We must remember it before it come, so as to provide for it. Moses calls the people, Exod. xvi. 23, to mind that "to-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath."

Again, if we consider the nature of the Sabbath-work, and our unfitness for it, preparation for it will be found very needful. We are called this day to make solemn and near approaches to that God who is a glorious Spirit, and to hold communion with him who is infinitely holy; and is it not very necessary that we, who are naturally carnal, and much involved in worldly business through the week, should endeavour to abstract our thoughts from earthly things, that we may draw nigh to so great a God upon this holy day? For holy performances God requires us to make holy preparations; and therefore David saith, Psal. xxvi. 6. "I will wash mine hands in innocency, so shall I compass thine altar, O Lord." The mariner who intends a voyage, not only provides his tackling, but he is careful, before he sail, to put his ship off from the land, that he may catch the first fair wind. In like manner, Christian, if thou wouldst launch heavenwards upon a Lord's day, be concerned to get the vessel of thy heart put off from the earth on the evening before.

Wert thou a person of great quality and estate, and the king should send thee word that he would dine with thee to-morrow, thou wouldst make preparation for his entertainment the day before, by cleansing the house, and putting all things in order, suitable to the dignity of so great a prince. Now, when King Jesus gives thee notice before hand, that on such a day he is to sup with thee, wilt thou not testify thy respect to so great a potentate, by making preparation for him? When Christ prepares a table for thee in the gospel, and furnishes it with all the dainties of heaven, pardon, peace, love, grace, and eternal life; shouldst thou not empty thy stomach, cleanse thy heart, adorn thy soul, and make ready to feast with thy Redeemer? At this gospel table others sit and feed, their souls are filled with marrow and fatness, and their mouths praise the Lord with joyful lips; but alas! many have no stomach; they can eat little, and savour nothing. Their stomachs are foul, their hearts unclean; the world fills their thoughts; they taste no goodness in hearing, in prayer, praises, or any duty of God's worship: why? They are at no pains beforehand to empty their minds of the world, and prepare for this heavenly fare.

Reader, were I to counsel thee how to improve a market-day, so as thou mightest gain much wealth and treasure, I doubt not but thou wouldst hearken to me: and wilt thou not regard me, when I am to advise thee how to spend the Lord's day, the market-day for thy soul, so as thou mayest get the true treasure, even durable riches and righteousness? Lay aside worldly cares, remember, and prepare for this market-day, before it come, and beg skill from God how to improve it aright to the enriching of thy soul. Anciently there were laws obliging people to lay aside their work at such a particular hour on Saturday's afternoon, that they might remember and prepare for the Sabbath: likewise it was a custom in some places to have public divine exercise and worship on the Saturday's evening; so that, at the ringing of a bell for it, people gave over their work, and repaired to the church to worship God, and hear something suitable and preparatory to the Sabbath: I cannot but commend this practice, as a good way to conclude and shut up all the labours and cares of the week, and publicly to give God thanks for prospering the works of our hands, and also to confess and mourn for the carnality of our hearts, and our little minding of Christ and heaven in our weekly business, and our manifold short-comings in our duties both to God and man, and our forgetting and not practising through the week the sermons we heard the preceding Sabbath: likewise it is a good way to take off our hearts from the world, and to compose and spiritualise the thoughts for the work of the approaching Sabbath; and also to pray and wrestle together for a blessing on the same, and for special assistance to ministers and people in the duties of the day, that the ensuing Sabbath may be one of the best Sabbaths we ever had, and that it may be one of the days of heaven to our souls.

But more particularly, the preparation needful for the Sabbath consists in these things:

1. In your dispatching and ordering your labour and business through the week with such prudence and foresight, that it may nowise hinder or disturb you on the Sabbath-day.

2. In leaving off your work timeously the night before, and going seasonably to rest, that both your servants and you may be in case to rise early on Sabbath morning, and not to be drowsy or sleepy through the day. It is a great encroachment upon the Sabbath that some are guilty of, they sit up and work later on Saturday's night than any other night of the week; they lie longer on Sabbath morning than any other day; they go sooner to bed on Sabbath night than any other night, and they rise sooner on Monday morning than any other day of the week. Now, what is this but a grudging God his due time, a wearying of his day, and making it as short as you can, and seeking to win it, if possible, from off the Saturday's night and Monday's morning?

Under the law, the latter part of the day, preceding the Sabbath, was called "the day of preparation for the Sabbath," Luke xxiii. 54, intimating that it is our duty to prepare for the Sabbath before it come, and to do it upon the day preceding. Likewise, we find that Nehemiah ordered the gates of Jerusalem to be shut when it began to be dark before the Sabbath, Neh. xiii. 19, thereby teaching us timeously to give over our trafficking and worldly business on the evening before the Lord's day, and not to follow our business too late, lest our thoughts be too much embarrassed with secular affairs, and we be thereby indisposed for the religious duties of the ensuing holy day.

3. It would be a good way to prepare for the Lord's day, sometimes to take your children and servants on the Saturday's night, when you call them together for family worship, and instruct them concerning the end and institution of the Lord's day which is approaching, and the nature of the service that is requisite upon it. The Lord commends Abraham, for "commanding his household and children after him to keep the way of the Lord," Gen. xviii. 19. And he frequently directs the Israelites to instruct their children concerning the meaning of their rites and observations; and particularly concerning the passover, he saith, Exod. xii. 26, 27, "And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you, What mean you by this service? that ye shall say, it is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians," &c. So, in like manner, concerning the observation of the Lord's day, you should tell your families, "The day of sacred rest, now approaching, is a memorial of God's wonderful love to us, that when we were lost and undone by sin, cursed by the divine law, and excluded out of God's rest, our Lord Jesus Christ undertook a great work for us to make up our peace, become our surety, and bear the curse and wrath due to us; and when he had so done, and finished his work of redemption, he, on the first day of the week, entered into his rest by his resurrection, and thereby made known to us that we should keep this day as a day of holy rest to him, in remembrance of his glorious work, and as a pledge of our celebrating an everlasting Sabbath with him above, in admiring his love, and singing his praise: and therefore let us make suitable preparation for this solemn day, and the duties of it." Alas! the omission of such instructions as these to young persons, causes the observation of this day, with many, to be built only on custom and example; and hence follows the great neglect of Sabbath-sanctification, which is so common among us.

4. If you would prepare for the Sabbath, call off your thoughts timeously on Saturday's night, from worldly cares and business, that you may think on the great work of the approaching day; and labour to put yourselves in as solemn and as serious a frame, as if you were to die and step into eternity, and be judged at God's tribunal; or as if you were visibly to promise to meet with God, and solemnly treat with him concerning your salvation.

As godly Nehemiah took care to shut the gates of Jerusalem on the evening before the Sabbath, that no burdens might be carried in on the Sabbath-day; so secure you the gates of your hearts on the Saturday's evening, that no worldly thing may enter to disturb you in the performance of the great and solemn duties of the Sabbath.

5. Look back on the bypast week, and examine your actions therein as particularly as you can, and repent for all the sins thereof, whether omission or commission, and flee to the blood of Christ to be cleansed from the guilt and filth of them, that so you may be prepared to appear before a holy God, who is "of purer eyes than that he can behold iniquity." O seek to get all quarrels through the week removed, that you may have a reconciled God to meet with upon the Sabbath.

6. Study to have a deep sense of your wants upon your spirits, that you may get suitable supplies for them upon the Sabbath. If you were going to a great market next day, you would be thinking the night before what you wanted or needed thereat: the Sabbath is the great market-day for your souls, when you may hear Christ crying, as Rev. iii. 18, "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed," &c.

7. Think upon the great design of the Sabbath, the commemoration of Christ's redeeming love; and entertain serious and thankful thoughts of the goodness of God manifested in the glorious work of redemption; and with godly Nehemiah, Neh. ix. 14, bless God for giving you the Sabbath, since it is such a pleasant and profitable day for the soul.

8. Beg earnestly for God's help to sanctify the Sabbath, and that God may put you in a spiritual frame for the work thereof, and that you may have grace to leave all your worldly care "at the bottom of the hill, while you go up into the mount to worship God, and return again to them." Beg that the sins of the bygone week, and the misimprovement of former Sabbaths, may not hinder God's presence upon the ensuing Sabbath. Pray that ministers may be directed to a suitable word for your soul's case, that your hearts may be prepared, your enemies restrained, and God's ordinances blessed, so that it may be a good day, "a day in God's courts is better than a thousand elsewhere."

And then, having so ordered and disposed matters, lay yourselves down to sleep in Christ's arms, and under his protection, leaving your hearts in heaven, that when you awake next morning, you may be still with God. Study to sleep, as well as "eat and drink, to the glory of God." Go to bed with this design, that your bodies may be refreshed, and fitted to serve your souls in the service of God upon the ensuing day.

II.—CONCERNING THE DUTIES OF THE SABBATH.

As to the second thing proposed, what things are requisite in doing the work of the Sabbath, when it is come? This is a large subject; I shall reduce all I have to say upon it to three heads;

1. What is necessary before the public worship.
2. What is necessary in time of public worship.
3. What is to be done after the public worship is over.

As to the first, take these directions:

I. When you awake on Sabbath morning, rejoice at the approach of this blessed day: as the birds chirp and sing at the dawning of the morning's light, so let believers account the light of this day sweet, as being a day of signal mercies, a day of communion with God, a day wherein the Spirit's dews fall upon the soul. As "Abraham rejoiced to see Christ's day," John viii. 56, so ought you this morning, saying with the Psalmist, Psal. cxviii. 24, "This is the day the Lord hath made, we will rejoice and be glad in it."

II. Let your souls be breathing forth holy meditations and ejaculations upon your very first awakening: lift up your hearts in thanksgiving to God for that comfortable rest and sleep he hath vouchsafed to you the night past: for "it is he that giveth his beloved sleep," and who renews his mercies to us every morning. Likewise give up and dedicate yourselves wholly to God and his service this day: and, betwixt your walking and rising, you may have such meditations as these: "O if I could say this morning with Isaiah, chap. xxvi. 9, "With my soul have I desired thee in the night, and with my spirit within me will I seek thee early!" Let me this morning awake early from sin to righteousness, 1 Cor. xv. 34, or that in Rom. xiii. 11, 12, "It is high time to awake out of sleep. The night is far spent, the day is at hand; let me cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armour of light." Or, think on your awaking out of the sleep of death, and rising out of the grave at the sound of the last trumpet, what a solemn waking that will be. Or, think of God's goodness to thee, that thou awakest in life, health, and safety this morning; say, "What a mercy is it, that God has kept my house from firing, and falling on my head! that he hath chained up Satan my enemy, that he could neither hurt nor fright me in a visible manner! Many have lain down this night without sleep, and been full of tossings to the dawning of the day; but, blessed be God, I have laid me down in peace, I have slept and waked again, and my sleep hath been refreshing. How would I value this mercy, if I were in sickness, and could not get sleep! Many have lain down and slept, but never waked again in this world; their first waking has been in eternity: and O! how sad, if it be in the flames of hell! But, O what shall I render to the Lord, that I wake again in the land of prayer, and of hope; and upon a Lord's day morning, wherein I hope to hear again the joyful sound, and see his power and glory in the sanctuary!"

If it is a summer morning, when the sun may be up and shining when thou awakest, then think, Christ the light of the world rose early this morning from the dark grave, wherein he lay buried for my sake. "The Sun of righteousness was up this day before the natural sun." Or think, "This is the day wherein God said, 'Let there be light, and it was so.' Is the light so sweet, and is it so pleasant a thing for the eyes to behold the sun? O how much more to see Christ, the bright Morning-star, this day by the eye of faith, to see the Sun of righteousness shining in the firmament of gospel-ordinances! Let me rise and prepare for this sight; O that my eyes may be cleared, and the mote taken out of the eye of faith, that I may this day see him, in comparison of whom the sun is but a dark clod of earth! O my soul, rise from the earth this day, get the moon under thy feet, and clothe thyself with the sun; draw nigh to God in Christ, and set thy affections on things above; thou art capable of communion with God, do not debase thyself in raking always in the dunghill of this world, in licking the dust with the serpent, or feeding on husks with the swine, as if thou hadst no higher end to serve than the world. Why wilt thou lie among the pots, and wallow in the puddle, when crystal streams are so near?"

Or think, "How happy are the angels, who are exempted from the necessity of sleep! They never rest, nor weary of God's work, but 'praise him day and night.' Behold, the sun never wearies to serve his Creator: how many thousand miles has the sun travelled since the last night I went to rest, that he might bring the light of a new Lord's day to me, a poor undeserving creature! And, shall not I rise with cheerfulness to celebrate this day, and serve my God and Saviour upon it? It is a mercy the natural sun is risen; but a far greater that the 'Sun of righteousness' is up, and hath ascended to his meridian, that he may the better diffuse the influences of light and heat upon poor cold and blind souls, such as I am: I will get up this day, and lie in his way as he passeth by, and cry with the blind man, 'Son of David, have mercy upon me.'"

Lastly, The morning sun may remind thee of the danger of secure, Christless souls. The sun shone bright on Sodom that morning it was destroyed: little did they think that fair morning, that the clouds would gather on a sudden, and drop fire on their heads; neither knowest thou, O Christless sinner, what a storm of wrath may fall on thee before night: wherefore flee presently out of the Sodom of a natural state to the Zoar of Christ's righteousness.

III. Rise full as early this day as on other days, and be as soon at God's work this day, as you are at your own work on other days: God is the best Master, his work the sweetest, and his wages the greatest. Yet, alas! there are many who lie long on the morning of the Lord's day, they are loth to rise and fall to God's work; when they rise, they have no time for secret and family duties before the public worship: so that they are either slightly performed, or wholly neglected. O foolish sinner! dost thou think thy worldly business more worthy of thy early rising; than thy spiritual employment? Or wilt thou show greater regard to thy worthless body, than to thy gracious God, and thy precious soul? You owe thanks to God, that you have had the bypast week for your own affairs, and that now you have the prospect of another for them, and that God lets you see the first day of it; but O consider, that your Creator and Redeemer puts in for some time with you. All your time is not your own, neither is it in your own hands, God alone is the Author and Disposer of it. Well then, now is the time, this is the day that he requires: O let him have it wholly, seeing he gives you six times as much for yourselves. And grudge him not the morning of his own day. Remember that promise, Prov. viii. 17, "They that seek me early shall find me." In the morning the spirits are most fresh and lively, and fittest for contemplations and prayer. We are told, Exod. xvi. 13, that in the morning the dew and manna fell. Wouldst thou have the dew of a blessing to fall on thy soul, and to make thee as a watered garden? then rise early to wait for it. This was the practice of the saints; Job rose early and offered his sacrifices, Job i. 5. David prevented the dawning of the morning with his prayers, Psal. exix. 147. Christ rose early this day before the sun. And for what end did he rise? Even to justify and save his people. O believers, did your Saviour rise early this morning to justify you, and will you not rise early this day to glorify him? This is the great design of the Sabbath. And the xcii. psalm, which is intituled, A song for the Sabbath-day, saith, "It is good to show forth God's loving-kindness in the morning." Timeousness at God's work on this day, or diligence in it, will not prove prejudicial to health; for, since God hath pronounced a special blessing upon the Sabbath, you have ground to expect that less sleep, food, and refreshment, than at other times, will be blessed for your support in his work, and that you shall live in the doing thereof.

IV. When you are up, hasten to put on your clothes, and spend as little time this day in dressing yourself as possible, that you may have time for secret duties, and retired converse with God. But, since the body must be clothed this day, let your thoughts be well employed in the time you are doing it: think on sin, that was the cause of your soul's nakedness, and of your body's need of apparel. Remember from whom you have your clothes, to cover, keep warm, and adorn your bodies, even from God, it is his wool and his flax; therefore give thanks to him for your raiment, as well as your food. And though your clothes be not so fine as you would wish, yet mind that "these of whom the world was not worthy, wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins:" and, if you be not so outwardly splendid as others, seek that decking which will "make you all glorious within."

When others are following vain fashions, seek ye to be "covered with the robes of Christ's righteousness." And, since you are this day to make a solemn appearance before God your heavenly Father, you must be sure, like Jacob, to come in the garments of your elder Brother, otherwise you cannot expect your Father's blessing. Put no confidence in your own righteousness; for it is no better than rags, or a garment full of holes, the least whereof is sufficient to let in the curse of God upon you. Therefore "put on the Lord Jesus," if you would this day appear before God, and be accepted of him. Take care also, that your bodies this day be gravely and decently apparelled, and beware of pride and vanity this way, if ye would have God to own you; the adorning which he recommends is not that "of plaiting the hair, wearing of gold, and putting on of apparel, but the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price," 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4. Most people on the Sabbath are concerned to adorn their bodies with their best clothes; but, alas! who among you is careful to attire his soul as he ought on this day, when he is going to meet the blessed Redeemer of souls, the King of glory?

Mind your souls chiefly this day, and take care, whatever you be doing about your bodies, that your hearts be employed in spiritual meditations. Do you comb your head? you may think how numerous your sins are; they are "more than the hairs of your head," so that "none can reckon them," Psal. xl. 12. And to be sure, if you cannot reckon them, you are far less able to reckon for them. Do you wash your hands? think on the necessity of "washing your hands in innocency, that so ye may compass the altar of God:" for those that would "ascend the hill of God, and stand in his holy place, must have clean hands and pure hearts." Holiness both in heart and life is absolutely needful, in order to our enjoying communion with God in ordinances.

V. As soon as possibly you can, retire this morning for the duties of secret prayer, praise, reading the word, meditation, and self-examination. Much of the Sabbath, and especially the morning of it, should be spent in praising and thanksgiving, upon account of God's goodness, both common and special, manifested in the works of creation and redemption. It is a most necessary and proper duty to "show forth God's loving-kindness on the Sabbath morning," Psal. xcii. 2. Thanksgiving is the great end of the day, and of the mercies of it; "the redeemed of the Lord" ought this day to sing, "His mercy endureth for ever," Psal. cvii. 2; for God sent his Son to redeem us for this very end, that he might have from us "the praise of the glory of his grace," Eph. i. 6, 12, 14. And if you deny him praise, you do what you can to disappoint him of the design of this wonderful work. Many serious souls think the Sabbath should be spent only in prayer, mourning, mortification, &c., and almost wholly neglect the duty of praise, which ought to be the principal, and wherewith God is best pleased. Remember that praise is not only the end of the day, but the end of your lives; yea, the design of all God's works: God made man the tongue of the creation, to trumpet forth aloud what the rest of the creation do but silently whisper.

DIRECTIONS IN PERFORMING THE FORESAID DUTIES.

BEFORE I proceed further, I shall give some special advices concerning the duties of secret reading, prayer, and self-searching.

I.—OF READING THE WORD.

As to the reading of God's word, if you would do it with profit, then,

1. Look up to God for his blessing upon it. When you begin, pray that he may "open your eyes to see the wonders of it," and that he may "open your ears and hearts to hear and comply with it as the voice of God."

2. In reading the word, quicken yourselves to all possible attention. As children will rouse up themselves at the reading of their father's will, out of expectation of some portion or legacy bequeathed them therein by their father; so ought you to rouse up yourselves in reading of the word, in regard of the many rich and precious legacies which our Saviour hath bequeathed to you, in that last will and testament of his, sealed by his own blood.

3. Read the word with holy reverence, as if Jehovah himself stood by, and spake these words unto you; for reading is a kind of holy conference with God, and therefore ought to be gone about with a holy awe and concern. I do not mean that this reverence is to be shown to the paper and print, but the matter contained therein, though even these, as the dead bodies of saints, ought not to be used dishonourably, as I have heard some graceless merchants do, by rolling up their small wares in leaves of the bible. Is this like the practice of the ancient martyrs, who made more account of a leaf of the bible than of a treasure? And indeed the leaves of the bible, in some sense, are the field where the treasure is hid, and the pearl of price may be found; they are the swaddling-clothes of the holy Jesus. And therefore, in the next place,

4. Have an eye to Christ in every thing ye read, for he is the end, scope, and substance of the whole bible, and every thing in it is reducible to him.

5. Read it with application to yourselves, as if God spoke to you by name and surname in every line of it. Read it as if it were a letter sent straight from heaven to you, to warn you against sin, and to persuade you to faith and holiness. Let us accept of its reproofs and admonitions with thankfulness, and say, What a mercy is it that we may read our Father's will in our mother-tongue, and that God speaks his mind so plainly to us in his word?

6. Mark the special passages of the word, either these that are most important in themselves, or most applicable to you. Mark the duties enjoined, and sins forbidden, with the promises to the one, and threatenings against the other: fasten these upon your memories, and hide them in your hearts; meditate on them, and pray that God may keep them in your minds, ready for use against the time of need.

II.—OF SECRET PRAYER.

As for secret prayer, take these directions, if you would speed in it:

I. See that you be new creatures, and born again, if you would pray aright. A child, while in the womb, cannot cry; so no more can you cry, Abba, Father, while in the womb of a natural state. An unconverted man's prayers are not accounted prayers before God. The long prayers which Paul had, while a Pharisee, were not reckoned prayer at all; but, when he is a converted man, we are told then, with a Behold, that he prayed, Acts ix. 11.

II. Be frequent in this duty, for your needs are many. God hath erected the "throne of grace for the time of need," Heb. iv. 16. And he hath left the more needs upon us, that he may the oftener hear from us; he loves to hear his people's voice, and great need have we to let him oft hear it; for we have many lusts to be subdued, many graces to be strengthened, many doubts to be resolved, and many grievances to be redressed: therefore be frequent in your addresses to God. Frequency begets familiarity, and familiarity confidence; we go boldly to his house, we often visit. Eusebius tells us of the apostle James, surnamed the Just, that he kneeled so oft and so long in secret prayer, that his knees became as callous and insensible as a camel's. And he tells us of the first Christian emperor, Constantine the Great, that he kneeled very much in secret prayer:—and, for an example to others, that he had his image in his coins, pictures, and statues, represented in the same praying posture, with his hands spread abroad, and his eyes lift up to heaven. King David was frequently in this exercise, Psal. lv. 17, "Evening, morning, and at noon, will I pray and cry aloud." And, if that be not enough, he says, Psal. cxix. 164, "Seven times a-day will I praise thee, because of thy righteous judgments."

III. Affect privacy and retirement in it. Strive to let no ear hear but God's; for his ears are open to the most whispering prayers that can be put up: not that we should be ashamed of our duty, but that we may avoid misconstruction, and hide pride from our eyes; for, when there is a desire that men should take notice of our prayers, God takes no notice of them, unless it be to abhor and reject them. But if you be so circumstanced, that you cannot pray without being observed, you cannot help it; for it is better to hazard the censure of others, than the neglect of prayer: only take care there be no ostentation in the doing of it.

IV. Pray with holy awe and reverence of God, before whom you bring yourselves. Labour for as much devotion and seriousness in prayer, as if you were taken up and presented before God, on his holy throne, with millions of glorious angels ministering to him; or, as if you saw death and the grave on the one hand, and heaven and hell on the other; or, as if you heard the saints singing in heaven, or the damned roaring in hell. Do you not believe these things as well as if you saw them? and why are you not as serious as if you did see them?

V. Study to pray in faith, eyeing the power, mercy, and promise of God, and relying upon the mediation and righteousness of Jesus Christ; for those who pray thus, shall not seek God in vain. This kind of prayer is like Jonathan's bow, 2 Sam. i., "that never returns empty."

VI. Pray with fervency and importunity. Why? for ought you know, this may be the last Sabbath you may see, the last sermon you may hear, and the last prayer you may put up. Pray therefore as a dying man would and should do. Remember how fervent you have seen some dying persons in prayer, and labour for the same frame and fervency. You should seek this day, to have such a feeling of spiritual wants, and to have your bowels so pinched with a sense thereof, that, like the hungry and almost starved beggars, you may cry aloud for the bread of life. Let your prayers be the travail of your souls, and not the labour of your lips. Let your hearts be suitably affected in all the parts of prayer; never leave confession without some sorrow for sin, nor petition without some sense of the worth of mercies, nor thanksgiving without some solace and joy in God, the Author and Fountain of all our happiness. Let your affections correspond with your expressions, and continue instant in prayer. You ought this day, like Samson, Judg. xvi., to "bow yourselves with all your might" in prayer, to pull down the pillars of Dagon's temple, and the strongholds of sin in your souls. "Lift up your hearts with your hands to God in the heavens, and stir up yourselves to take hold of him." Cast yourselves down at his feet, and say, as once a great man did to his prince, "I am resolved never to rise till I obtain mercy."

VII. Use arguments with God in prayer, either taken from God's power and mercy, or from your misery and necessity. Dost thou doubt, O man, if thou be converted? then lie sobbing before God, like that leper, Matt. viii., "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean;" q. d. Lord, thou mayest do as thou wilt; but this I know, though thou should never help me, that thou can do it. Thou hast power enough, yea, it is easy for thee, and will be no manner of trouble to thee, to change my heart, and give me an alms of mercy. Thou hast mercy as well as power; I have heard a good report of thy mercy, that "the King of Israel is a merciful King, and delights not in the death of a sinner," and that "his mercy endures for ever." Lord, here a poor condemned rebel comes in upon the proclamation, to accept of the King of heaven's indemnity; I lay myself at thy feet, content to accept of mercy upon any terms: "Hast thou not one blessing for me, even for poor me, O my Father?" If there be not enough of merit in Christ to save me, I do not seek salvation; but in him I know there is a fullness of redundancy, a treasure that cannot be emptied. And, Lord, art thou not willing as well as able? Hast thou not opened thy side, that I might look in and see the yearning of thy bowels? yea, I have heard many times sounding towards lost sinners: why then should I go dwell with everlasting burnings? "What profit, Lord, is there in my blood? The dead cannot praise thee, they that go down to the pit cannot celebrate thy goodness." Is it not better to make me a friend, than let me be an enemy? Is it not better that I should eternally sing thy praise, than live for ever blaspheming thy name? "Lord, what shall I do to be saved? Is there no balm in Gilead for a wounded soul?" Is there no hope for a distressed sinner? Is there no city of refuge for a pursued criminal? Lord, I am come like a starving beggar to the last door for relief, if thou help me not I must perish at thy threshold, I can go no further. Could we believably make use of such arguments as these, Christ's pitiful heart would burst out in midst thereof, and say to us as to the woman of Canaan, Matt. xv., "O woman, great is thy faith, be it to thee even as thou wilt."

VIII. As on Sabbath morning we should address God with more solemnity and intenseness, and with greater length than ordinary; so also with special petitions for the day.

1. Pray for yourselves that God may give you hearts and frames to sanctify a Sabbath to the Lord; that he may prepare your hearts for hearing, strengthen and sanctify your memories, go alongst with you to the sanctuary, and allow his presence there. Before you enter upon the public work of this day, labour to get your hearts possessed effectually with these truths: that God must work his own work in you and for you, or it will never be done; and without him you can do nothing: that there is no healing virtue in the waters of the sanctuary, unless the angel of his presence descend and move them: that as in the first creation the Spirit moved on the waters, and then the living creatures were formed; so the Spirit must move upon the waters of ordinances, before they can produce or increase spiritual life: and as he must move upon the ordinances, and give virtue to them, so he must move upon your souls in attending on them. Pray earnestly then, that God may give you his Spirit to prepare you for hearing of his word, and to assist you in hearing; and, particularly, that he may give you attention to hearken, understanding to conceive, wisdom to apply, judgment to discern, faith to believe, memory to retain, and grace to practise what you shall hear; that so the word may prove unto you "the savour of life unto life," and not "the savour of death unto death." O pray fervently, that it may not be your condemnation to go to the sanctuary every new Sabbath to get new bands laid upon you, to get your hearts more hardened, your affections more deadened, and your souls slain by the words of God's mouth; but that the word may be attended with saving power, for your conviction of sin, and your conversion to God in Jesus Christ the Mediator. Be so intent for Christ's presence this day, that no Lord's day may satisfy you without the Lord of the day. O what is the best day that ever was without the Ancient of days? What are the ordinances of God, without the God of ordinances? What are the assemblies of saints, without the Master of assemblies? What is a sermon, without a Saviour? What is a communion-table, without a communion with God? What is a Sabbath-day, without the Lord of the Sabbath? Protest therefore in a humble but an importunate manner, that you will be satisfied with nothing this day, without his presence; say with Moses. Exod. xxxiii. 5, "If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence." And cry to him with the church, Isa. lxiv. 1, "O that thou wouldst this day rend the heavens! O that thou wouldst come down, that the mountains might flow at thy presence."

2. Pray for him that dispenses the word, that God may open to him both a door of utterance, and a door of entrance; and particularly, that God may direct him to speak something that may be suitable to your case. It is a great loss to yourselves, as well as to ministers, that you pray so little for them. What is the reason that many times ministers are straitened in delivery, do not reach your hearts, nor speak closely to your case? it is because you pray not for them. Mind that sad threatening, Ezek. iii. 26, where the Spirit saith to the prophet, "I will make thy tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth, that thou shalt be dumb, and shalt not be to them a reprover; for they are a rebellious house." O pray against this sad judgment, and beg that God may loose the minister's tongue, and put a word in his mouth for you. Can you expect a blessing on your food, when you will not so much as seek it from God, by praying for him that is to break the bread of life to you?

3. Pray for the whole congregation, that the Sabbath may be a day of the Son of man, and a day of God's power unto them. Pray that Christ may mount the white horse of the gospel, gird his sword on his thigh, and ride in triumph among them; that the arrows of his word may be sharp, and pierce hearts. Beg that some may be convineed, others strengthened, and others comforted. Pray that God's word preached may not only be as a living song to the hearers, as Ezek. xxxiii., but as a lively song to them, that many may have it to say as David, Psal. cxix. 50, "Thy word hath quickened me." Pray that God may this day make his word as a "sharp two-edged sword," to divide betwixt sinners and their sins; that he may cause its point prick their hearts and savingly wound their consciences, and make its edge fetch blood from their lusts, yea, hew them in pieces like Agag, before the Lord. Pray that God may make his word both as a fire and a hammer to the congregation; a fire to burn up the stubble of their corruptions, and a hammer to break the rocks of their hearts into pieces. Pray that it may be as the key of David, both to open and shut many hearts on this day; a key to open hearts, so as they may never more be shut upon Christ when he stands and knocks at them; and a key to shut hearts, so that they may never open to sin and Satan when they knock for entrance. Pray that the whole congregation may get grace to hear sermons, and put up prayers this day, as if they were the last that ever they were to hear or put up in this world: and that Zion's King may take to himself his glorious, conquering power, and in his majesty ride prosperously; and that he may make the arrows of his word "sharp in the hearts of his enemies, so that the people may fall under him."

IX. You must take care, that your secret prayers on Sabbath morning be early and seasonable, that they interfere not with family worship, which ought this morning to be timeously performed before the public worship begin; for one duty must not jostle with another, every duty is beautiful in its season. And in family prayer you must be more solemn and particular than at other occasions; our sacrifices this day ought to be doubled. O it were happy, if secret and family duties were our souls' delight on this day; and if we had such spiritual skill to perform them, that they might be helps, not hinderances to public ordinances.

Lastly, Having this morning put up your fervent prayers to God, you ought to look and wait for a return of them through the day. A wise merchant, that sends a ship to the sea, will inquire after her. Prayer brings your food from afar, look what becomes of it. If you present a petition to a prince, you wait what answer will be returned; and are ye not much more concerned in this case to do it? If you look not after your prayers, it is a sign you have little sense of your needs; little sense of the burden and yoke of sin; little sense of the preciousness of Christ, or the excellency of these mercies you have been seeking. You ought this day to be able to say, as Psal. xxv. 5, "On thee do I wait all the day." Your souls should be still panting after God and the light of his countenance, saying, "O that I may this day behold the beauty of the Lord! O that I may see his power and glory! O that I may taste that he is good! O that I may hear his voice, may bear his image, may be brought into the chamber of presence, and see him through the lattice of ordinances!"

If ye would have a gracious return this day, you must be looking above ordinances and duties to him who is "the dew of Israel," and expect the heavenly rain from himself; otherwise your fleece will remain dry, for all that men or angels can do. Therefore plead with God that he will bless and concur with the means, and "breathe upon your dry bones," without which the breath of men can never make them alive.

III.—OF SELF-SEARCHING.

As to the duty of self-searching, it is very necessary on the Sabbath morning, in order to prepare your souls for the work of the day.

I. Inquire into your own state; try whether you be in nature or grace, that, when you hear the word, you may know what belongs to you: for, if you be ignorant of your condition, you may apply promises for threatenings; conclude for heaven, when you are heirs of wrath; persuade yourselves of the love of God, when you are in a state of enmity.

II. Inquire into your particular necessities, what are these wants you would have supplied by the word, these sins and lusts you would have slain by it, what are these weak graces you would have strengthened by it, what are these doubts you would have resolved by it, and these heart-plagues you would have cured.

III. Inquire into the frames of your hearts, and see if they be duly qualified and disposed for attending the public ordinances.

QUEST. What sort of hearts ought we to bring with us?

Ans. 1. Bring humble hearts. Consider that you are pieces of mean and vile dust venturing into the presence of an infinitely glorious God, to hear the "voice of the Lord, that is full of majesty," and solemnly to converse with him, before whom the "angels veil their faces."

2. Bring soft hearts, that the word may make some impression on them; for an arrow shot against a stone sticks not, but falls to the ground. Labour to get the "fallow ground of your hearts ploughed up and broken," before you come to receive the "seed of the word," according to Hosea x. 12. If you would have the fallow ground ploughed up, you must seek the Lord by fervent and heart-breaking prayer.

3. Bring hunger and thirst with you to God's banqueting house; bring a deep sense of soul wants and necessities, and longing desires to meet with Christ in the ordinances: for he "fills the hungry with good things, when the rich are sent away empty." O for the hungry appetites of God's children, when we come to God's house! Say, "O that, like a new born child, I may this day desire the sincere milk of the word for my nourishment! and, O that, like a true child of my heavenly Father, I may love that milk best which comes warm from the breasts of public ordinances!"

IV. Search into these lusts and evils that hinder the success of ordinances; cast them out, and guard carefully against them. If you would have God this day to hear your prayers, and accept of your sacrifices, you must "regard no iniquity in your hearts," you must throw out all bosom lusts and idols. Christ saith to you this day, as once he did to Judas in another case, John xviii. 8, "If therefore you seek me, let these go their way:" let your pride, worldliness, prejudice, &c. go away; for they bar Christ out of the heart.

1. Throw out worldliness, and all thoughts about the world, that you may with your whole souls this day attend upon God: say to the cares of the world, as Abraham to his servants, Gen. xxii, "Stay ye here till I go yonder to worship God." Suffer not a vain thought this day to take up its lodging in your heart, according to Jer. iv. 14. It is said of Bernard, that, when he came to the church door, he would say, "Stay here, all my earthly thoughts." Nay, say this also before you come from home. Worldly hearts will hinder you from getting good of the ordinances; they will make the church like the marketplace to you, full of tumult and distraction; they will make such a noise and buzzing in your ears, that you cannot hear; or they will make you wander in time of hearing, as those, Ezek. xxxiii. 31. Nay, they will make you weary of all Sabbath work, as those, Amos viii. 5.

2. Lay aside self-conceit, or a good opinion of yourselves, your duties and performances; count all these but "dung and loss for the saving knowledge of Christ." For, if you lean upon your prayers and preparations this day, as any piece of righteousness before God, this will mar your access to God this day, and make the ordinances prove dry breasts to you.

3. Throw out all prejudices against ministers, and against the laws of Christ; and with meekness lay your ear and heart open to receive instruction, saying with Paul, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and with Samuel, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

4. Guard against doubtings concerning the truths of God, and mysteries of religion: let us captivate and subject reason to faith, and deal with it, as Joshua did with the Gibeonites; he made them "hewers of wood, and drawers of water, for the service of the temple:" so let us make reason subject to faith, and serviceable to religion; but nowise set it up as a standard for examining its mysteries by, since they are above its reach.

5. Beware of erroneous principles; for these will mar the good of ordinances to you; while there is an error in the foundation, you cannot be "built up in the most holy faith." Christ bids us "be wise as serpents;" and serpents, they say, whatever injury is offered to them, their great care is to preserve their head. Let it be our great care, then, not only to preserve our hearts and hands from sin, but our heads from error; especially when there are so many false teachers going abroad, seeking to "pervert the simple, by fair words and false speeches."

6. Beware likewise of schism and division, and guard against those who are instruments to divide and scatter Christ's sheep. Do not straggle from Christ's flock, but abide close by the place where the good Shepherd feeds his flock, "and makes them to rest at noon," and do not "turn aside after the flocks of the companions," Cant. i. 7.

I refer the handling of the duties of masters of families, as such, till afterwards: only, it ought to be their care early to call their families together to pray with them, and praise God; and to cause them rise as early this day as others. Let not your servants and children waste away this morning in sleep and idleness, but call them up as early to God's work this day, as you do to your own upon other days.

How blame-worthy are these families, and especially the masters thereof, who on week-days can rise betimes to follow their worldly business, but on the Lord's day do lie longer in bed than ordinary, giving themselves to carnal ease and rest? Is this to keep holy the Sabbath-day, thus to sleep and loiter away the first and chiefest part thereof? Is this the way to accomplish the work of the Sabbath, to promote the glory of God, and carry on the work of your salvation? All of you have great work to do this day; therefore rise early to it, as the Israelites did to the besieging of Jericho: they had been encompassing the city six days before; but we are told, Josh. vi. 15, that "on the seventh day, they rose early about the dawning of the day, and compassed the city seven times:" and so that day they became masters of the city. And, according to the best expositors, this seventh day, on which the walls of Jericho fell down, was the Sabbath. Now, O Christian, as the Israelites had the strong walls of Jericho, so hast thou the strong holds of sin to batter down this day; thou hast these Canaanites to conquer, which would keep thee out of the promised land: therefore imitate the Israelites, and rise early this morning to your work: the walls are thick, your enemies strong; if you would expect then to conquer on the Sabbath-day, and triumph against night, see that you begin the siege early.

And, if you would manage the work successfully, you must set about and carry it on conjunctly, as well as separately; by family-prayer, as well as secret-prayer: and see that all in the family attend family worship this morning. Likewise, as occasion offers, exhort your children and servants to prepare themselves for the public worship by the performance of secret duties, particularly reading and prayer. When you are at meat this morning, show by your holy speeches, that your minds are not forgetful of the work of the day. Check playing and idle talking, both in children and servants, and labour to engage them by your example, to show a more grave and serious air in their countenances this morning, than upon other occasions.

Let as many of them as can be conveniently spared, accompany you to the public ordinances; and suffer none of them to be absent therefrom, except in cases of necessity. Remember the fourth commandment, "Thou, thy son, thy daughter, thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and all within thy gates." Let not the dressing of meat for you, keep servants from the house of God this day; but see that you be able to say with Cornelius, (who feared the Lord with all his house) "We are all here present before God." Though children be young, yet bring them with you; for they are capable of getting good by the word sooner than we are aware. The scripture takes several times notice of little ones in the solemn assemblies, Deut. xxix. 11; Ezra x. 1; Acts xxi. 5. If we lay our children by the pool-side, who knows how early the Spirit of God may help them in, and heal them? Take your families alongst with you to the church; leave them not behind you, to come straggling to the church after worship is begun; nor allow them to drop away before it be ended. This is very indecent and disorderly; you would not allow them to do so with respect to your work. If you were going to the harvest field, you would not suffer them to come or go when they pleased. No, you would oblige them all to be ready timeously to come forth together, and fall to their work at once, and tarry till they loosed from work together: and should you not be as much concerned for God's work, as for your own; for the business of eternity, as for the affairs of time?

GOING TO THE CHURCH.

In the next place, let me give some advices relating to your behaviour in going to the church, proper especially for you whose houses lie somewhat remote from it.

Having dressed your souls, as well as may be, this morning, according to the foresaid directions, go forth, watching over your hearts and senses, having the lively impression of God's eyes upon you, and believing that he takes special notice of all your thoughts, words, and actions this day.

If you walk in company with others, take heed to your words, that they be savoury and suitable. O that people would guard against worldly discourse in their going to the church (which very much discomposes the heart for the public worship) and would talk of spiritual subjects, of the design and work of the day, and encourage one another to it! How pleasant would this be! This was the ancient practice of God's people, Zech. viii. 21, and we see how much David is taken with it, Psal. cxii. 1, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord:" q. d. it was the most pleasant sound I heard all the week through, to hear people encouraging one another to assemble to God's public worship, in God's house, upon God's day. This to him was the most pleasant journey ever he went; he was not backward to it, he did not weary of it: nay, it was "the joy and life of his soul:" he was glad of it. How few among us are in this frame! Alas! instead of it, there are many in our day glad of any trifling excuse to stay them at home, or take them away from the afternoon's sermon.

If you live at some distance from the church, and be joined by carnal company by the way, who savour nothing but the world; it is best for thee to retire from them to thine own meditations, lest thou be infected with their carnal and corrupt communications: for even a Peter, when he is conversing and warming his hands with the enemies of Christ, his heart turns ice-cold and frozen to Christ his Master, till a love-blink from the Sun of righteousness thawed it again.

If better meditations offer not to thee by the way, I shall furnish thee with some very suitable from natural things, which are objects of your senses.

If it be in a winter morning thou goest out, when the sun is but rising, think, if one sun make so bright a morning, what a shining morning will that be, when Christ, with all his bright angels and saints, shall break through the clouds, when there shall be as many suns as we see stars in a winter's night? O! shall I be one of those that "shall shine as the sun, in the kingdom of my Father?"

If it be in the spring time, and when a pleasant rain is falling upon the grass and grain, think, the Sabbath should be a grow-day for believers. This day God is as the "dew to Israel." O that my soul may "grow as the lily, and revive as the corn!" O that I may grow inward in sincerity, and outward in good works: downward in humility, and upward in heavenly-mindedness! Let the doctrine of God's word drop this day on my soul, as "the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass," that I may wax taller in grace, and stronger in faith and love. This day I should be "going from strength to strength," according to Psal. lxxxiv. 7. As the bee is busy in going from flower to flower, still gathering honey as she passeth; so should I this day go from duty to duty, from one ordinance to another, from praying to reading, from reading to hearing, from hearing to meditating, still gathering grace and strength as I go.

Dost thou look to the heavens? Think I have my Saviour and my all there; there is the place of my everlasting abode. Sense tells me what the outside of it is; yet that spangled roof over my head is but the pavement of that glorious palace, where I shall enjoy my eternal Sabbath, and my everlasting rest in Christ's bosom. O my soul, yonder is Goshen, the region of light; yon twinkling stars, shining moon, and flaming sun, are but as lanterns hanging out at my Father's house to light thee, while thou walkest in the dark streets of the earth. Little dost thou know the glory, mirth, and joy, that are within: O what are worldlings' joys to them! O let my affections and desires this day mount thither, that this may be one of the days of heaven to my soul!

Again, think, the Lord hath spread out the "heaven as a curtain," Psal. civ. 2, and, notwithstanding of its rapid motion, this curtain hath continued spread nearly these six thousand years, and not one hole is to be seen in it to this day. Is not heaven then a safe place for me to lay up my treasure in, where none can break through and steal it from me? O that my portion and treasure may be there; "that, where my treasure is, there my heart may be also!"

Dost thou see the clouds? Think on the day when Christ will rend and break through them; as he went up triumphing in a cloud to heaven, in like manner he shall come again. Are the heavens of such bright and pure matter? Think on the purity of the inhabitants thereof. There is no room, no, not a foot-breadth, for impure persons in the heavenly Jerusalem, where the gates are of pearl; no profane sinner, no unclean thing shall enter there.

When thou walkest on the ground, think, this whole earth is but my Father's footstool, that he hath given me to tread on: O how glorious then must his palace be! yet it is mine in Christ. Again, this earth "hangs upon nothing," Job xxvi. 27. O shall I be so foolish as to hang my hopes upon that which hangs on nothing? Again, wonder at God's power and faithfulness, that, notwithstanding it hangs as a ball in the air, and hath had many dreadful tempests upon it, and terrible earthquakes within it, yet God hath kept it from moving out of its place for nearly these six thousand years past.

Dost thou tread upon the grass? Think how God calls thee thereby to remember thy fading life and withering condition, every step thou makest, Isa. xl. 6, "All flesh is grass," and death is coming with his scythe to mow down this grass. And, though some grass escape the scythe in summer, when it is fresh and green, yet the winter frost will wither it away; so, though you escape the scythe of death in the summer of your youth, yet the winter of old age will come and wither you.

Dost thou pass over a little brook or rivulet in the way? Think, O if I could say this day with the Psalmist, Psal. xlii. 1, 2, "As the hart pants after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God; my soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come and appear before God?"

Dost thou go up an ascent? Think, the way to heaven is all up the hill, Psal. xxiv. Lord, strengthen me to climb it, without fainting or sliding back. O that my soul this day may be ascending to God, and God may be descending to me!

Dost thou behold the sea? Wonder at the ebbing and flowing of it, and at God's power and goodness, that sets restraining bounds to it. How easily might that power, that makes it to flow twenty feet, make it flow two hundred feet? and so it would overflow our sea-towns and adjacent coasts; but the Lord's goodness commands it back again by its ebb.

Dost thou see a ship in the sea? Think, Christ's church is compared to a ship; this world is the sea through which she sails; believers are the passengers; God is her pilot; the angels are her rowers; faith is the helm; hope is the anchor; for a mast, she hath, in midst of her, erected the saving tree of the cross; the graces are the sails hanging thereon; the Spirit is the wind that fills them; but Christ alone is the bottom that carries all safe and sure to the haven of eternal rest and felicity. O let my soul lean upon no other bottom. Again, think how mercifully Christ delivered his disciples, when tossed in a ship on the sea, in a dark night. My soul is a little ship, often ready to be overwhelmed with the waves of temptations: O then, when it is in this danger, let me awake Christ by my prayers. Again, as it is said of the mariner, with respect to his ship, that he sails always within four inches of death; so it may be said of the soul in relation to the body, that it lives still within four inches of eternity. If these earthen vessels break, then our souls are immediately set a-drift into the bankless and bottomless ocean of eternity. Lord, let not my soul launch out into that deep, while I am uncertain whether it sink or swim.

Doth it rain upon thee while the sun is shining? Think, if the sun of God's countenance shine on me, I may well be content to be wet with some rain of affliction: this easily doth counterbalance any trouble whatsoever.

Art thou drawing near to the church? Then put up some fervent ejaculations and prayers for God's blessing and presence. Say, as Abraham's servant did, when he came to the well of water near the city, Gen. xxiv. 12, "O Lord God, I pray thee send me good speed this day."—"Let me not miss my errand; let it be the day when salvation shall come to my heart and house; let it be the day of my new birth, the day when my hard heart will be broken; let it be a day to be had in everlasting remembrance. As I am drawing nigh to thy house, Lord, draw nigh to my soul, and let me have a meeting with thee this day. As thou art to knock at the doors of my soul by the hammer of thy word this day, Lord, come and make patent doors for thyself, and command thy loving-kindness to break in. Lord, open my eyes, that I may see the wonders of thy law; open my ears, that I may hear the charming voice of the Son of God; open my heart, that the King of glory may enter in; and open my lips, that my mouth may show forth thy praise."

Dost thou come within sight of the church? Let thy heart rejoice to see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, and pray that God may still "create a cloud of defence upon every dwelling-place in mount Zion, and upon all her assemblies;" and that "the mountain of the Lord's house may be exalted above all mountains." We ought to be much concerned for the church, and "prefer Jerusalem above our chief joy." Let us do, in a spiritual way, what Simon Maccabæus did in a natural, who, with three years' labour, took down the top of the mount Aera in Jerusalem, that no hill there might compete in height with the temple of God: so let us cause the greatest mountain of secular interest vail to the mountain of the house of the Lord.

Do you see a poor man begging by the way? Let it awaken your gratitude and thankfulness, that you are not in his case, and he in yours; and that you are not begging from him, instead of his begging from you. Harken, how importunate some beggars are; with what warm and feeling expressions do they plead! they uncover their sores, and show their maladies, and use all methods to move our compassions; when we think to put them off with excuses or refusals, yet they follow us, and by their importunity draw an alms from us. Then think with yourselves, O why do not I thus with God? why am I so careless in seeking an alms of mercy from him? is not my need greater than any beggar's? is not the alms I am seeking far better? is not the fullness and pity of the Giver infinitely more? and shall I be so formal and lifeless in prayer? It was a good counsel of one, that he bade people learn to pray of beggars.

As it is one of the duties of this day to make collections, and bestow alms for the relief of the poor; so you should take heed that you perform this duty in the right manner; that you do it not for a praise of men, but for the glory of God. Pray that your alms may be perfumed by the incense of Christ's merits, that they may be a "sweet-smelling sacrifice unto God." Would you have a bountiful alms from God this day? then give liberally to his poor. Remember Christ's eye is upon you, and noticeth from heaven what every one casts into his poor this day, as well as he noticed the poor widow's casting in her two mites into the treasury, when he was here upon earth. Though you have not much to yourself, yet you are bound to give somewhat; and, if it be given in sincerity, God will graciously accept of it, though it be but two mites. But sure this will never break you, nor waste your substance, but rather increase it, and obtain a blessing thereon. I pity those miserable persons who want not money to tipple and drink with, but yet have none to bestow upon God's poor.

DIRECTIONS CONCERNING THE PUBLIC WORSHIP.

I PROCEED to the second thing proposed, What is necessary to be done in time of public worship, and when we enter into the church.

I. "Keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God," Eccl. v., that is, look to your affections, which are the feet of the soul, by which men go to God, and walk or converse with him. Firmly believe, and constantly remember, that God's eye is very much on your behaviour while you are in his house. Therefore in the tabernacle, which was the place of public worship, it was commanded, Exod. xxv. 37, "Thou shalt make seven lamps, and they shall light the lamps, that they may give light;" to teach us, that nothing there could escape God's sight; for in his house there was always light. You cannot sin in secret there, for there are seven lamps to discover your miscarriages in the Lord's house. And, when the temple succeeded the tabernacle, God says of it,

1 Kings ix. 3, "Mine eye shall be there perpetually." God hath an eye, 1st. Of observation, Jer. xvi. 17, to notice with what sincerity and liveliness you offer your services and performances. 2d. An eye of good-will, Amos ix. 4, to approve and bless you, if you worship him sincerely and faithfully. 3d. An eye of indignation, Jer. xxi. 10, to bring wrath on you, if you approach God irreverently, worship him carelessly, and profane his day. Now, you may be assured of it, that God is as jealous of his courts under the gospel, as he was under the law, and doth take special notice of his people's behaviour there; for he tells us, "Where two or three are gathered in his name, he is in the midst of them," Matt. xviii. 20.

As you ought to have a lively sense of God's omniscience when you enter God's house, so you ought to have awful impressions of God's greatness, into whose presence you come, and a deep sense of your vileness and unworthiness to appear before him: and therefore be putting up ejaculations to God for acceptance in Christ Jesus. I do not mean that you should stand up (as some do) to private prayer in a public way, as the Pharisees did of old in the synagogues, to be seen of men, for which our Saviour reproves them, Matt. vi. 5, 6, telling us, that secret prayer should be performed in a secret manner. And far less should this be practised (as some do) when the congregation is employed in other worship: for this were a confounding of worship, and unacceptable to him who is the God of order, and is plainly reproved by the apostle, 1 Cor. xiv. Alas! it is to be suspected of many that do so, that these are all the prayers they use on Sabbath morning, for preparing themselves or their families for the public worship. But, if you come in before worship be begun, it is very proper you have your private ejaculations, and be lifting up your thoughts to heaven in a private manner; and, when you are set down in your seats, see if you be able to give a satisfying answer to that question the Lord put to the prophet, 1 Kings xix. 13, "What dost thou here, Elijah?" Can you say, "Lord, I have come, at thy command, to the place where thine honour dwelleth, to the place where thou usest to appoint with thy people, that I might meet with thee, and get a glimpse of thy countenance?" Alas! it is much to be regretted, that many come to church, they cannot tell for what end, like those Ephesians, mentioned Acts xix. 32, "The more part knew not wherefore they were come together." They come for nothing, and they ordinarily go away with nothing.

But as for you, whose errand is to meet with God, and get quickening to your souls, look to the frame of your hearts, set yourselves to hear God's word, and join in his worship with great reverence and fear; consider, not only ministers (God's ambassadors) are present, but the glorious angels are present, nay, the God of angels himself is present; therefore say, as Jacob did of Bethel, Gen. xxviii. 16, 17, "Surely the Lord is in this place. How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and the gate of heaven." In every part of God's worship, this day, whether singing, praying, bearing, partaking, study to behave as one that believes he is placed in the presence of the all-seeing God, as one that is working for his immortal soul, as one that, within a few days, shall enter the gates of death, and render an account at the bar of the great Judge of the world.

II. Study to be at the beginning of worship, that you may be able to say with Cornelius, Acts x. 33, "Now we are all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God." Think not that you are in time if you win to the lecture or sermon, though you miss the prayers that went before; for, if you sinfully miss these, you have no ground to expect good by the whole day's preaching, since it is by the means of the public prayers that the word is sanctified to you, and you are prepared for it; and what good can the word do you, if God bless it not to you? and how can you look for the blessing, if you come not to seek it? It is not the way to profit by one ordinance, to neglect another. To be late of coming is offensive to God, stumbling to serious Christians, and injurious to your own souls. Alas! upon what small and frivolous excuses do many stay back from the public worship, or linger in coming to it? A little business, a little rain, snow, or cold, will detain them from the means of salvation. You that cannot hear the word, or come in time to God's worship for a little cold now, consider what an alteration there will be in hell; there it will be hot enough, and you shall not have the liberty of hearing. Did the cold hinder you? There the heat shall punish you for it. Doth a little rain or snow keep you at home, when Christ is calling you to receive him? How then will you endure that horrible tempest, which he will rain on gospel-slighters, even a flood of kindled brimstone that will never cease nor quench.

III. When you first see the minister this day in the pulpit, think, "O how welcome should I make him that bringeth glad tidings, even the news of reconciliation to a perishing world? Lord, how great is thy clemency to us this day, in sending thy ambassadors with an olive-branch of peace, and not a trumpet of war in their mouths?" Consider our reiterated rebellions and provocations, it might have been expected we should have had a fearful message sent us, like that of the flying angel, Rev. viii. ult., "Woe, woe, woe to the inhabitants of the earth," &c. But, instead of this, we have the sweet message in Isa. lv. 1, renewed, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come to the waters, and he that hath no money, come, buy," &c.; and that in ver. 7, "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him," &c. That is a joyful sound. "How then shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?"

IV. Study to be devout and reverent in the public worship, both as to the frame of your mind, and gesture of your body. It was a good advice of one, for this end, "Fix your eye on the minister, your ear on the word, and your heart on God." Awe your hearts into a holy reverence, by viewing the holiness and power of that God whom ye worship, and revolving his titles of majesty; so did the Psalmist, Psal. lxxxix. 6—8, "Who in heaven can be compared to the Lord? &c. God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of his saints, &c. O Lord God of hosts, who is a strong Lord like unto thee! &c. Make a covenant with your eyes," that they gaze not about in spying your neighbour's clothes and gestures. A gadding eye is the ready way to make a wandering heart. The devil hath many objects to tempt and divert us; first men let loose their eyes, and then away goes the heart. Make a covenant with your eyes this day, that they neither shut with sleep, nor wander after vanity. Though bodily service without the heart profiteth little, yet the worship of our bodies is not to be wholly slighted; God hath a right to the adoration of our bodies as well as our souls, for Christ suffered for both, 1 Cor. vi. 20. And we find Christ and the saints in the scripture using reverent gestures in prayer. I dare not precisely restrict people to any one particular gesture in public prayer, neither desire I to lay more stress upon gestures than they will bear, since I know communion with God may be obtained in any gesture; yet I must own, that it is the unhappy effect of our contention about gestures, that some serious persons, who have a devout respect to God and holy things, do yet seem more irreverent in their outward carriage, than some who are strangers to the power of godliness, and immoral in their conversations. I know these place all their religion in outward gestures and forms, and go no further; yet this warrants none to run to the other extreme, to despise a decent or devout gesture. If weakness of nature require a person to sit in time of public prayer, I do not quarrel it, but, when no just cause can be pleaded for it, I cannot say that it is a suitable praying posture at public worship. A lazy sluggish posture in prayer tends to bring on sleep and drowsiness, and makes us forget what we are about; whereas, when we stand up, and universally change our posture when public prayer begins, it helps to awaken people to think upon the solemn addresses they are making to the great God. Only let us take care, that there be no vanity, self-conceit, or affectation, in the postures of our bodies at worship.

V. Come to hear the word with a sincere purpose to obey it, and comply with the whole will of God without reserve, be it pleasant or harsh to nature; be ready to perform every known duty, and part with every known sin, be it as dear as your right hand or right eye. It is not enough to say, We are all present to hear the sermon; but you must say, with Cornelius and his company, Acts x., "We are present to hear all things commanded us of God." And in a special manner you must be ready to hear and obey his "great command, of believing on the name of his Son," which is the great end of preaching and hearing. Wherefore, when Christ knocks by his word at the door of your heart, be ready to open, and welcome him in with joy; say to him, as Laban to Abraham's servant, Gen. xxiv. 31, "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; wherefore standest thou without?" Though, alas! I cannot say what follows, "I have prepared the house, yet, Lord, come in and prepare it for thyself:" and though "I be unworthy that thou shouldst come under my roof," yet a word from thee can cleanse and repair the house, yea, and "prepare an upper room" for thyself; "Lord, speak the word; and it shall be done."

VI. Give close attention to the word. God looses you this day from the world, that you may "attend on the Lord without distraction," 1 Cor. vii. 35. Attend this day to what your Lord saith to you, as men who believe that every Sabbath and every sermon, that every prayer and exhortation, every call and offer of grace, bring you a step nearer heaven or nearer hell; nearer to the mansions with Christ, or to a dwelling with devils; and that endless eternity depends upon your attention to God's word. How attentively would a condemned rebel hearken to his prince, every word being either life or death to him! Consider, it is matter of life and death to you, yea, your life through all the ages of never-ending eternity; your life depends on right hearing, Deut. xxxii. 47. And will you not take heed? You would have God attentive to your words in the time of your distress, and will you not be attentive to his words in the time of your health? Could a minister tell you how you might acquire a good estate, or where you might find a rich treasure, you would hearken to that; but, for an inheritance or treasure in heaven, many think it not worth their while to notice. Is not this an argument of strong carnality and atheism? O if we could imitate Christ's hearers, Luke xix. 48, it is said, "They were all very attentive to hear him;" the word attentive according to the original, may be rendered, They hanged on him, or They hanged their ears at Christ's lips! Let us, in like manner, hang upon Christ in hearing of the word, even as the child doth upon the breast, or as the bee upon a flower.

There is nothing that Satan aims at more, than to divert your attention in time of hearing the word. This enemy of your souls is busy every day laying snares for you, seeking your ruin: but, O how active is he every Lord's day! The devil is still first at church; the children of God never gather together, but Satan is among them: and his great design is, to render this engine of the word fruitless, because by it the strongholds of his kingdom have been battered and broken down. Now, the way he finds most successful is, by tempting our eyes and thoughts to wander, in order to keep us from being attentive in time of hearing. O then, if we would have the word to profit us, let us watch against Satan's temptations and suggestions; let us guard against wandering, wearying, drowsiness, or any thing that may hinder our attention. And for those that can write quickly, to write down the heads of the sermon in time of hearing, is by some reckoned a good mean to engage the attention, prevent drowsiness, and help the memory afterwards; and some have found it very refreshing and edifying a long time after, to be looking over what they had written. But, especially, it is proper for young people to learn and use this way of writing.

VII. In a special manner, take heed to the word that suits your case, and most concerns your soul; particularly to that word that discovers the sinfulness and vileness of a poor soul by nature; and to that word that points out the misery of the unbeliever, and that shows the weight of those curses, the terror of that wrath, and severity of divine justice, to which he is hourly exposed; and to that word that sets out sin in its black and bloody colours; to that word that shows your inability to help yourself out of your miserable state; to that word that discovers your need of Christ, and his excellency, fitness, and suitability for you; and to that word that comes close home to your conscience, and tells you, as Nathan did David, "Thou art the man," thou art the poor lost sinner that is condemned, and for ever undone, without Christ. Take heed to that word that points out your particular sins, your predominate lusts and idols; take with the charge, and cry out, Unclean, unclean. While hearing the word, you ought to place your sins, and especially your darling lusts, in the front of the battle (as Uriah) purposely to be slain, and say, "Lord, let these smooth stones taken out of the brook of the sanctuary be thrown by so skilful and powerful a hand, that they may sink deep into the foreheads of these uncircumcised ones, to their utter ruin and destruction." And O it were happy, if, while the word doth touch our sins, our hearts were melted like Peter's, and moved to go home and weep bitterly. O what reason have we to weep, when we hear of the boundless mercy which we have despised, the matchless misery which we have deserved, the infinite love which we have abused, and the righteous law which we have transgressed!

VIII. Mix you hearing with faith, that is, believe, 1st. That it is God who speaks; the word is his, and not man's. 2d. That he speaks to you in particular, as if he mentioned you by name and surname. Put not reproofs and threatenings by yourselves, and say, They belong to your neighbour, and not to you; for this is a dangerous stratagem of the devil against your souls. But let every man open his ear, and hear what the Spirit saith to him, and apply the word particularly to himself; for the best plaster that ever was made up, can do no good unless it be applied. 3d. Believe that what the Lord speaks to you by his word, is true and certain; that his doctrine is holy, and his laws just: that his threatenings will be strictly executed, and his promises faithfully accomplished. It is for want of faith that the word doth not profit. If but as much credit were given to the divine testimony and word of God, as we give to human testimony and the writings of men, the word would have more success and efficacy than, alas! it hath on the most part.

IX. Lay up what you hear in your hearts and memories, and be at all pains to retain it; for the devil, like the fowls of the air, is at hand to snatch away the seed of the word as soon as it lights, if we be not careful to hide it in our hearts. Therefore it is a good help in time of hearing, to be often recalling and repeating the heads of what has been spoken in our minds; for when we hear a head but once, and think no more upon it till the sermon be done, we are fair to lose it.

X. Join cordially with the congregation in singing the praises of God. This is a heavenly duty, pleasant to God, and profitable to yourselves: therefore be conscientious in the performing of it: "Sing with understanding," and meditate upon what you sing; "sing with grace in your hearts," Col. iii. 16. It is grace that sweetens the voice in God's ear, an old heart cannot sing a new song; nay, grace must be in a lively exercise when you sing, according to Psal. lvii. 8, you should cry to your hearts and to your graces, and particularly to faith, love, and delight, as in Judg. v. 12, "Awake, awake, Deborah, awake, awake, utter a song," &c.

There should be a great warmth of love and affection to God when we sing to him, according to Isa. v. 1. Look well then to your hearts in singing, mind the matter more than the music, the cleanness of the heart more than the clearness of the voice.

I cannot pass some here without a reproof, such as those, 1st. Who sit dumb in the congregation, while their neighbours are praising God, as if the devil had tied their tongues to the roof of their mouths. Think not this work below the greatest of you, for it is your honour. Excuse not yourselves by saying you cannot sing musically; for, if you had any delight in the duty, you would sing as you can. 2d. Those who in singing notice the tune more than the matter, and mind the voice more than the "making melody in their hearts to the Lord." 3d. Those that absent themselves from the singing of the psalms, who either come not at the beginning of worship till the psalms be over, or rise and go out at the close before the psalms be sung. Would you know whose disciples they are who do so? they are not Christ's, but Judas's; for when Christ sang the hymn on the back of the communion, Matt. xxvi. 30, all the disciples were present but Judas, who slipped out before the psalms; and, since he turned his back upon so sweet a duty, it could not be a good errand he was going about; it was first to betray his master, and then to hang himself. O then, take warning, and follow Judas's example no more.

XI. Let none go forth before pronouncing of the blessing. God allows none, great or small, to go out before his worship be ended; both prince and people must meet and part at the same time, Ezek. xlvi. 10. Those that wilfully depart without hearing the blessing pronounced, and make a custom of it, if they repent not, it is to be feared they must one day stay to hear that sentence, "Depart from me, ye cursed." You run away from the blessing, but you cannot run from this curse. Wherefore let us stay the blessing, and reverently stand up (as the congregation of Israel did, 1 Kings viii. 14,) to receive our share in it, hoping and praying that it may come down upon us, as it surely will, if we believingly look up to him that "commands the blessing upon mount Zion, even life for evermore."

CONCERNING OUR BEHAVIOUR BETWIXT SERMONS.

HAVING finished the work of the forenoon, you must take care how you dispose of yourselves betwixt sermons.

1. If the intermission be somewhat long, and your houses near at hand, then retire to them, meditating upon what you have heard, and fixing the convictions and directions into your minds; beware of worldly thoughts or words by the way.

2. As soon as you come home, go to secret prayer, and beg God's help to improve what you have heard, that it may kill sin, and quicken grace in you; and that God may strengthen your weak memories to retain it, and pardon your failings in his service.

3. Eat sparingly betwixt sermons, lest it dull your spirits, and indispose you for the afternoon's work; and see that your discourse in time thereof be suitable to the day.

4. If time allow, neglect not to call your families together for the worship of God.

5. If you have any time to be alone, spend it frugally in reading, praying, or meditating; let not a moment of it be lost: either think on what you have been hearing, or draw spiritual instructions from what you see. Do you sit by the fire, and see the sparks fly up? Think, "Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward," Job v. 7. "Sin hath filled my short life with troubles; but blessed be God, that I am this day invited to come to Jesus Christ, who is a remedy both for sin and sorrow."

Dost thou see a spider in the window weaving cunning webs to catch the silly fly? Think, "Satan, that cunning enemy, is doing the like for my poor soul." Seest thou how the spider hides itself in its hole till once the fly be entangled, and then runs to seize it, and drag it into its hole? So the devil lies in wait till once sinners be caught into his snares, and then he lays on them, and drags them away to hell with him. Again, think how painfully and curiously the spiders weave their cobwebs to catch flies, never considering that, before their prey be caught, both they and their webs may be swept down by the besom, and trode in the dust. What is this but a lively emblem of the curious projects which some frame for gaining the world? What are they else but a taking great pains to catch a fly? And oft, before it be caught, death comes with its besom, and sweeps them and their fine projects down in the grave altogether: "For in that day all their thoughts perish," Psal. cxlvi. 4. But O how wise are those souls, who are laying out all their thoughts, and using all means this day to win Christ! This is a project that will survive death; here is gain that death cannot rob them of. Thus we see how every thing might learn us a spiritual lesson, if we were spiritually-minded.

6. If you be far from home, and have not a house to which you can conveniently go betwixt sermons, then improve your time as well as you can, either in the church or church-yard, by reading, meditating, private ejaculations, or spiritual conferences. It is very sad to hear people in the church-yard this day talking about their markets, grain, cattle, and other worldly subjects: alas! the devil is as busy sowing his tares in the church-yard as Christ's ministers are in sowing the good seed in the church, and hath far more increase than they. Is it not strange that people should go forth from hearing a warm sermon, yea, a sermon exactly adapted to their souls' ease, and yet have never a word of it among them, more than they had been deaf or sleeping all the time; but no sooner is the word out of the minister's mouth, but presently the world is in theirs!

QUEST. May not we ask or hear news this day?

ANS. Asking, hearing, or telling news this day is sinful, if it be done to satisfy curiosity, to divert or put off the time; this would be a "finding our own pleasure," which is forbidden on the Lord's day. But if it be done that we may know how it fares with the church at home or abroad, and that we may get our hearts suitably affected with the ease of Zion, as it was with Nehemiah, Neh. i. 2, "I asked them concerning the Jews, and concerning Jerusalem;" I say, in that case it is lawful; for thus we show our concern for the kingdom of Christ in the world, and hereby we may be furnished with matter both of prayer and praise. Outward events and occurrences, if rightly improved, will be so far from unframing the spirit for the duties of the Sabbath, that we may reap much spiritual advantage from them. Let us therefore take care to make a spiritual improvement of the news we hear this day; for God's power, mercy, and justice, may be seen and admired in the occurrences of providence, as well as in the works of creation. Dost thou hear any news that makes thee glad? Let it excite thee to bless God for the sweet gospel news of "Christ's coming to save lost sinners," which thou hast been hearing this day. Let it put thee in mind what glad tidings it will be to a believer to hear the sound of the last trumpet, and the absolving sentence of Christ his judge. Dost thou hear of the raging contentions, divisions, and confusions, that are in the world? Let it remind thee of the blest agreement and harmony that is among the saints and angels above. Dost thou hear of bloody wars and rumours of wars? Remember the day is at hand, O believer, when thou shalt be housed with Christ the "Prince of peace," where there is nothing but perfect peace, union, and tranquility.

But, in case you sit or walk alone betwixt sermons, in the church or church-yard, you may either think upon what you have been hearing, or meditate upon your latter end, which the graves you see and tread on, loudly calls you to. Think how "one generation comes, and another goes."—Our fathers had their day upon the stage, and they are gone off to make room for us; now we have our day upon the stage, but in a little we must go off also, and give place to the succeeding generation. As we draw on some upon the stage, these do thrust us off it again, and we must shortly be laid with our fathers. Again, think what a mortifying sight is before our eyes; there lies the rubbish of a thousand generations. What is the whole world, almost, but a heap of graves and dead men's bones? Much of the ground we now tread on, as well as these graves, was once living; so that we plough up and dig through our forefathers, and must shortly turn earth ourselves to bury our posterity. What cause have we then to be humble? We are made of the same metal with the ground we walk on: God's hands have kneaded our bodies of the same clay with others, and his fingers will crumble us again into the same dust. Let us abhor pride, for this piece of ground will lay us all low enough in a short time: as six feet of air doth contain us while we live, so six feet of earth here will suffice us when we are dead; and why should we boast of any earthly enjoyments? What is it we value ourselves upon? Is it our high extract! Ah! the worms have as noble an extract as we; nay, they are of an older family and rise, for "every creeping thing" was made before man, Gen. i. Do you value yourselves for your riches? remember both the poor and you shall lie down in the dust together, and the worms shall cover you alike, Job xxi. 26. Nay, the body of a beggar makes as good dust as the body of a king; the grave dust of the one smells as sweet as the other, there it makes no obeisance to it, nor keeps any distance from it.

THE AFTERNOON'S WORSHIP.

WHEN the time for the afternoon's worship is come, see that ye return again to it in due time; think not the half of the day enough for the service of God; remember the whole day is his: your souls' necessities also require your attending on all diets of worship; therefore miss no opportunity, for you know not when you may meet with Christ. Thomas, by being absent from one meeting of the disciples, lost a joyful sight of Christ which the rest got, and for some time afterwards laboured under sad doubting and unbelief: so you that withdraw from any of the meetings of God's people in the sanctuary, have reason to fear plagues upon your souls. You that go away unnecessarily from the afternoon's worship, (as many in the country do,) consider what a shrewd sign it is, that ye have got little good the forenoon, and that ye are very indifferent what become of your precious souls. Know you not that the loss of one opportunity may be the loss of your souls? It may be, in your absence, the Spirit, who blows when he listeth, did vouchsafe a gale, which might have melted your frozen heart; it may be, then the word was spoke, that, through God's blessing, might have begun a good work on your soul: and when you provoke him, by neglecting such an opportunity, what do you know if ever he vouchsafe such another gale to you all your life again?

As for your carriage during the afternoon's worship, I refer you to the foregoing directions; for they suit the afternoon, as well as the forenoon.

Only there are some few things more I would remind you of:

I. If there be sick persons who desire the aid of your prayers; as you ought to sympathise with them, so you ought also to remember God's goodness to you, that preserves you in health, when others are tossed on sick beds: that allows you to sing his praises, while others are groaning with pains; that gives you liberty to attend his ordinances, when others, better than you, are detained therefrom.

II. If baptism be administered after sermon, then take these directions concerning your carriage on that occasion.

1. Beware of removing before it is over, as many do, for this argues both a contempt of Christ's ordinance, which he hath solemnly instituted for his church's good, and want of charity to the persons to be baptized, in that you will not stay to pray for them, or receive them into the communion of the visible church: as also, it shows that you have little regard to your own souls, in that you turn your back upon such an excellent mean of edification as this is. You that are guilty this way, beware of it for the future. Consider what an irreverent and unbecoming thing it would be, if all would do as you do: and, do you not tempt others, by your example, to go off with you?

2. Stay still and pray for the members to be ingrafted, as others did for you: pray that God may give the inward grace with the outward seal, and apply Christ's blood to the soul, as water is applied to the body.

3. Remember your own baptism, and solemn engagements to Christ in infancy. Remember whose name you bear, whose livery you wear, and whose colours ye are sworn to: and be humbled for your manifold pollutions, your falling short of the grace of baptism, and walking contrary to your solemn vows. Examine what fruits you reap from your baptism, and if you have got your interest in pardon of sin, sanctifying grace, and other blessings, sealed to you in that sacrament, cleared up and secured: and try if ye feel the efficacy of Christ's blood, represented and applied in that ordinance, melting your hearts, cleansing you from sin, and quickening you to holiness. I shall say no more in this place concerning our improving of our baptism, nor of the duties of parents who present their children to it, nor of those who are witnesses; seeing I have handled these points pretty fully in my Sacramental Catechism, to which the reader is referred.

III. If you be called after the dismissing of the congregation, and before you return home, to attend the funerals of any of your deceased neighbours, let your words and carriage be grave, and suitable to the occasion; abhor that levity and frothiness which many show at such occasions. When you draw nigh, and see the open grave, think, God is causing the grave to open its mouth, to warn me of my latter end, and to tell me, "that I must lie there ere long." When you see the bones scattered about the grave's mouth, in fearful confusion, think, my skull and bones will be thus lying and trampled on in a short time, and will not be distinguished from the bones of others; and what folly is it for men to be lifting up themselves, and despising others now? When you hear the doleful murmur that is made by the skulls and clods of earth striking upon the coffin, think with thyself, that it sounds forth these words, "Remember thou must die, consider thy latter end." When you see the grave filled up, and covered with earth, and people departing from it, think, thus will I be carried out, and left alone by all my friends; and there will be none to bear me company in this dark cell, but the worms who will feast themselves on me, without any to hinder them. O to be always humble and mindful of death!

Lastly, Let not the impressions of your neighbours' funerals wear soon off. Some are under a little concern at the time; but no sooner is the dead interred, and the grave filled up again, but all their serious thoughts vanish, and they return to their sins and pleasures as before. But see that your concern be lasting; go away thinking, I may be the next for whom the grave may be opened: therefore "I will wait all the days of my appointed time, till my change come."

IV. If there be any public worship, lecture, or catechising, or repetition of the sermons this evening; let all, who can, attend the same: for as much of the Lord's day as can be, should be spent in the public exercises and meetings of God's people. I acknowledge, family duties and secret duties are likewise to be performed, and time must be allowed for them; and it is well when matters are so ordered, that public and private duties do not interfere on the Lord's day. But, whenever they seem to do it, let it be observed as a rule in this case, "the private ought to give place to the public;" for it is one chief end of setting apart this day, solemnly to acknowledge God, and celebrate his worship in the assemblies and meetings of Christians.

BEHAVIOUR AFTER PUBLIC WORSHIP.

I COME to the third thing, to show what is necessary to be done after the public worship is over.

I. If you be going home in company with others, then confer together upon the sermons you have heard by the way: for, Deut. xi. 18, 19, you are commanded not only to lay up "God's words in your heart," but to speak of them when "you walk by the way." We see Christ's hearers talked of the word by the way, Luke xxiv. 32, "Did not our hearts burn within us while he opened to us the scriptures?" I know this is the practice of the Christians in some places, though I fear there is little of this sort of conference among us. Instead of it, I fear it is the talk of many, when going home, of this and the other person they saw in the church, or spake with about worldly affairs.

II. If you have not occasion for converse, then meditate upon what you have heard through the day, Psal. lxii. 10, "God hath spoken once, yea, twice have I heard it," saith the Psalmist. That which God speaks, you should go over it again in your thoughts, and meditate upon it. Let it continue like the ringing of bells sounding in your ears after the bells are ceased. It was a good answer that one, coming from church, gave to another that asked him, If the sermon was done? "Nay," says he, "the congregation is dismissed, but I hope the sermon is not done."

III. You may also be furnished with other occasional meditations very suitable to the day, from the things you may see by the way. Dost thou see the clouds turning black, and threatening rain, which cause thee to mend thy pace and hasten home? Think, surely afflictions are mercies to God's people; they, like a black cloud, cause them to mend their pace, and long to be home at their Father's house. If our sun should always shine with unclouded beams, we should not make such haste. Should we find too much friendship in our inn, and kindness in our pilgrimage, we would be fair to forget our Father's house, and our heritage above.

Dost thou see the sun declining, and hastening down to night? Think, the sun's motion is very swift, though insensible in the mean time. He runs many thousand miles in an hour, and flies with incredible swiftness about the earth, carrying our time about with him; so we (though the most part be insensible of it) are flying as fast to the grave. O then, should not our souls be posting as hard from sin and wrath to Christ our city of refuge? Dost thou see the sun setting, and the darkness coming on? It hath a voice to thee, the day of thy life posteth to an end, the dark night of death comes, when thou must set it in the grave. O! see thou have not thy work to begin, when thy sun is setting, and thy day ended; for, when the night comes, no man can work: there is no repentance in the grave.

Is the sky clear at the sun-setting, so that it prognosticates a fair morning next day? Think upon the death of an upright man, the latter end of that man is peace. O believer, the evening of thy day shall be serene, and thy sun shall set without clouds. The morning of thy resurrection shall be bright, and thy eternity for ever glorious. No wonder then, though Balaam wished to "die the death of the righteous, and to have his last end like his."

Is it in the winter-time that you are going home, when the sky may be full of stars? Consider how glorious the mansions of the saints must be, since that bespangled roof is but the floor or pavement of their palace; yet that is my home, where I hope to lodge when night comes, and from which I shall never flit. O how many millions of blessed souls dwell therein! How lightsome is their life! And how pleasant is their employment! Shall I ever be satisfied till I be there!

Is it in the summer or harvest-time, when you are obliged to go into the field to attend and gather your cattle? Beware of carrying an earthly mind along with you, but labour to learn some heavenly lessons from every thing you see.

Do your cattle stray from you? Think, How ready am I to wander from Christ my Shepherd! "Lord I have gone astray like a lost sheep." O! "seek me and find me" again; suffer me not to wander as far as hell, as I will certainly do, if thou let me alone; for of myself I will never find the way back to thee.

Do you see the sun retiring from us, and the summer going away? Mind how the summer days of grace will at length go away, and the winter of sickness and old age will come on. Let me be busy now, and imitate the bee, who gathers her meat in the summer, and provides for the winter before it come. Oh let me not sin nor sleep away my days of grace, lest I have it to regret, as Jer. viii. 20, "My harvest is past, my summer is ended, yet I am not saved."

Is it in harvest, when you see the grain cut down through the fields? Think how death with his sickle will cut you down in like manner, Rom. xiv. 15.

See you a tree growing? Think how the axe of death and spiritual judgments is laid to the root of the barren tree, or fruitless professor. Again, think how night and day are like two axes hewing at the root of the tree of man's life, without rest, when the one is up, the other is down. Every day a spell flies off, and every night a chip goes; and so, ere long, our bones will lie "scattered about the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth wood," Psal. cxli. 7. I see my neighbours as cut trees daily falling about me: I find myself beginning to totter and shake with the frequent blows I am getting: O that in the mean time I may be inclining Christ-wards and heaven-wards! for, "as the tree falls, so will it lie." See you a worm crawling on the ground? Think upon the worm of conscience that never dies, but gnaws the wicked to all eternity. It is my highest wisdom to make conscience my friend, for it is a "friend that sticks closer than a brother;" it will faithfully attend us on a death-bed, and at a tribunal, and administer cordials to us then. But, if conscience be thine enemy, next to God himself, thou wilt find it the most terrible enemy that ever a poor soul had; thou canst neither resist it, nor flee from it. It is a messenger thou canst not deforce, a witness thou canst not east, a judge thou canst not decline, and an executioner thou canst not withstand. Poor Christless sinner! it will serve instead of all these against thee. O labour to get it sprinkled in time with Christ's blood, and this will pacify it.

Again, think, What is man but a worm? He is twice so called in one verse, Job xxv. 26. What a poor weak helpless creature is a worm! it is easily crushed by the foot, and can make no resistance. So weak and helpless is man, with respect to God; he is more easily crushed by the feet of his justice, than a worm is by ours. What madness then is it for a worm to rebel against the Creator of the world? what are the kings and princes of the earth but as so many worms crawling upon his footstool? Each of us must ere long take up our dwelling with the worms, and say to them, "Ye are my brethren and sisters."

Again, behold, as worms, when they creep into the earth, leave their slime behind them about the hole's mouth; so believers, when they creep into the grave, leave all their sin and corruption at the grave's mouth, and their souls ascend to God "without spot or wrinkle."

BEHAVIOUR AT HOME ON THE SABBATH EVENING.

As soon as possibly you can win home after sermons, set about your secret work, and family duties. Consider, that though the sermons be over, the Sabbath is not over: therefore study to spend the rest of the day in God's service, and keep still the impressions of what you have been hearing upon your spirits. And if you would do this, take these directions:

I. Retire presently for secret prayer and self-examination. Pray over what you have been hearing, and beg that "the Lord may keep it in the imagination of the thoughts of your hearts." This is a good way both to help your memories, and procure a blessing on what you have heard. Consider whether you had any thing of God's Spirit and presence through the day. If God withdrew, then lament after him, and search into the cause. If he "showed himself through the lattice," then bless him for it, and go on to "walk in the light of his countenance." Hath any good motion been raised in your hearts by the word? Pray for the preservation of it. Hath the word been refreshing and edifying to you? Lay it up in your hearts, and commit that to God to keep for you, which your frail memories cannot retain, pleading that God may make it forthcoming to you against the time of your need. Hath the word discovered any particular sin or lust to you? Then bewail and mourn for it, and beg mortifying grace to subdue and conquer it. Have you been negligent in hearing? Lament it, put on new resolutions, and cry to God for strength; and forget not to employ your great Advocate, Jesus Christ, to apologize for your weakness and shortcomings, and to separate all the defects from your performances, and offer them up in his censer, perfumed with the incense of his merits. Was thy conscience stupid, thy heart hard, and thy mind carnal, while hearing a soul-rousing sermon? Be ashamed of it before God, and chide with thy heart, and say to it, "Art thou worse than Felix a heathen? For his heart trembled, when he heard of judgment to come," Aets xxiv. Art thou worse than devils? For "they believe and tremble," Jam. ii. Oh! shall heathens and devils be sooner moved than my hard heart? Hast thou reaped no benefit through the day? Let it be matter of exercise and lamentation to thee before the Lord. Let never bare ordinances satisfy thee, without communion with God therein. As Zaccheus climbed up into the sycamore tree to see Jesus, and when once he had got a sight of him there, "he came down joyfully;" so oughtest thou to go up to the sycamore tree of ordinances for this purpose, to see God in Christ; and, unless this sight be granted thee, "come down sorrowfully." When men go to meet their beloved friend at a certain place, and they miss him, how discontentedly do they go away? Alas! what are ordinances without God, but as a table without meat, a well without water, from which a needy soul must needs depart hungry and thirsty?

It concerns thee to call thyself to account for thy frame and carriage in hearing, reading, prayer, praise, giving alms, and every duty you have been employed in through the day. As God himself reviewed every day's work of his, and "saw it was good," Gen. i.; so should we review every day, and, in a special manner, every Sabbath-day's work, and see if it be good or no. Let us "judge ourselves, that we may not be judged."

II. Read over those portions of scripture which you have heard opened, with the scriptures cited by the minister; think on them, and beg the illumination of God's Spirit to make you understand them. We see the eunuch was reading the scripture upon his return from the public worship, and God blessed it and sent him an interpreter; and if you do so, you may expect the same. He that sent Philip to him, will send his own Spirit to help you; who, when he comes, brings such a divine light along with him, as will make you see the truths of the gospel with another eye, and discover more in the word than ever you beheld in it before: so that, though you have read the same chapters and verses about Christ many times over, yet then you shall be made to say, O where were my eyes till now, that I never saw what was contained here?

III. Labour by all means to keep up the remembrance and impressions of the word thou hast been hearing on thy mind. Let it not be as a wayfaring man to tarry with thee only for a night; but let it be an inhabitant to dwell with thee all the week over. Hath the Spirit made any warm impressions by the word upon thy soul this day? O watch over them, and strive to preserve and entertain them through the evening, and look to God for help. "O Lord, let me not lose the heat of this day in the cool of the evening. Thy word hath wrought wonderful changes upon others, O that I may likewise experience the same, and have it to say, I went forth proud, but am come home humble: I went out careless and hard-hearted, but am come back thoughtful and contrite in spirit: I went to church a bond-slave of Satan, but am returned a free man of Christ!"

Poor soul, much depends upon your care and watchfulness over yourself in the evening of the Lord's day, that you "lose not these things wrought in you by the word" through the day. There are many like those soldiers who are victorious in the day, but lose all at night through their security and sloth: they do not watch and stand to their arms, but suffer the enemy to surprise them, to beat up their quarters, and spoil their tents, when they are secure, dreaming of no hazard. Many are like Hannibal, that knew better how to obtain a victory, than how to improve it when got. Watch then against the devil, the world, and your own hearts, and beware of losing at night what you gain through the day.

I shall here give some advices, in order to the cherishing and improving of those good motions, convictions, or resolutions that may be begot in you by hearing of the word on the Lord's day. These are sparks kindled by the breath of God; therefore do not smother them, but strive to blow them up into a flame by prayer and meditation.

1. Beg earnestly that God, who hath "begun a good work" in thee, may carry it on; that these convictions may terminate in thy conversion here, and thy salvation hereafter. Cry, Lord, suffer not these tender fruits to be nipped in the bud, or blasted in the blossom, by Satan's frosty winds or the world's cold blasts; but mercifully cherish and preserve them to maturity, "to the praise of the glory of his grace."

2. Consider what a crying sin it is against God, to neglect or stifle thy convictions. He will treat thee as a murderer, if thou do it. It is murder to destroy the "conception in the womb." Christ also will take it as a solemn affront offered to him; for convictions are the messengers which he sends to prepare the way of his entry into the soul. And will he not heinously resent it, to see his messengers killed or maltreated? O what horrid ingratitude is it to Christ, after he hath opened the doors of our hearts half-way by convictions, to have it shut against him, when he is just ready to enter; or, when he is half-way in, to be thrust back again, and have the door thrown in his face!

3. Consider how prejudicial it is to thy own soul. The dying away of thy convictions threatens the life of thy soul. If you quench them, God may be provoked to pass that dreadful sentence, "My Spirit shall no longer strive with thee:" and so there follows a midnight silence, and thou art lost for ever. O tremble for fear of God's judgments, for thy case is more dangerous than others! No water freezes so fast, as that which has been once warmed; and no iron is so hard, as that which has been oft heated and oft quenched. Therefore,

4. Presently strike in with thy convictions. Bless God for awaking thee, when others about thee are lying in a deep sleep; for visiting thee, when others are passed by. Be content to have thy sore lanced, and thy wound searched. Suffer no other plaster to be applied to it but Christ's blood. Go not to heal the wound of thy conscience by the works of the law, and thy own righteousness; for these will at best but skin it over for a while. Neither go to shift off convictions by delays, as did Felix; for this is the devil's great stratagem to ruin thy soul. It is with the heart as with melted wax; if you put the seal to it when it is soft, it receives an impression which abides; but if you delay, it soon cools and hardens, so that press on it as ye will, it is to no purpose. Let us then imitate David, who, when he was convinced of the evil of his ways, "without any delay turned his feet to God's testimonies," Psal. cxix. 59. Put forth thy utmost strength, and stir up thyself to turn from sin, and flee to Christ, while conscience is stirring, the Spirit striving, Christ waiting, his bowels sounding, and his blood pleading; for the loss of this season may be the loss of thy soul. God says thrice in one chapter, Heb. iv., "To-day, to-day, to-day," but the devil cries, "To-morrow, to-morrow, to-morrow." Surely God is wisest, and his time fittest. To-day is thy living day, to-morrow may be thy dying day: to-day thou art on earth, to-morrow thou mayest be in hell: to-day mercy is inviting, to-morrow justice may be smiting; therefore, while thou art called "to-day, hear the voice of God and conscience, and harden not your heart."

IV. Labour to persevere in prayer this evening; do not faint in it, but endeavour with Moses, to "hold up your hands this day till the going down of the sun." Our frequency and importunity in this duty is no trouble, but a delight to the hearer of prayer. Christ says oft this day to the spouse, "Thy voice is sweet, cause me to hear it." Continue instant in prayer this day, wrestling as Jacob, and saying, "I will not let thee go till thou bless me." And as orators, at the close of their speech, use all their art and skill to move the affections of their auditors; so do you, at the close of the Lord's day, put forth all your grace and spiritual strength in prayer, to prevail with God for a blessing. Pray this evening, as if it were to be thy last Sabbath, thy last night, or thy last prayer; knowing that, when death comes, thou canst pray no more: for, as death binds up the hand that it can work no more, so it strikes dumb the tongue that it can speak no more; according to Eccl. ix. 10; Isa. xxxviii. 18.

V. Study to be denied to all your Sabbath-prayers and performances. Beware, my friends, of secret trusting to them, as any piece of righteousness before God; for that will spoil all, like the dead fly in the apothecary's ointment. Say therefore this day, after ye have done all, "We are unprofitable servants." Look above all, as if you had done nothing at all, to the righteousness of Christ to answer for all. See that you join nothing of your own with this perfect righteousness, in the point of your justification and acceptance with God; for this is both dishonourable to Christ, and dangerous to yourselves: therefore beware of it. There is a natural popery in the minds of all; we much incline to stand upon our own legs, and to have something of our own to found upon. But is it any other thing than blasphemy, to charge Christ's sacrifice with lameness, or his work with deficiency? or to think with our penny to make up Christ's sum, and with our polluted duties to add any perfection to the blood of Christ, which is infinite? Shall not we rest content with that wherewith God hath declared himself well pleased! Let us then, with Paul, "count all things but dung and loss for Christ and his righteousness," and desire only to be found in him.

FAMILY DUTIES ON THE SABBATH NIGHT.

IN the next place, I proceed to speak of family-duties requisite this night, and how these are to be performed.

I. O heads of families, see that ye be more solemn, full, and particular in family worship this evening, than at other times: it is pleasant this night to hear universally the melody of God's praise in the tabernacles of the righteous. Lay out your family-sins, wants, and mercies fully and plainly before God in family-prayer.

II. Confer about the sermons, and repeat over what you have heard; for the Lord, Deut. xi. 18, 19, requires you not only to lay up God's words in your hearts, but also to "speak of them when you sit in your houses, and to teach them your children." You ought also to call your servants and children to an account, as to what they remember, and how they have profited by the sermons. When you send your servants to the market, you examine what market they have made: now, the public ordinances are heaven's free market for their souls, and will you never inquire what they have gained thereat? This way of rehearsing the sermons is very refreshing and advantageous, and hereby one of you would be useful to another; for, what one forgets, another may remember.

III. Let parents and heads of families take some time this evening in catechising and instructing their children and servants in the knowledge of the principles of religion, and of their duty towards God, their neighbours, and themselves. We may observe, from the iv. of Mark, and xiv. of Luke, that after our Lord had instructed the people, as a public preacher, on the Sabbath-day, he afterwards examined and taught his twelve disciples as a private master of a family.

1. Begin with children, as soon as they are capable, and inform them, that there is such a Being as God, whom they ought to honour, reverence, and love above all things: that they are his creatures, the work of his hands: that he preserves them, and gives them all the good things they enjoy; and that every good thing is to be sought from God by prayer, and thanks returned to him for the same. Show them the evil and danger of sin, and how much God hates it: that they have immortal souls: that there is a life after death in another world, wherein men shall receive a great and eternal reward, or a fearful endless punishment, according as they have done or neglected their duty in this world: and that God loves those who keep his commandments and pray to him; but hates wicked men, and those who do not pray. If these principles were early instilled and rooted in children, they would in some measure abide with them all their days. Likewise, as they are capable, show them the great degeneracy and corruption of human nature, derived to us by the fall of our first parents: also, show them the way of our recovery from this miserable state by Jesus Christ, who was sent by God to redeem and save us from the bondage of sin and Satan, and from the damnation of hell.

2. Before they are capable to read, or get and repeat our Shorter Catechism, you ought to frame many short questions and answers concerning the foresaid principles, such as they are able to mind, and frequently examine them upon them: and, for your help in this matter, you may consult the little Catechism I have published, called The Mother's Catechism for the Young Child. But as soon as your children are able to repeat our Shorter Catechism, enjoin them, and your servants also, to commit it to their memories, prescribing so much of it to them every week, and duly examine them upon it every Lord's day: for it contains an excellent scheme both of the principles of our religion which we ought to believe, and also of the duties thereof which we should practise. And is it not far better to repeat this, than ballads and idle stories, wherewith many burden their memories?

3. As you ought to learn them to read, so you should this day solemnly enjoin them to read the bible and other pious books, and inquire at them what they have been reading through the day and the bygone week. And because of the natural backwardness that is both in young and old to holy duties, you ought to contrive the most wise and effectual methods you can think on, to engage them to delight and diligence in reading of the bible; such as these, viz. Teach children the most profitable, pleasant, and affecting histories and passages of the bible; such as, "the creation of man, Adam's fall, the flood, the destruction of Sodom, the sacrificing of Isaac, the selling of Joseph, Pharaoh's cutting off the infants, and Moses's preservation; Moses's going up to the mount, and getting the tables of the law; the passages concerning Samson's killing the Philistines, and David's killing Goliath; the forty-two children destroyed by bears, the three children in the fiery furnace; Daniel in the lions' den; Jonah in the whale's belly; Herod's destroying the young children," and the like. Endeavour to tell them these passages as much as ye can in their own language, and this will engage them to the greater delight and attention, and cause them to remember them the better; also, you would put them to rehearse them over again to you.

Again, cause them read a chapter of the Bible every night, and tell you some of the principal things in it before they lie down; or, when you read a chapter in the family, appoint each of them some one verse of it to repeat the next day. Moreover, when they come to learn to write, it is a good way to give them paper-books, to write down what passages they think most considerable in the Bible, or what remarkable sayings and histories they find in other books. They might well spend the Saturday's afternoon this way, when they have most leisure.

In the next place, it would be of good use, when you examine them, to teach them to prove every point of religion by some appropriate place of scripture. This would be the way to beget in them firm, strong, and fixed persuasions of the truths of Christianity. Many, alas! profess Christianity, merely because it is the national religion, and they were so educated: they build their faith more upon the assertions and teachings of men, than upon the sure foundation of God's word, and all because they were not put to it when young, to acquaint themselves with the scriptures, or to bring proofs from them for the truths they learned. Are not there many professors of Christianity, who, if they were put to it, could not give one text of scripture to prove so much as the great fundamentals of their religion? It cannot be expected that such will be close adherers to it in a day of trial and persecution. A good way to mend this fault is, to get the Confession of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechisms, which are printed with the scripture proofs set down at large, and make much use thereof. Lastly, As you ought to cause them attend punctually this day upon the ordinances, so you ought carefully this night to ask an account of the text, and their notes of the lecture and sermons; reprove them for careless bearing, encourage them when they give any tolerable good account, and promise them some reward to do better the next Sabbath.

4. You ought this day to learn and enjoin your children to pray, and to ask a blessing, and give thanks for their meat: you may see some helps for them in the end of the Mother's Catechism before mentioned. Children cannot pray at first without help: therefore it is fit to teach them some short forms; and, in the first place, the Lord's prayer, the great pattern of all prayer. Teach them to retire every morning and evening to pray, and to pray frequently on the Lord's day; and also cause them to go and pray together by turns; this would be a good mean to engage their love to one another, and to cause them study to be more grave and exact in their prayers: and therefore it were fit also to cause them pray sometimes in your own hearing. Enjoin them also to be fervent and sincere in prayer, and to pray with a lively sense of God's all-seeing eye that beholds in secret, and with an awful regard to the judgment of the great day. Likewise, when they come to any capacity, tell them that they must not restrict themselves to their forms, but must make additions of their own framing; tell them that God loves these words best that come from the heart; and for their help therein, tell them often of their sin and misery by nature, and of their need of Christ, and his blood to wash and save them; direct them frequently to say, "Lord, teach me to pray, give me thy Spirit to help me to pray." Also every Sabbath night inquire at them what new words and expressions they have got and added to their prayers, and encourage and reward them according to their diligence. O parents, neglect not to teach your poor children to pray and read. Will you teach them to work, and not teach them to pray? If you do it not, the devil will teach them to swear, lie, and play on the Lord's day. And will it not be a fearful reckoning that you will have to make ere long for their prayerless and perishing souls? A great many children neglect prayer, not so much from their aversion to it, as from this, that none takes care to teach them how to do it; and hence it is, they often neglect it all their days. Whereas, if they were early taught and put on the duty of prayer, the habit and custom of the thing would make it turn easy and delightful; but, when this is neglected, they cannot afterwards be brought to it, without great reluctance and difficulty. So that you see, O parents, if ye improve not the season of youth, the blood of your children's souls will be laid to your door.

5. It is very proper on this day, as soon as your children are capable, to take them aside, and solemnly to tell them the vows you took on at baptism in their name, and as sponsors for them, and how you publicly engaged "that they would be the Lord's, and renounce the world, the devil, and the flesh:" and therefore, for your own exoneration, you should take them solemnly engaged to do and perform all those things which you promised in their name. Put them to it personally and explicitly to own and renew their baptismal covenant, to show themselves Christians, not only by their parents' dedication, but also by their own deed and voluntary consent.

Let each of them profess and say, "I choose God the Father for my God and Father, I choose God the Son for my Redeemer and Saviour, I choose the Holy Ghost for my Guide and Sanctifier, God's word for my rule, God's people for my companions, holiness for my way, and heaven for my home."

6. Take care this evening to give both them and your servants many serious and affectionate admonitions concerning their souls, and their duties to God and man. Warn them solemnly against sin and vice, and particularly those vices that are too common among us; study to check and discourage the beginnings of vice in children; observe and watch the first appearances thereof, and pluck them up by the roots. For, if vice be connived at in the beginning, it will turn afterwards too strong for you; but when it is never suffered to appear to pass without reproof or correction, this helps by degrees to breed in children an abhorrence of it. Labour in a special manner to beget in them frightful impressions of the sins of swearing and profaning the name of God, the sin of disobedience to parents, the sin of Sabbath-breaking, of lying, obscene words, stealing, pride, passion, revenge, neglect of prayer and reading, &c. Study to persuade them to godliness with the most endearing language and prevailing arguments, according to Prov. xxxi. 1—3, that so you may convince them that in all your admonitions and reproofs you have an earnest desire for their welfare, and that you and they may dwell in heaven together through all eternity. It is sometimes needful solemnly to obtest and charge them to mind their duty; as Mr. Bolton, a godly man, said to his children on his death-bed, "I charge you, O my children, not to meet me at Christ's tribunal in a Christless and graceless condition."

7. Join fervent prayers this day with your endeavours; for prayerless instructions will not profit. Parents may plant, ministers may water, "but God only can give the increase." You ought to take some time this day to pity, mourn, and pray for your children, servants, and relations, that are in the darkness of a natural state, and under the slavery of Satan. If any of them were taken by the Turks, and laid in dark dungeons, treated as slaves, scourged every day, and barbarously used; would not your bowels yearn, and your hearts bleed for them? Or, if any of your near relations were dead, would you not mourn for them? And are you not more concerned to mourn and pray for them that are Satan's slaves, justice's prisoners, spiritually dead, and sentenced to everlasting death? Have you any love to your children, and will you not carry them this day in the arms of faith and prayer to the blessed Jesus, beseeching him "to put his hands of mercy on them, and bless them?" as in Matt. xix. 13; yea, not only pray for them, but take them along with you, and let them be the eye and ear-witnesses of your prayers, sighs, and tears, for the conversion and salvation of their souls; and who knows but this might work upon their hearts? Let them hear you say to God, as Jacob, Gen. xxxiii. 5, "Lord, thou hast graciously given me these children, but, Oh! (you may add) Lord, I have given them sin, that is their portion from me. Lord, though I cannot give them Christ and grace, yet thou canst do both; they are born to me once, O that they may be born to thee a second time!" Say as Abraham, Gen. xvii., "O that my Ishmael may live before thee!" And Deut. xxxiii., "Let my Reuben live, and not die." Let these who are pieces of my bowels, and are now dead in trespasses and sin, live in thy sight; thou art the Lord of life, breathe on them, and they shall live. Lord, let not these who are so dear to me fry in the flames for ever; one house holds us now, let one heaven hold us hereafter. Cry, as those in the gospel, Matt. xvii., "Lord, have mercy on my son; my daughter is grievously vexed;" Lord, come and heal them, and let me see my children to be the work of thy hands in the midst of thy house; "then shall not my face wax pale, nor be ashamed, but I will sanctify the Holy One of Israel," Isa. xxix. 22, 23.

But, in midst of these secret and family duties, necessary on the evening of the Lord's day, it is needful that our frail bodies be refreshed with meat and drink; and, the work of the day being nearly over, you are at the more freedom to eat plentifully; yet still with holy fear and caution, and a desire spiritually to improve the time of eating, and to make God's glory your end in eating and drinking, 1 Cor. x. 31.

If you are to have company or strangers with you, then look to God for wisdom to behave yourselves in all your words and deportment, that you may neither do them harm, nor get harm from them. Say, "O that my lips this night were like those of the righteous which feed many!"

When you are called to sit down to supper this night, think or say, "How happy were I, if I were now called to sit down and sup with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, at that higher table that shall never be drawn, where they enjoy an everlasting Sabbath, that hath no night nor darkness to follow upon it, as this hath!"

When you see the table covered for you, O bless the Author of it and say, "When God remembers me, let me not forget him. Oh! let not my table turn a snare to me; let me never make a god of my belly, nor employ my chief care for the meat that perisheth."

When the meat is brought, let us, according to our Saviour's example, look up to heaven, and pray for a blessing on our food, and for the sanctified use of God's creatures, that we may taste covenant-love in common mercies, and enjoy the Creator while using the creature. Then think, "O how sweet would these mercies be, if they come dipped in the blood of Christ, and through the channel of the everlasting covenant to me! If I could enjoy them, not as a creature, but as an heir, "and a joint heir with Christ," who is the "heir of all things," and hath been pleased to adopt believers in his right! O how sweet, if every morsel did come from my Father's hand, and sent from his table, as an earnest of greater and better things laid up for me above! Lord, I am not worthy of the least crumb that falls from the table of thy providence, and yet thou coverest a full table to worthless me; "what shall I render to the Lord?"

Is thy provision but small? Then study to be content therewith. Consider how cheerfully Christ, the Heir of all things, did thank God for coarse and mean fare, John vi., when he had but a few barley loaves and small fishes for himself and his whole family. How much better provided are we, than Christ and his numerous family was? And shall we not be easy and thankful?

Have you a full table? Then fear lest these outward things insnare your heart; and, for preventing of it, think, "O what a poor portion would these things be, if I get no better! O how miserable will I be, if, when God gives me bread to the full, he should send leanness to my soul!" Therefore remember Luther's solemn protest to God, when a bountiful present was sent him, he protested, "That he would not be put off with common mercies."

But, if you have any clearness concerning your interest in Christ, the sight of God's goodness to you in a full table, should cause you rejoice in him, and say, "All this and heaven too! O what a good Master do we serve!"

When you have eaten, and are full, see that ye forget not God your Maker and Benefactor, but with heart and mouth, in a solemn manner, give thanks to him. O believers, you have four things particularly to give thanks for: 1st. That God gives mercies to furnish your table. 2d. Health to use them. 3d. Peace to meet together. 4th. That ye have a right to them; I mean not a common, but a covenant-right, a right by virtue of Christ's purchase.

It were very agreeable to conclude all by singing a psalm of praise.

I do not offer to restrain any Christian family to any precise particular method of performing duties on the Sabbath evening, but must leave that to be determined by the prudence of masters of families, according to the circumstances of their families. Some may find it convenient to catechise their children and servants, and repeat the sermons before supper, some after; so some may perform family worship before, some after; others both before and after. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind; only labour that no duty incumbent be omitted.

I do not say that all the forenamed duties, in all their solemnity, are indispensably necessary every Lord's day; for time and circumstances may so straiten us, that we cannot get them performed so fully as before directed, especially as to the instruction of children, and examination of ourselves; but what cannot be overtaken in one Sabbath, let it be done in another. I have chosen to be pretty full in this directory, because it may be useful also for other days in the week.

WHEN family duties and supper are over, and the condition of our weak and weary bodies begins to call for sleep and rest, let us endeavour to close this holy day in a due and suitable manner. Take these few directions:

I. When you find sleep beginning to assault you, think, "O how soon are we tired of doing good! O that we could say, Though we may be somewhat weary with our work, yet we are not weary of our work! And it is our regret, that we should be laid under a necessity of losing so much of our time in sleeping, and should lie so long, incapable of serving either God or man. Let this make us long to be there, where there shall be no need of sleep, but we shall be like the angels of God, who never sleep nor rest from serving and beholding God.

II. Think how terrible is it for a Christless unconverted sinner to lie down this night with so many millions of unpardoned sins on his back, to sleep securely within the flood-mark of God's vengeance, and within a step of hell! O unconverted man, consider your continual hazard; you never lay down with assurance to rise again; you never slept one Sabbath night, with assurance you would see another Sabbath, or hear another sermon; and how can you live at peace in such a condition? Death and hell are ever before you: it is a wonder you do not think on them by day, and dream of them by night, lie down in fear, rise in fear, and live in fear, lest death come before you be converted; it is a wonder you can get any sleep in this condition. If your body want but meat, drink, or clothing, yea, if you have but an aching tooth, it hinders you to sleep; and yet wilt thou sleep, O sinner when both soul and body are on the brink of hell, and the devil gaping and roaring for you? O then resolve you "will not give sleep to your eyes, nor slumber to your eye-lids, till your soul be in a better condition; at least, till you pour out your heart, confess your sins, lay down your weapons of rebellion, and bemoan your case before the Lord, and look up to Christ for pity and pardon. We should not willingly venture to sleep in that ease we would not venture to die in. How many have been hurried into eternity in a moment! O think with yourself, "Death may be within a day's march of me: to-day I am sinning, but to-morrow I may be dying. O what if death take me doing the devil's work? will it not send me to him to receive my wages?"

III. Before you lie down this night, confess and mourn over the sins of the bypast day; lament your manifold shortcomings in public, in private, and secret duties; say, "Alas for the mean and low conceptions I have had of God, the great object of worship this day! What formality and hypocrisy in my approaches to him! O how vain and wandering were my thoughts, when they should have been most fixed and intent upon God! How dark and blind was my understanding, when God's truths were laid before me! How little of the evil of sin, or beauty of holiness, did I see! Lord, how hard and flinty was my heart, little affected by all the strokes of the hammer of thy word upon it? How dead and carnal were my affections, little moved by all the rich displays and offers of Christ's love and beauty! How sleepy was my conscience, little startled by all the reproofs and threatenings of thy word! How false and treacherous was my memory, in letting slip the sweet counsels and comforts I heard! O what by-ends have I had in duty this day! How little have I been concerned for the interest of Christ's church and kingdom in the world! How idle and unedifying have my words been, when in company! Oh how little have I done for God's glory, or my neighbour's good this day!" And, having thus humbly confessed your sins and shortcomings this day, make application to the blood of Christ for pardon, and to his intercession for acceptance with God, that so you may lie down this night in a reconciled state with him.

IV. Commit yourselves by fervent prayer to God's tuition and protection through the night, even to the protection of "him that keeps Israel, who never slumbers nor sleeps." You cannot sleep in safety, unless God watch for you; for, while you are sleeping, there are many enemies and evil spirits about you, seeking your hurt; and you have no friend then but God to look to you: you are then both insensible of your danger, and unable to help yourself. Pray then that God may set a hedge about you, that Satan cannot break through, and that he may appoint his angels to pitch their tents round about you, and all you have. Pray that God himself may watch over you while you are sleeping, and may keep you from being disturbed or defiled by evil dreams or imaginations in the night.—Would you have your rest refreshing, your sleep sweet, and your dreams instructing, and God himself to be your keeper and guard in the night? Then close this day with fervent and believing prayer to God in Christ: he were a foolish governor of a city, that would betake himself to rest before he set the watch for the city's safeguard.

V. Endeavour to lie down this night with thankful hearts to God; let us bless God for the Sabbath, and for all the mercies of it, especially for the joyful sound of the gospel, and the news of Christ. But O let us not be content with hearing the joyful sound, without knowing the same; with the news of Christ, without an interest in Christ; with Christ revealed to us, without Christ revealed in us. Let us not be like foolish children, that play by the light of that candle which is set up for their preparing for going to rest, lest the light be extinguished, and we go at last to the bed of the grave in the darkness of sin and sorrow. Have you any comfortable view of your interest in Christ? or had you any thing of his Spirit or presence this day in the ordinances? then rejoice in God, and say with the Psalmist, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not, all his benefits: return unto thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee."

Again, bless God for health and peace to lie down with. "Some are distressed, they dare not lie down for lack of breath; others are chased from their beds and dwellings by the raging sword or pestilence; and, behold, I may lie down without any to make me afraid."

Further, let us bless the Lord that we have warm beds to lie on, and not the cold ground, with a stone for our pillow, as Jacob had. Many of God's dear saints, of whom the world was not worthy, were put to lie "in dens and caves of the earth." Nay, "the Son of man had not where to lay his head," while he lived in this ungrateful world. Wonder at his humiliation, and say, "Had it not been for him, instead of a refreshing bed, I might have been lying down this night in the flames of hell."

VI. It is very proper this night, as well as every night, to lie down with thoughts of death and eternity. Think, now I have one Sabbath less to live in the world; and, O that thereby I may be a Sabbath-day's journey nearer heaven, where I shall celebrate an eternal Sabbath, that will never draw near an end! O to be there where there is no sleep, no night to interrupt the saints' communion with God! When you are putting off your clothes, think, the time is near when you must put off this earthly tabernacle. When you lay aside your garments, think, so must I shortly lay aside the garment of this body. O may I then expect immediately to be clothed upon with glory and immortality! and, shall I not long for that time? This body, in its best state, is but a prison to a believing soul, and detains it from its happiness. Plato, though a heathen, had such clear apprehensions of the immortality of the soul, that he said to one that fed highly, "What mean you to make your prison so strong?" Am I a believer in Christ, and shall not I be looking long through the grates of mortality, till the jailor come and open my prison-door, knock off the fetters of sin, and set me at liberty, that I may with joy fly to my eternal rest? Moreover, think how willing we are to put off our clothes at night, that we may go to rest, especially when we are weary; and wish and say, O that I were in a condition to put off the body at death with as great willingness and satisfaction! and, with Paul, long "to be dissolved," and to put off this clay tabernacle. Mr. Dod, a holy man, saith, "If parents should tell children who have played all day, that they must go to bed, they begin to cry, and show reluctancy: but a labouring man is glad when night comes, that he may go to rest. So (says he) to the wicked, who have mis-spent the day of their life, death is an unwelcome guest; but the godly are tossed and wearied in this world, and therefore are content to go to the bed of the grave, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary be at rest," Job iii. 17. Sin wearies them, Satan wearies them, the wicked weary them, sickness and crosses weary them, and Christ's absence wearies them of the world, and no wonder they desire to be at rest from all these troubles."

When you see yourself stript of your clothes, think, "Naked came I into the world, and naked shall I return;" I can carry nothing hence of all my earthly enjoyments.—Lord, let me never choose my portion in these things I must leave eternally behind me. Let worldlings reflect on this: all those things, for which you have toiled and laboured for many years, you must leave in one night, Luke xii. 20. Nothing of all your earthly treasures can you carry alongst with you to another world, unless it be the rust thereof, to witness against you, and eat up your souls as a canker to all eternity, according to James v. 1, 3. Whatever be your enjoyments here, remember death stands as a porter at the gate of eternity, to see, that "as you brought nothing into the world, you carry nothing out of it," 1 Tim. vi. 7. A coffin and a winding-sheet shall be the most of it. You may imagine what a broad look the poor soul will give then to those things you made your treasure here. O (will it say) must I part for ever with all my riches? must I be set naked ashore in eternity, having nothing to relieve me? must I suffer an everlasting famine? Poor soul, the world's treasures do not pass current in another world; they cannot there purchase you any relief, or buy so much as "one drop of water to cool thy flaming tongue."

Let your lying down in bed, and covering you with clothes, put you in mind of your lying down in the cold grave, and your being covered up with earth. Look on your bed as a tomb or sepulchre; and every night, before you enter into it, seek reconciliation with God, and new discoveries of his love in Christ, as you would do if going to your grave. How sad is it to be dying without Christ, and God reconciled through him? Again, think or say, "O that the grave may be a bed of rest to me, upon the account of Christ's lying therein!" The grave is become a bed of roses to believers, by the Rose of Sharon's lying down in it. Christ hath hereby sweetened and perfumed it for them. Am I a believer, and shall I fear to lie down in my Redeemer's bed? O believer, thou mayest every night say with the Psalmist, "I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep: for thou, blessed Lord, only makest me to dwell in safety," Psal. iv. 8. When you are laid down, "commune with your own heart upon your bed," and, with the Psalmist, "remember God upon your bed, and meditate on him in the night watches." And, if you fall asleep with some heavenly meditation in your thoughts, your sleep will be more sweet, your dreams more comfortable, and your awaking more refreshful. And, in a special manner, let us endeavour on the Sabbath night, that as we begin this day with the delightful remembrance of Christ's resurrection, so to close it with the cheerful expectation of Christ's second coming, and our awaking and rising from the grave to meet him. And when Christ is saying, "Surely I come quickly;" O that we may be in case this night to answer, "Amen, even so, come, Lord Jesus!"

CONCERNING OUR CARRIAGE AFTER THE SABBATH IS OVER.

Thus have I finished the second general head in this direction, viz. What is requisite in performing the duties of the Sabbath when it is come? It remains that I should speak a word to the third, viz. What is incumbent on us at the end of the Sabbath, or when it is past?

When the next day cometh, and we are again to fall to our weekly employments, we ought to retain lively impressions of the preceding day's work on our spirits, and not soon forget what we have seen and heard on the Sabbath. In the first place, let us repent for the sins and shortcomings of the Sabbath, and beg forgiveness thereof from God, that we go not about our worldly employments with the guilt of the Sabbath-day's sins upon us, lest they bring a curse upon the "works of our hands." Again, let us pray and endeavour to bring much of a Sabbath-day's frame into the business of the week, and retain much of it through the week, that so we may be the fitter for the next Sabbath, yea, and in case to long for it. This would be a fair way to obtain a blessing on the labours of the week, and to prosper the "works of our hands." Oh! shall we bring so much of the week with us into the Sabbath, and will we bring nothing of the Sabbath with us into the week? O let us study to be so "in the Spirit on the Lord's day," as to "walk in the Spirit" all the week thereafter, mindful both of the Sabbath past, and of the Sabbath next ensuing; because it is said to us every day, "Remember the Sabbath-day that ye may keep it holy." Had we more of Sabbath-days thoughts on week-days, then week-day thoughts would less trouble us on Sabbath days.

DIRECTION IV.—CONCERNING THE PARTICULAR SINS WHEREBY THE SANCTIFICATION OF THE SABBATH IS HINDERED, OR THE SABBATH PROFANED.

If we would duly sanctify the Lord's day, we must conscientiously guard against, and abstain from, all those sins which are opposite thereunto; whether they be sins of omission, or commission, sins of the heart, of the tongue, or of the life.

OF SINS OF OMISSION ON THE LORD'S DAY.

I. I shall begin with sins of omission, and neglect of the duties of the Sabbath. There are many, alas! that make this altogether an idle day; they consume it away in doing nothing, and keep it no better than do the beasts; they abstain from the works of religion, as much as from the works of their calling, never considering that the Lord's day is profaned by sloth and idleness, as well as by servile labour or immoral actions. There are many who place all their religion in negatives, like the Pharisees, Luke xviii. 11, and foolishly think to be justified by their negative holiness. "I never wronged my neighbour (say some,) I did not mock at religion, swear, get drunk," &c. But remember, a man may abstain from evil, and yet go to hell for not doing good, Matt. iii. 10. A tree is cut down for bringing forth no fruit, as soon as for bringing forth bad fruit. It is as dangerous not to do things con-manded, as to do things forbidden, Matt. xxiii. 23. There is a woe pronounced against the one, as well as the other. The slothful servant is reckoned a wicked servant, Matt. xxv. 26, and adjudged to utter darkness, as well as the most vicious. Wherefore beware of profaning the Lord's day by idleness, or neglecting of the public, private, or secret duties above-mentioned, which are requisite on this day. And, in a special manner, beware,

First, Of neglecting the hearing of the word this day, or forsaking the assemblies of God's people upon it. What madness is it to slight the means of saving your lives, and delivering your souls from hell? What contempt is it of Christ's bowels of mercy? If a great king should send an ambassador to a condemned malefactor, with offers of remission, would it not highly exasperate him, if he refused so much as to hear him? O what may God say to such foolish sinners in the day of their distress, when they cry to him? May he not send you to the gods you have served, and tell you, "Ye would not come and hear me when I sent most gracious proposals of peace to you, neither will I hear you now?" With what torture and anguish will you eternally reflect on your folly? If you could now but lay your ear to hell's door, and hear such gospel-slighters crying out against their sin, it would make your hearts tremble. Suppose you heard them say, "O if time could be recalled, what would we give to hear one gospel-sermon from the most despised minister? How many miles would we go! Yea, we would run from sea to sea, to hear one encouraging sentence from Christ's mouth, or his messengers: nay, we would be content to suffer a thousand years' darkness for one day's gospel light, a thousand years' burning for one day of the Son of man, many whereof I have neglected. But O! there is no hope, the season is lost, the sentence past, and we are irrecoverably undone!" O how will the devils wonder at your folly, and eternally upbraid you with it?

Secondly, Beware of neglecting family duties on the Sabbath. The fourth commandment binds masters of families to be careful hereof; yet, alas! how sadly are they neglected? In many places no family prayers or praises, no family instructions, no family reading of God's word is to be found. Instead of "delighting in the law of the Lord," which is the character of the blessed man, Psal. i. 2, it is laid by as a sealed book. The dust, which many suffer their bibles to gather beside them, will be a fearful witness against them one day. But more particularly, I shall speak worship, consider in what a miserable state prayerless families are. The Spirit of God ranks them into the same category with the "heathen that know not God," Jer. x. 25. For how should the families of Christians be distinguished from those of Turks and Pagans, but by the badge of family worship? Without this badge, then, you are ranked in with heathens, or persons excommunicated, that is, such as are cast out of the church into the devil's hands; for of such Christ saith, "Let him be to thee as a heathen." Again, consider what is there threatened against you; a black cloud continually hangs over your families, ready every moment to pour out wrath and fury upon you, not in small drops, but in great showers, to overwhelm you at once, from which your houses cannot defend you, though their foundations were on a rock, their walls of brass, and their doors of iron. For, while you are without family prayer, you want a roof to keep off the shower of wrath, and lie night and day exposed to this terrible threatening, "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not, and upon the families that call not on thy name." It is not simply anger that is threatened, but fury, wrath in the greatest height and rage. O let prayerless families through the land tremble at this threatening! I fear, if it were presently executed, it would make thin cities and parishes somewhere. But though God be patient and long-suffering, yet, believe it, there are secret and invisible curses which light and lie upon prayerless families, and the works of their hands. Neglect of prayer doth uncover the roof to let God's curses drop through upon your persons, children, tables, and all your enjoyments; for you denude yourselves of all security and protection. Family prayer is an excellent roof to your houses; it is like the roof that is made of Irish oak, which no venomous spider will touch, nor lodge in. Family worship, duly performed, dislodges sin and vice; nay, it dislodges the devil also: and for those houses that are haunted with evil spirits, whatever other reason may be given for it, no doubt this is one—God's worship hath not been duly performed therein. And though the devil doth not appear in a visible or audible manner, yet he certainly haunts prayerless houses; for he hopes for large draughts out of them. Why? Sin and wickedness are fair to reign there; malice, pride, deceit, and intemperance, will bear sway; swearing, cursing, and lying, will be the language of the house, and the children will learn it betimes. But, when prayer is introduced into a family, these vices are banished, and Satan removes. For either prayer will make you give over sinning, or sinning will make you give over praying; they cannot dwell well together. But the house

OF THE EVIL OF NEGLECTING FAMILY DUTIES.

1. To deter you from the neglect of family which the unclean spirit finds empty of prayer, is a house swept and garnished for him and a black train of vices to enter and dwell in. If God's worship be not in the house, you may write, "Lord, have mercy upon us," upon the door, as they use to do when a house is shut up with the plague. What can we expect in a prayerless house, but the plagues and curses of God? Abraham expected no good in a prayerless place; therefore says he of Gerar, Gen. xx. 11, "Surely the fear of God is not in this place; they will slay me," &c. What a miserable place or house must that be, where God's fear is not? Surely it must be a sink of sin, a butt of wrath, a cage of unclean birds, and a habitation of devils.

O masters of families, will you pity the souls of your families? Tremble lest their blood be found in your skirts. When a child or servant dies out of your family, it will be sad if conscience have it to tell you, "Here one has died out of your house, with whom you never prayed; you dwelt together, eat together, wrought together many years, but you never prayed together. And what if his soul be gone to hell through your neglect? What if his blood be charged on you? How will you answer for it? Who knows but if he had seen and heard you pray, your words and example might have moved him to go into a secret corner and pray for his own soul, and so he might have been singing with the saints in heaven, instead of howling with the damned in hell?"

But if the case be so melancholy when they die from you, surely it will be far worse when you come to die yourselves. You have all your days kept your families godless and prayerless; well, what accounts will you give of your stewardships, when you may be no longer stewards? and what anguish do you think will seize on you, when, with Dives, you shall feel yourselves in hell, and then begin (not before) to lift up your eyes to heaven, and see the godly praying ones, whom you despised, afar off, and a great gulf fixed betwixt you and them; and also, when you shall see those of your prayerless families, whom you ruined by your example and influence, brought down to the same place of torment, to increase your misery, and add fuel to your flames! O masters of prayerless families, think on these things in time.

Oh! will neither the fear of hell, nor nopes of heaven persuade you to family prayer? I am sure far less would do it, could I assure you that the daily performance of it would gain you an estate of ten thousand merks a year: you would try it as you can, and be punctual in it too; you would no more pretend multitude of business, want of time, gifts, or confidence. And are you so atheistical, as to prefer a little of the world to heaven? Or, suppose there were strict laws made, that, for every time you neglected prayer, you should be thrown into a "den of lions," as Daniel was for praying; or that you should lose a finger off your hand, or but pay a hundred merks of fine: would you not pray as you can, and find time for it also, rather than lose your life, finger, or money? And are not the laws of God more awful and strict than the laws of men? Is not hell's dungeon, or a den of devils, more terrible than a den of lions? Are not hell's torments more fearful than the loss of a finger? Is not the wrath of the great God more dreadful than a fine? Oh! will not the fear of God prevail more with you than the fear of man? Remember Daniel's zeal of family prayer, who chose rather to be cast to the lions, before he would forbear it for one day. Oh, what shall we say of those, who will rather venture to be an eternal prey to the roaring lion, than be at this pains for salvation to themselves or their families; but you may hear in their houses twenty oaths for one prayer!

2. Consider the great sin of neglecting family instructions upon the Sabbath, which, alas! is so common, by reason whereof many children and servants are ignorant, prayerless, and graceless. Their parents and masters do not teach them to read, nor instruct them concerning the principles of religion; they neither pray for them, nor direct them how to pray for themselves. Is the knowledge of Christ a choice and excellent treasure? And will you withhold it from those whom you love, seeing it will not make you the poorer, but the richer, to communicate it to them? It is the commendation of Abraham, that he both made "his household know God's ways, and commanded them to obey the same," Gen. xviii. 19; and do you ever think to land in Abraham's bosom, that will not tread in Abraham's footsteps? Have you no pity or compassion on them that are "bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh?" Where is the yearning of your bowels towards their precious souls, that are in a starving and perishing condition for lack of knowledge? Will you be like cruel ostriches, Job xxxix., that are "hardened against their young ones," and leave them to be destroyed after they bring them forth? Will you, in like manner, bring forth your young ones, and then carelessly leave them to be a prey to the devil, and eternally to be torn to pieces by him? Are you indifferent about those that came forth of your loins, and whom you profess to love so dearly, whether they live with the blessed Jesus in heaven, or with the cursed devils in hell? Remember, O parents, who neglect the education of your children, God may punish you for it, even in this world, by their unnatural and unduti-ful carriage to you in old age, whereby they may bring down your gray hairs with sorrow to the grave; and no wonder though they make no conscience of their duty to you, who made no conscience to teach them their duty to God. Remember also, how many children have been brought to a miserable end in this world by the negligence and unfaithfulness of their parents this way; some going to the gibbet have bitterly reflected on their parents as the cause of their ruin, for giving them such a bad example, and not instructing them in the time of their youth. But, above all, consider how your children and servants may rise up and accuse you at the bar of God at the great day, and say, "Lord, there stands my father, there stands my master, he never taught us, prayed with us, or for us; he neglected prayer, he cursed, he lied, he brake the Sabbath, and so did we after his example. It is true, we are justly condemned, but yet we perish through their neglect, our blood is upon their heads." O parents, will it not make you speechless, and sting you to the heart, to hear your poor children crying out against you in that day, saying, "Had you noticed our souls as well as our bodies, had you been as careful to teach us the knowledge of God as of such a trade, it had not been with us as it is this day; we had not now stood trembling in expectation of that dreadful doom, which is just ready to be passed upon us! Cursed be the man that begat us, and the paps that gave us suck; it is to you we owe our eternal ruin and misery!"

O negligent parents, what horror and confusion will then seize you in that great and terrible day of the Lord, to hear such a charge from your children! but much more to hear God charge you with their blood, and say, "O unnatural wretches, behold how many precious souls you neglected and ruined, whose happiness you were bound to procure by so many ties of duty and affection. They were ignorant, and you instructed them not; they were prayerless, and you taught them not; they were Christless, and you pitied them not: yea, you not only neglected to give them good instruction, but you gave them bad example; you swore, lied, spoke obscenely, broke the Sabbath, mocked religion, &c.; and lo, in these very practices they have followed you to hell, to be an addition to your torments there for ever!"

Would you then prevent this sad reckoning, and be found with your children upon the Judge's right hand? see that you instruct them and pray for them. O fathers, would you wish to have your children well provided? then lay up a stock of prayers for them, both family and secret prayer: this is a stock that would not be soon spent, nay, it will be bringing them in something when you are dead and rotten. O mothers, your bodies travailed in pain at their first birth, let your souls travail in pain for their second birth. Where is your motherly tenderness toward the fruit of your womb? Would you not be sorry to hear them screaming, or see them frying in hell's flames, without remedy? Then do what lies in your power to prevent it, by instructing them, praying for them, and praying with them.

Thirdly, Beware of neglecting secret duties this day, such as were afore-mentioned, and particularly prayer. If thou be one, O sinner, that restrainest prayer before God this day, it is a black mark of a graceless heart; for a spirit of grace and supplication go still together. As difficulty of breathing, and painfulness in speaking, are symptoms of a sick body; so aversion to prayer is a sad sign of a sick soul. For prayer is the soul's breath and speech to God, Lam. iii. 16. Again, consider the danger of living in the neglect of this duty. "If Satan might have his wish against thee, in this particular, then he is as sure of thee as a robber is of a traveller, whom he has fast bound, lying in a ditch, and his mouth stopped that he cannot cry for help." O prayerless sinner, consider Satan has thee fast bound, and is just ready to murder thee; and wilt thou not cry to God for help? Moreover, think what a brutish thing it is to live prayerless, as, alas! many do; they rise like the beasts in the morning, they work with the beasts all day, and lie down like beasts at night, and never mind to look up to God, till he lay them on their backs upon a death-bed, and then they begin to cry like the beasts, when the knife is at their throat. Consider, O man, why God hath given thee a countenance erected towards heaven, and hath not made thee to creep on all-four, as other creatures, with their backs to heaven and mouths to earth; but to teach thee, that thou art made to converse with thy Maker, and have intercourse with heaven, and that the world's husks are not fit food for thy soul. We would pity a poor man that were all bowed together, and forced to go like a beast upon hands and feet, with his eyes always to the earth. And is it not a more pitiful spectacle to see a soul that is a spark of heaven, and created for communion with God, so crippled with ignorance and earthly-mindedness, as still to be poring and grovelling upon the earth, without looking up to God its Maker and happiness!

OF SINS OF COMMISSION ON THE LORD'S DAY.

II. IN the next place, I proceed to warn you against sins of commission, by which the Lord's day is too commonly profaned. And these are either inward or outward.

1.—OF INWARD SINS OF COMMISSION.

Inward sins, or heart sins, should be carefully guarded against this day, as being most provoking to God, polluting to his worship, and hurtful to our souls. Sinful thoughts are an abomination to God every day, Prov. xv. 26, but more especially this day. Thoughts are as loud in God's ears as words; and he commands evil thoughts to be forsaken, as well as evil ways, if we would have pardon, Isa. lv. 7. Wherefore let us get renewed and sanctified hearts, and overawe them with the thoughts of God's presence and omniscience: let us imagine this day, that we hear the sound of the last trumpet, and see the throne set, and God calling for an account of hearts; (for in that day he will judge hearts as well as lives) and, when any evil thought breaks in, say, "What if God, who sees this, should presently call me to account?" Let us keep a constant watch over our hearts this day, striving to crush all sinful thoughts in the bud, at their first rising, cry out for God's help. Let us be sensible what a mass of villany is in the heart, "It is desperately wicked," as Jeremiah saith; yea, "our inward part is very wickedness," Psal. v. 9. Hence it was that Luther profest, that "he feared his heart more than the pope or the cardinal;" and Augustine prayed, "Deliver me, O Lord, from myself." The heart is like the Trojan horse, out of whose belly proceeded armed enemies; so out of the heart proceed all evil words and actions, Mat. xv. 19. It is the corrupt fountain, from whence all the impure streams of actual sin do flow: therefore we should look narrowly to it.

But, besides incident evil thoughts, we have many evil habits and plagues of heart, that we should guard against on the Sabbath, being such as profane the day, and hinder the sanctification of it: particularly,

I. Atheism, and misbelief of God's truths. If this harbour or prevail in us, we can reap no profit by the word read or preached this day. Why do people delay or refuse to embrace Christ, and leave their sins, but because they want a fixed and firm impression of the truths of the gospel upon their hearts? It is true, you will not say that you misbelieve any of them, but you give no heart assent to the truth of them, which is little better; you give no firm inward credit to the gospel, and to all its assertions, commands, threatenings and promises, that they are come from God, and are most true, certain, and infallible. Were you once firmly persuaded of the eternity of eternal life and eternal death, you would not stand so long hovering betwixt heaven and hell. If once you had the firm impressions of eternal death, you would presently, "flee from the wrath to come;" and if you had a due sense of eternal life, you would "run to take hold of the hope set before you," Heb. vi. 18. But, alas! nature is half blind, and cannot see afar off, 2 Pet. i. 9. To carnal hearts and eyes, there seems to be a mist upon eternity; they cannot see into another world, and they cannot believe things not seen. But, O if you would be happy, you must steadfastly believe the "immortality of the soul, and a future life; that the Bible is the true word of God, and that the blessed God sent his eternal Son Jesus Christ into the world to assume man's nature, and die for to redeem him from sin and hell." With abhorrence renounce all doubting or unbelieving thoughts of these great truths; rather doubt of your own being than of these; believe that what now you hear with your ears concerning a future life and judgment-seat, you will shortly see with your eyes: if you do it not, you rub the highest affront on God that a creature is capable of; for you make your Creator a liar, 1 John v. 10. This is a sin that devils are not chargeable with, for "they believe and tremble." O sinner, what further confirmation of the truth wouldest thou have from God, than he hath already given thee? Thou hast his word, yea, his writ, ratified by his oath, confirmed by his miracles, and sealed by his Son's blood, which is far more, and far surer than either a voice from heaven, or a messenger from hell, according to 2 Pet. i. 19; Luke xvi. 31.

II. Ignorance of the truths you hear this day, greatly hinders the sanctification of it. You cannot prize Christ, close with him, or follow him, till such time as you know him. How can such hear the gospel, or embrace Christ offered therein, that know not their ruined natural condition, and their remedy through Christ? Many they know not Christ's love, and beauty, his ability, sufficiency and fitness, in his natures, offices, relations, graces, Spirit, and fulness: they know not the design of his coming into the world; the manner of his perfecting out redemption by his obedience and sufferings, and the manner of applying it, and our getting an interest therein, and the necessity and nature of faith in order thereto. For as oft as many have faith in their mouths, they know not what it is; they are ignorant what it is to receive Christ as a surety and Saviour, as a priest and king; and therefore many gospel sermons and Sabbaths are entirely lost to them.

O sinners, consider the danger of ignorance, it is a soul-murdering sin, Hos. iv. 6, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." Do not think your ignorance will excuse you at a tribunal, or save you from hell: no, it will rather aggravate your sin and condemnation, to be found ignorant, in a land where the light shines so plentifully about you. Ignorance will be so far from keeping off wrath from you, that God tells you it is a special procuring cause of wrath, and makes you more miserable than others, according to Isa. xxvii. 11, "This is a people of no understanding, therefore he that made them will not have mercy on them, and he that formed them will show them no favour."

Again, as ignorance is a damning sin in itself, so it is the fruitful mother of many other sins and lusts, according to 1 Pet. i. 14. What is the reason why many swear, lie, cheat, break the Sabbath, get drunk, commit uncleanness, slight ordinances, neglect prayer in their families and closets, and go on in their sins, without repenting or fleeing to Christ? It is because of their ignorance: they are ignorant of God, his infinite justice and holy nature, the evil of sin, and what Christ hath suffered for sinners; they know not what regeneration, repentance, and faith are, for all they speak of them; and how then can they practise them, or cry to God for them?

OBJECT. O (say some ignorant creatures) many have knowledge that make no good use of it; yea, they are more graceless and profane than we.

ANS. All this is too true, and these will have a sad account to make one day for sinning against so much light. But this will be no help to you, for profanity kills them, and ignorance kills you; they die of one disease, and you die of another; and your disease is as sure to kill as theirs. For you to reject knowledge, because some who have it abuse it and perish, is as ridiculous as for you to say, because many die who have both food and physic, and plenty of means for preserving life, I will use no means for preserving my life at all; for, whoever die, you are sure to die: they that have both food and physic may die, but they that have none of them cannot live. So, whoever perish, ignorant persons are sure to perish; for they know not their remedy, they cannot make use of the means of life. O ignorant souls, you are nearer hell than others; your state is darkness, and it borders upon utter darkness; so that you are, as it were, lodging in the next room to hell, having but a weak partition betwixt you and it, which death may break down in a moment, and let you pass into it.—When an ignorant sinner dies, there goes not only dust to dust, but darkness to darkness; the darkness of ignorance to the darkness of hell. And is not this a fearful state for you to continue in? What madness is it for you to do it, when Christ is daily inviting you to come to the light?

O ignorant sinners, why should you continue in your ignorance, more than those of your rank in other places, who can discourse most sensibly of the principles of religion, and the concerns of their souls, and can pray to excellent purpose?

Have you not rational souls as well as they? Have you not the same helps and advantages that they have, if you would but make use of them? Are you not as capable as they? You are as sharp and knowing about worldly affairs as others. You know well enough the rent of a piece of ground, the value of corn or cattle; but, alas! know nothing of the worth of your souls, of Christ and pardon to them. You are well versed in the art of ploughing, sowing, and reaping, and know the right seasons for them; but, alas! you know not your seasons of mercy. You know your almanack, the fairs, and changes of the moon, you know your story-books and ballads; and why might you not know your bibles as well, if you would employ the same parts and abilities to get spiritual knowledge? Have you not great plenty of the means of knowledge, if you would but attend them, and make use of them.

OBJECT. But I cannot read the bible, how shall I learn knowledge?

ANS. You are at a very great loss indeed, it is hard to get ignorant persons instructed that cannot read. You ought to lament your loss, and be the more in prayer for the Spirit of God to teach you, and make up that loss; and the more desirous to hear others read, and to wait upon the public catechising; and also, lay out yourselves with all care yet to learn to read.

OBJECT. But I am too old to learn.

ANS. Are you too old to seek after Christ and salvation? Will your age save you from hell and wrath, if you die Christless? will God spare old folk dying in ignorance, more than the young? Many have learned to read, who have been as old as you; were you but willing and desirous, you would soon conquer all difficulties. I have heard of some servants, who have been so fond to learn, that they have offered to masters or mistresses to quit part of their meat and fee, upon condition they would teach them to read. And, are not your souls as dear to you as theirs were to them?

OBJECT. It was my parents' fault that did not teach me when I was young.

ANS. Alas! that parents should be so cruel to their children when young! But, wilt not thou be merciful to thyself, because they are cruel? Their neglect will not excuse thine. As it was their fault that did not learn you in youth, so it is yours now if you remain in ignorance, and will be your eternal ruin if you continue wilfully so. Yea, you will thus not only bring your own blood on your head, but also the blood of your children and servants when you get families; for you will not be capable to instruct them yourselves, nor will you, in all likelihood, be at pains to cause others to do it; and so you will be guilty of the same neglect to your children, that your parents were guilty of to you.

OBJECT. But I am ashamed to be learning at this age.

Ans. It is indeed a shame for old people to be ignorant, but no shame to learn. Yea, though one foot were in the grave, and the other following, you should still be learning something for your soul. For, what is the world's shame and derision to that woful confusion of face that will befall the ignorant, Christless sinner at a day of judgment, and especially such as slight knowledge, and will not be at pains to learn? Read that fearful and thundering threatening, Prov. i. 26—28, "I will laugh at your calamity, when distress and anguish cometh upon you; when ye call upon me, I will not answer; when ye seek me early, ye shall not find me." Oh! these words threaten against the ignorant, who refuse to learn, "punishment without pity, misery without mercy, crying without comfort," and "torment without ease." O what is the cause, say you, of all that sad vengeance? See ver. 29, "For that they hated knowledge," &c. As then you love your own souls, and would escape eternal damnation, as you would honour God and his Sabbath, see that you learn to read, seek instruction, and wait carefully upon all the means of knowledge.

III. Earthly-mindedness doth greatly hinder the sanctification of the Lord's day; for, when the vanities of the world are entertained, they so possess the mind, that there is no room left for other thoughts. The thoughts of the world shut out the thoughts of God. The dust and smoke of this world so blind the eyes of many, that they cannot discern the beauty of Christ or holiness, though the brightest discoveries be made thereof this day in the ordinances. Thus, alas! Satan defeats the whole design of the gospel as to many; so that, though ministers tell them from God's word of their soul's worth, hazard, and only refuge in Christ, yet they are so hot in pursuing the world, they do not hear or think on what is said. This man hath his farm, the other his merchandize, the other his trade, to look after, Luke xiv. 18, so that there is no time in their lives, no room in their hearts left for Christ. It is in vain to tell many of securing a mansion or inheritance in heaven; they must have houses and lands on earth. It is needless to tell them of providing for their souls; they have their families to provide for: or to tell them of heavenly manna to their souls; they must have bread to their month. It is to no purpose to tell them of a way to get justice satisfied, or the debt of sin paid; they must have their debts paid to their earthly creditors. It is in vain to press them to seek the favour and friendship of God; all their care is to get the countenance of this or the other man, that can do them kindness. And so, upon these worldly considerations, Christ, the pearl of price, is slighted, the precious soul neglected, and Sabbaths and sermons are quite lost.

Again, it is a gross profanation of this holy day, for people to allow themselves to think upon their trades and worldly commerce, when they are in God's house. As Christ whipped the buyers and sellers out of the temple when he was on earth, so he will not suffer you to make the public assemblies of his people a place of merchandize, by thoughtfulness about worldly gain and profit. Your business in God's house this day is with the great God only, and therefore you must attend to nothing but his work and service. But, if you indulge worldly thoughts, you will provoke God, and mar all your public performances.

Be not like Martha this day, "careful and troubled about many things," things that will not avail you at the dying hour, or through eternity; but imitate Mary this day, sit at Christ's feet, mind the one thing necessary, and choose the good part which shall not be taken from you.

Moreover, consider how dangerous this evil is to the salvation of your souls. It may be said of worldliness, compared with other sins, as was said of Saul and David, when any one sin "kills its thousands, this slays its ten thousands." O what havoc makes it in the visible church! What Pharaoh said of the Israelites, Exod. xiv. 3, may well be applied to many professed Christians; they are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in. The world, like bird lime, clogs the soul's wings, that it cannot mount up to heaven. Many, like Lot's wife, set out fairly for the Zoar of heaven; but their hearts hanker after the Sodom of this earth, which caused them to look still back, back, till they perish in the way.

Again, consider what a vain and empty thing the world is, though obtained. It suits not the nature, nor satisfies the desires of the immortal soul. It deceives all its lovers, and in midst of sufficiency leaves them in straits; so that we ought rather to pity than envy a worldling, whose portion is so small, happiness so short, mistake so great, and misery eternal.

Think what folly it is to dig for dross with mattocks of gold, to bestow the precious affections of our souls on white and yellow clay! How monstrous is it to see a man with his head and heart where his feet should be! to see the world in the heart and on the throne, and Christ at the footstool! to see the world possessing God's room both week-day and Sabbath-day, and getting the service which is due to him alone! How many are they who, even on the Sabbath-day, worship the trinity of this world, mentioned 1 John ii. 16, more than the Trinity of heaven?

IV. Forgetfulness of God and Christ is a great evil, and greatly hinders Sabbath-sanctification. How can these sanctify the Sabbath, who never mind the Author nor the end of it? And, alas! there are too many who have nothing of God in their thoughts, either Sabbath-day or week-day, Psal. x. 4. 'Though the heart be still thinking, and hundreds of thoughts pass through it every hour of the day, yet God is in none of them. Strange! that every worldly trifle should find room in the heart, and God can find no place in it! What is the reason of this? You may see it, Rom. i. 28, "They did not like to retain God in their knowledge." Surely there is nothing in the world that we have so frequent mementos of, as of God: how can we look to the heavens, earth, flowers, or grass, without minding him? A very heathen could say, "Every blade of grass proves a present God." Or, how can we look to our bodies, but their curious structure should presently remind us of God? Yea, every time we breathe, every motion of our lungs, and beating of our pulse, should be a prick or spur to us to mind our Preserver; and in a special manner, on the Sabbath-day, every ordinance, every duty, every sentence, every word spoken by the minister, should remind us of God: but the matter is, the thoughts of God are burdensome to all that live careless and ungodly lives; they cannot think upon him, but they mind their Judge.

But, O Christian, consider what a sin it is to forget God, especially on his own day. If we ought to spend every day in the fear of God, Prov. xxiii. 17, much more the Sabbath-day. What ingratitude is it to forget him this day that minded us in our low estate, yea, minded us when we could not mind ourselves? The love of God in Christ should swallow up all our thoughts this day. When we seriously consider what Christ hath done for his people, one might think that Christ would never be one whole hour together out of their minds, but that they should carry him up and down in their thoughts and desires, that they should lie down with thoughts of Christ at night, and have him like a "bundle of myrrh lying all night betwixt their breasts," that is, in their hearts; and, when they awake, "they should be still with him:" that their very dreams in the night should be sweet visions of Christ, and all their words should savour of him.

V. Aversion to duty is another heart evil, that hinders the sanctification of the Sabbath. O how backward do we find our hearts to the duties of the Sabbath! how glad to put them by with any frivolous excuse! how unwilling to pay God a visit on his own day! We are slow to begin, and in haste to make an end; we are heavy while the duty is a-doing, and glad when it is done. Many are driven to their closets, as if they were going to the rack, or as if prayer were a penance rather than a privilege; they are constrained to it, to satisfy a natural conscience. It is rather a servile than a son-like performance. If conscience, like a task-master, did not lash them to their duty, they would never perform it. Many, they would rather toil their bodies whole days and weeks at the sorest labour, than spend one hour in secret upon their knees on the Lord's day. How sad and lamentable a thing is this! Is not God's company most desirable? is it not God's admirable condescension, and our highest honour, that such poor worms as we should be admitted into his presence? Are we not naturally desirous of acquaintance with great persons, and why so backward to acquaintance with the King of heaven? Is not the Sabbath a delight to God's people? and shall the work of it be a drudgery to us?

OBJECT. The duties requisite on this day are so many, they cost much difficulty and pains to perform them.

Ans. It is better to take pains, than suffer pains; better be bound with the cords of duty, than with the chains of darkness. The bonds of duty are not grievous; nay, they are our ornament and greatest freedom, Psal. cxix. 45, whereas Satan and the world's service is the greatest drudgery; there is sin in the work, and hell in the wages. Alas, that many will be at no pains for that which will bring eternal glory, but are content to be at great pains for that which will cost eternal pains! The drunkard, thief, and adulterer, run many hazards to serve the devil, and win damnation; they suffer bodily pains, want sleep and rest, and weary themselves to commit iniquity, "They draw iniquity with cords, and sin as with cart ropes," Isa. v. 18. They are yoked as it were, in the devil's plough or cart, and he makes them sweat and draw in his service. What bad work, sad wages, and a terrible master have they? Who would be hired by any wages to serve lions and tigers? Is not the devil a roaring lion? and, will you serve him that will devour and tear his servants both soul and body, after they have served him never so faithfully? Oh! shall the devil's servants out-strip Christ's servants in diligence and activity? Is there any master like Christ? Is there any work or wages like his? Was there ever any of his servants a loser at his hands? Will not his experienced servants tell us, that "wisdom's ways are pleasantness," and that Sabbath-days work is the sweetest recreation? Here they have the most pleasant walks, the most lightsome prospects, the choicest company, and the sweetest fellowship, Psal. xxiii. 2, 3; Psal. l. 23. There is heaven in holiness, and gain in godliness; no such gain or delight to be found elsewhere. Godliness is the most enriching trade in the world; God's people sometimes gain more by it on a Sabbath-day in one hour, in one sermon, one promise, one prayer, one communion-table, one spiritual breathing, than all the rich men of the shire are worth, put all their estates together. The world will not believe this; but sure I am, one return of prayer, one smile of Christ's face, one look of faith, one grape of Canaan, one glimpse of the promised land, the head of one Goliath, the death of one lust, the strengthening of one grace, which may be obtained in the duties of the Sabbath; any of these is an abundant recompence for all the pains we can be at in God's service this day; they yield more sweetness and content to the soul, than all the pleasures the world can afford: the smallest gleanings of spiritual joy are better than a whole vintage of carnal delights.

But what is all this to that eternal weight of glory which is treasured up in heaven, for rewarding the laborious servants of Christ? What can we do for so vast a reward? Had the Lord said to us, unless you be content to spend your days in some howling wilderness, quit all worldly riches and pleasures, pine away with poverty and want, give the fruit of your bodies, suffer martyrdom, or take a dip in hell, you shall never see my face in glory; surely there is none that knows what it is to escape eternal misery, and inherit endless happiness above, but would have been willing to accept of these conditions. How much more then, when he only requires us to accept of his Son as our surety, and love him, part with those sins that would damn us, and follow him in the pleasant ways of holiness; and to do all this in his grace and strength, for he sends none a warfare on their own charges? Say not then, I have no strength for so many duties as are required upon the Sabbath. Is there not enough in Christ for thee? Look with an eye of faith to the power and promise of God in Christ, and every new duty will bring new strength with it; "they that do those things shall live in them."

VI. Hardness of heart hinders the sanctification of the Sabbath. Why? hard-hearted sinners can have no delight in Sabbath-work; they are not affected by the world; they cannot prize Christ offered in the gospel; they are not capable of receiving the gospel-comforts. Oh how many such do every Sabbath appear before God! who can sit and hear the most terrible threatenings of the word, and curses of the law denounced against sin, and the sins they are guilty of; and yet be no more concerned than the seats they sit on, or the dead that lie under their feet. Mercies or promises do not allure them, judgments or threatenings do not alarm them. This is a sad case, and yet very common, and few sensible of it. Who is complaining of this plague, of heart-hardness, and laying their case before God, saying, "Ah! what shall I do with this stone in my heart?" A stone in the bladder, or kidney, is a woeful pain, but the stone in the heart is much more dangerous and deadly; yet who is pained with that, and crying to the Physician of souls to take it away, and give a heart of flesh?

O hard-hearted sinner, consider thy miserable condition while thou remainest in a fallen state under wrath. Many a stroke has been given thee by the hammer of the word to no purpose; many of the Spirit's motions hast thou resisted; many a knock hast thou despised. O tremble, lest God give thee over, and take no more pains on thee. A heathen Felix trembled, the devils tremble for fear of God's wrath; and will thy heart be unmoved? God calls you to flee from it, ministers call, mercies and promises call, judgments and threatenings call, the wounds and blood of Christ call; and will not thy heart be affected? "The voice of the Lord is powerful, full of majesty, breaketh the cedars, shaketh the wilderness," hath melted the hearts of thousands; and yet cannot it break thy hard heart? Thou hast mountains of unpardoned guilt lying on thee, and hast thou no feeling thereof? Remember, if you be not brought to feeling now, you shall be brought to it ere long, to your eternal cost and sorrow; if the word do not waken thy heart, it is like death will. When you begin to draw by the curtain of flesh, and look into eternity, you will then cry, Lord, what will become of me for ever? If you do not awake, then to be sure the first moment of your entry into eternity will bring you to your senses; the bitings of the worm of conscience will then make you feel; the stream of fire and brimstone will melt the hardest heart; the hammer of justice will then break the heart, which the hammer of the word could not.

O then, beg of God, with the greatest earnestness, that he may give you "the broken heart and a contrite spirit," that so you may have that acceptable sacrifice to offer to him, which he never yet frowned upon, Psal. li. 17, "A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." Augustine caused write this text over his bed when sick. Let us cry to God for it, who alone can give it. Gravel-stones men may remove, but heart-stones none can remove but God. We may as easily remove mountains as do this; yet we must use the means: and therefore, "look to him whom you have pierced," that you may mourn. Think much on the free love of Christ, and the bloody sufferings your sins did put him to. If Christ's love and blood will not soften thy heart, nothing will. Beg the Spirit of God to come and make application of the blood of Christ, the blessed Scape-goat; and then the adamant heart will dissolve. Cry, "Come, O Spirit of God, blow the fire of the word with thy own breath, and then it will melt hearts. Take this hammer in thy own hand, and it will break rocks. Lord, wound and heal; do the work thoroughly and effectually; begin it, carry it on and finish it: for if any of it be left for me to do, it will be eternally undone, and I will be lost for ever. Lord, complete this work, loose my bonds, thaw my affections, and draw my heart, and take eternal glory to thee."

VII. Hypocrisy and formality in duty is opposite to Sabbath-sanctification; for God requires heart-sincerity in every piece of worship and duty that we perform. Yet, O how many are they who give God no more but the outward man, and the service of the body! They "draw nigh to God with their lips" only; they pray so superficially, as if they were unwilling that God should hear them, and take away that lust which conscience forces them to pray against. They are so careless and irreverent in secret prayer, they would be ashamed if any saw them, or overheard them. A statue on a tomb, with eyes and hands lifted up, offers as good service as many; only it wants a voice. And what signifies the voice without the affections? A parrot may be taught to repeat some few words of prayer, but none will call that a prayer; so neither will God own thy formal words for prayer. It is speaking, and not praying, when the heart is wanting; he looks upon thy worship as no better than a stage-play. Many worship God as carelessly as if they were "praying to an idol," that neither saw nor heard them: nay, many heathens have worshipped their false gods, Jupiter and Mars, with greater seriousness and devotion than you do the great Jehovah, who made you and all the world. Why? the reason of all this is, all that many seek of religion is the name of it; and the outward form of it makes them pass under the name of good Christians among men. Though God sees their hypocrisy, yet man knows it not; and that is enough to them. But, O hypocrite, consider the day is approaching when God will unmask thee before all the world. As Paul said to the high-priest, Acts xxiii. 3, so may I say to thee, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall;" so as thy paint shall fall off, and thy inward rottenness appear to all. There will be no hiding of thyself among the crowd, no imposing on an all-seeing God. He can easily discern a traitorous Judas under a deceitful kiss, a ravening wolf under a sheep's skin, a murdering Herod under a pretence of worship, a hypocritical Pharisee under a broad phylactery. He can spy a dissembling devil under a Samuel's mantle, or when he would shroud himself among the sons of God; for neither the sophistry of men or devils can blind his eyes.

Again, let the hypocrite think on his folly, in losing both his heaven here and hereafter, in drawing down upon him both the hatred of the world, and the hatred of the God of heaven. The world hates him for his show of religion, and God hates him for his hypocrisy in it. Is it not lamentable folly in hypocrites to do something for Christ, and go some length in the way to heaven, and yet to lose both Christ and heaven for not going one step further? To be like that scribe, Matt. xii. 34, "not far from the kingdom of God," and yet never come thither? How sad is it to perish with heaven in view, and go to hell by the very gates of glory! The hypocrite's hope brings him to the shady valley, Job xvii. 14, but his candle goes out in that dark trance, and then he stumbles and falls for ever. It is sad to perish in the wilderness, when come to the very brink of Jordan, and in sight of the promised land; to make our voyage with a pleasant gale all the way, and shipwreck at the very mouth of the harbour; to come within a step of the gate, and die with our hands upon the threshold.

Lastly, Remember, as hypocrisy, if continued in, will certainly damn you; so it will provide a hotter hell for you than that of other sinners, Matt. xxiv. 51; therefore be wise in time, and study sincerity and uprightness of heart in all your dealings with God.

VIII. Wanderings of heart greatly mar the performance of Sabbath duties, especially hearing, praying, and praising. Jewish rabbies say, "That though on the Sabbath there was much flesh used for sacrifice in the temple, yet not so much as one fly was seen stirring there." So neither should there be a wandering thought or eye allowed, when we are about God's solemn worship this day in his house. What encouragement hath a husbandman to sow upon a highway, where every man and beast has free passage? No better is the heart of a wandering hearer. We may as well cast seed upon the waves of the sea, as preach unto such; for the good seed of the word is quite lost upon them. Think what an affront it would be to a king, to turn your back to him, or discourse with others, while he is speaking to you. The motions and postures of your souls are as visible to God, as the motions and postures of your bodies are to one another. Or, if a criminal were allowed to petition his prince for his life, would he break off at every sentence, and chase flies through the room; you would say, a remission were ill bestowed upon such a creature. O beware of such a ridiculous behaviour before the King of heaven, when you are addressing him for the life of your condemned souls. Would you have God to hear you, when you do not hear yourself? Can you think he will be mindful of you, when you are not mindful of yourself? Think, if your prayers were written down, and all your vain thoughts interlined, what incoherent nonsense would they be? would you not be ashamed to hear them all read over? would not the world cry, "Shame upon you for mocking your dread Sovereign with such an impertinent address?" O but thoughts are the same as words with God; nay, they speak louder in his ears than words do in ours, Amos iv. 13, "He declares unto man what is his thought." And David says, "He tells my wanderings."

Wherefore, when you enter this day into the sanctuary, or into your closets, shut the door of your hearts, so that worldly thoughts may not enter to trouble you. Lay solemn obligations and charges upon your hearts, that they wander not from God; bind the sacrifice with cords to the altar's horns; and if the birds of prey come by surprise down upon the sacrifice, then, like Abraham, Gen. xv. 11, "drive them presently away," and summon every thought to attend your main business. Retract every vain thought with a sigh, and chide with your hearts for vain excursions; check them as Christ did his drowsy disciples, What! cannot you watch with Christ for one hour? How then will you like to be engaged in heaven's work to all eternity, where there is no interruption?

Again, consider the uncertainty of your time for prayer. Had a criminal but a quarter of an hour allotted him to beg his life before an earthly judge, would he spend it in gazing upon the court and their fine clothes, or in asking some ridiculous questions? No, he would intreat and beg his life with all the arguments and fervency he were capable of. O sinner, when thou kneelest down to beg thy soul's life at the hands of the Judge of the quick and dead, thou knowest not if thou shalt have so long as a quarter of an hour for it; and wilt thou trifle it away? What if death surprise thee, and find thy heart wandering from God?

For remedying of this evil, besides what is said, study to overawe your hearts this day with a sense of God's presence and omniscient eye. A servant will not sport himself in his master's presence, but carry gravely. Did you believe that God's eye is still upon you, and notices all your thoughts, words, looks, and gestures; would you not be more circumspect than you are? May not angels, when they see what gravity and decency you observe in presence of a prince, and your carelessness and irreverence in presence of a glorious God, conclude you no better than infidels in midst of God's house? Consider then how solemnly you set yourselves in God's presence, when you attend public ordinances. It was the sense of this that made Bernard say, when he came to the church-door, "Stay here, all my earthly thoughts." But if they thrust in after you and come upon you, to divert you this day, pretending necessary business, as Nehemiah's enemies did to him when about the temple work, then give them such a repulse as he did, Neh. vi. 3, "I am doing a great work, I cannot come down; why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you?" and, like him, repeat this over and over, as they repeat their solicitations.

Again, get love to God and his ordinances; for what we love, that we fix our minds upon, be it gain, honours, or pleasures. David found love to the word a good remedy against wandering thoughts in time of reading or hearing it, Psal. cxix. 113, "I hate vain thoughts, but thy law do I love." Also, study to accustom yourselves to holy thoughts at other times; for a vain heart out of duty will be little better in duty. If your hearts be much set on the world at other times, your thoughts will be driving thither in time of duty, whether praying or hearing. But if they be habitually set upon Christ, then will your prayers ascend to him like a pillar of incense.

Moreover, be putting up frequent ejaculations unto God, to fix your hearts, and gather your straying thoughts. Pray with the Psalmist, Psal. lxxxvi. 11, "Unite my heart to fear thy name." Look to him that can stay "the raging waves of the sea," to stay the wandering thoughts of your heart.

Lastly, Consider how Jews and heathens may put Christians to the blush in this matter. We read of surprising instances of their fixed devotion in their acts of worship. It is a strange constancy and fixedness that is spoken of the Jewish priests at Jerusalem, that when the Romans broke into the city, and rushed into the temple ready to kill them: yet they went on with the rites of the temple, as if there had been no such thing. Also, strange was the fixedness of that Spartan youth, that held the censor to Alexander while he offered sacrifice, who suffered a coal, that fell on his arm, to burn his flesh, rather than by crying, or letting fall the censor, he should disturb that worship. May not these instances shame us, that have more light, for our unfixedness and inconstancy in the service of the great Jehovah?

IX. Wearying of the duties of the Sabbath is another evil we must guard against this day. O how many are there like those, Amos viii. 5, who say in their hearts, "When will the Sabbath be gone?" and with those, Mal. i. 13, "What a weariness is it?" Many weary as much of sermons, as if they were in the stocks all the while they attend them. O what would come of you, if Christ were as soon weary of calling, as you are of hearing! How many Sabbaths have you kept Christ standing and knocking at your doors, and he is not yet weary, for all your long deafness to his knocks, and refusing to open to him, but continues still to knock? O let this shame us out of our wearying to knock at God's door. Alas! a quarter of an hour in prayer wearies many of us. Is this the requital we give to Christ for all his love and patience? May not he say, "O believer, I did not soon weary of my bloody sweat in the garden for thee; nay, I was longer on the painful cross, than ever thou wast on thy knees in prayer, or meditating on my love and sufferings." O! should a believer ever weary of that subject? Those idolaters, Acts xix. 34, could "cry out with a loud voice for the space of two hours," and not weary in commending their idol, Diana; and shall we weary of hearing a sermon in commendation of Christ, for the space of one hour? O where are these animal spirits that men have in worldly business? where is that vigour and activity that many show in their bodily recreations, nay, in serving of their lusts? Many weary not to spend whole days and nights in drinking and gaming; but they grudge to give God one day for his worship, or so much as one hour of his own day. You weary not to provide for your bodies and present things, but soon weary to provide for your souls and eternity. You weary not to bestow time and pains to purchase a small estate; but you can spare no time nor pains to seek the kingdom of heaven. Many are quick enough about worldly things, but, like Dagon, they have no head to think, nor hands to act, when the ark is present. The Sabbath is a long and wearisome day to them. Some think both forenoon and afternoon of this day too much to be given to God; one of them may serve. Or they linger in coming to the church in the morning, as being glad to have a part of God's day and worship driven by ere they come; and not a few steal away before worship be ended; they would rather spend the day any way than in God's service. O sinner, who is the loser by this, but thy own soul? Dost thou think a Sabbath long, a sermon long, a prayer long? How long then will it be to be banished from God's presence, and lie on beds of fire through a whole eternity! You will weary eternally there, but it will not mend you. The doors are not open there, as the church-doors now are, to let you go in and out at your pleasure, (as some graceless persons do in time of divine worship,) no, you will find hell's gates shut with invincible bolts, and mountains of brass rolled to them; and there you must dwell and lie roaring, as prisoners of wrath for ever. Poor carnal wearying soul, canst thou ever think of going to heaven, to worship and adore God for ever without intermission, when so short a time of this work wearies thee now? To be sure, heaven would be a hell to thee in thy present unconverted state; then wouldst give never so much to be out of it again. wert thou in it.

But, O believer, how ill doth it become thee to weary of Sabbath-work here below, that professed to be preparing for that everlasting Sabbath above, the work of which hath no end? Wilt thou weary to spend one whole Sabbath here in serving Christ, who wearies not to spend many whole Sabbaths and years in serving thee? Consider how busy Christ is this day in heaven in thy behalf: though the Sabbath be a day of rest to us from our ordinary work, yet it is none to Christ; he is busy through the whole of it pleading and making intercession for thee, without fainting in this work; and wilt thou so soon tire to act for him? Doth he mind thee so constantly, and wilt thou so soon weary to think on him?

X. Sleeping or drowsiness, in time of divine service, is a profanation of the Lord's day, and hinders our profiting by the ordinances. Therefore guard against it. Many are watchful enough about the devil's service; they can spend whole nights in drinking, gaming, &c. without sleep; but cannot hold up their eyes half an hour in hearing a sermon. Consider what an evil custom this is, you who are chargeable with it, and reform it. How ridiculous were it for a man that came to the market to buy provision for himself and his family, to fall asleep in the market-place, and so miss his errand? Do you not come on the Sabbath, which is heaven's market-day, to the ordinances to get provision for your souls; and will you fall asleep in the mean time of the market, and so go home empty? What do you know but, while you slept, that truth was delivered that might have saved your souls? Will a man fall asleep at his food? and yet you sleep while the bread of life is breaking to you, and the waters of life are running by you. How sad is it, that the soul's mouth should at this time be clothed with drowsiness and asleep, that it cannot receive one crumb or drop? O how would a damned soul prize the opportunity that you sleep away! Remember it will not always last with you, the Sabbath and sermon will quickly come that will be your last; and who knows but this or the next may be it? If you thought you were going straight from the church to God's tribunal, would you not be more watchful in hearing? There is none can assure you but it may be so: however that be, I can assure you, you must shortly answer for every sermon you are present at. God will ask, where are the fruits of so many sermons? It will be a fearful item in your accounts—So many sermons slept away. How will you answer for it?

Again, consider how provoking this practice is to God. Would not a prince be displeased with a subject, if he should fall asleep while he is speaking to him? Would not a judge be angry with a criminal, if he should sleep when he were about to pronounce his sentence? And have you not to do with the “King of kings,” and “Judge of the world,” while you are hearing the word? Is not your life at the stake when you are hearing it? according to that word in Deut. xxxii. 46, 47, “Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day; for it is not a vain thing for you: because it is your life.” Remember what befel Eutychus when he slept in time of sermon, Acts xx., it almost cost him his life: God made him a monument of displeasure, for a warning to all sleepers: he got a sad fall, but you may get a worse—he fell to the ground, but you may fall to the lowest hell, and there you will not get a Paul to take you up, as he got. Your sin is more aggravated than his: it was midnight when he slept, but you sleep at mid-day; Paul had preached seven hours, but half an hour and less puts you asleep. You have cause to fear, lest God make you a monument of his wrath, or that he say, Sleep on, till the flames of hell awake you. It is truly a wonder how any can sleep at the worship of God, either in the church or family, and not dream of hell-fire in their sleep; for their danger is greater than they are aware of; Satan is very busy at such a time: while you sleep, he successfully sows his tares, Matt. xiii. 25, your sleeping time is a seed-time for the devil, and a spring time for lusts.

If you would remedy this evil, strive and wrestle against it, and pray for help to do it; go timeously to bed on Saturday's night, and see that you be temperate through the week; for they that wake much in the ale-house, will be fair to sleep in the church.

XI. Prejudices at preachers, and quarrelling with them for their plainness and freedom in reproving sin, mars the sanctification of the Sabbath, and your getting good by the ordinances. Some hear ministers, as the Pharisees heard Christ, with ill-will to them, and a design to catch advantage against them; they “would make a man an offender for a word.” Others are so fast asleep in sin, that they cannot endure ministers to thunder in their ears, or lighten in their eyes by plain and piercing sermons, because they disturb their rest. Asa was “wroth with the seer” upon this account, and “put him in prison;” so dealt Herod with John, and Ahab with Micaiah. Many, like Ahab, think that the minister has a pique at them when he reproves sin freely: “He never speaks good of me,” saith Ahab. O sinner, this is the wrong way; for when God wounds thy sin, and darts conviction into thy soul, thou shouldst thank the Spirit of God for his merciful visiting of thee, and lay open your lusts, and say, “Smite, Lord, with a deadly blow those enemies that would not have thee to rule over them; kill my lusts, and save my soul. Blest physician, wound and heal; cause these convictions end in my conversion here, and salvation hereafter.” An honest heart loves that sermon best that wounds his lusts deepest. He says to the word, or the minister, that stops his career in sin, as David to Abigail, 1 Sam. xxv. 32, 33, “Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me; and blessed be thy advice,” &c. If your eyes were opened, you would look on plain rousing preachers as your best friends in the world. If you were in hazard of burning or drowning by falling into the fire or water, would you be angry with one that will pull you out, and save your life, though he should wound you, or break an arm of you in the doing of it? Nay, you would think him your friend, and thank him for his kindness. And will you be angry with a minister for plucking you as a brand out of the burning, by denouncing wrath against sin, and telling your hazard in plain language?

XII. Slighting the offers of the gospel, and Christ tendered to us therein, is a great profanation of the Lord's day, and directly opposite to the design of it: yet, alas! it is a most prevailing evil among us. Christ calls, but we will not hear; he offers himself and his purchase, but we will not accept; he allures us with his mercy, but we will not turn to him; he oft waters us with the dew and rain of gospel ordinances, but little fruit follows: we are like the barren field, on which much cost is bestowed, but the crop is nothing answerable. How many Sabbaths are spent, and sermons preached, and no good done? At one sermon of Peter's, there were three thousand souls converted: but, alas! we fear there are three thousand sermons preached now, and not one soul brought in. Many times is the gospel net let down in vain: O that Christ would come and direct it to be let down on the right side of the ship! I shall endeavour briefly to lay before you the great sin and misery of rejecting Christ and the gospel offers.

1. It is against reason to refuse a remedy when in our offer; as for a wounded man to slight a physician, or a condemned man a pardon, none in his right wits would be guilty of this: nay, it is even self-murder; for he is as guilty of his own death that rejects a medicine, or tears a plaster from off his wounds, as he that cuts his own throat. Now, you know what a heinous sin self-murder is; yea, this is not only so, but it is soul-murder, which has a louder cry than any other murder, by so much as the soul is more precious than the body: you are afraid to shed the blood of others, O do not embroil your hands in the blood of your own souls.

2. It is the greatest affront and indignity that can be offered to the majesty of God and our Lord Jesus Christ. It is even called a "treading under foot the Son of God, and his precious blood," Heb. x. 28, 29, which is there reckoned a greater sin than the breach of all the ten commandments; it is a sin which neither heathens nor devils are guilty of. To "tread upon the Son of God," O monstrous guilt! who would be guilty of this? May you say, "Am I a dog (as Hazael said to the prophet) that I should do this thing?" Yea, every soul that slights Christ and his gospel-offers, doth it. How provoking must it be, to trample on God's most precious jewel, wherein he is highly delighted and well pleased, Matt. iii. 18, to loathe that which is most sweet unto God? What horrid ingratitude is it, to slight the remedy that the infinitely wise God hath been at so much pains and expenses in preparing for us, and which hath cost him more than the creating of ten thousand worlds would have done? a work upon which his heart is so set, and wherein he hath so displayed his glorious attributes and perfections; yea, a work which he prefers to all his other works: how criminal must it be to undervalue that? Again, what a slight must it be to the divine Majesty, to prefer the devil and lusts before him? When Satan and lusts knock, they presently find access; yea, the least whisper they make is hearkened to: but though Christ cry aloud, and lift up his voice like a trumpet in the gospel offers; yea, though he call, entreat, beseech, and complain, is disregarded, and finds shut doors. "What iniquity (may Christ say) do you find in me," that the devil and lusts should be preferred before me? Can they do for you what I can do? "Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish and unwise?"

3. Refusing Christ as offered in the gospel, is the great condemning sin of the world, see John iii. 19, 36; Heb. iii. 19. The ruin of sinners under the gospel, is laid at the door of this sin, as if there were none other charged upon them: and justly it is so; for if a malefactor were offered his life upon his kneeling and accepting the king's remission, if he refused to do this, it may well be said, that his refusal hangs him. O sinner, no other sin in the world, however great it be, would condemn you, if you were not guilty of this sin of slighting Christ: but this is the sin which binds the guilt of all your other sins hard and fast upon you; yea, it is the sin that binds up the hands of Omnipotency, that it cannot save you. Christ's merits, though infinite, cannot justify you, if you reject them; for the best medicine that ever was compounded cannot heal, unless it be applied.

4. Unbelief and slighting of Christ, tends to defeat the whole design of the gospel, and to render Christ's whole undertaking useless. For, what is it but a saying on the matter, You have no need of him; and, His death was to no purpose? May not Christ look with a grieved heart upon unbelieving sinners, and say, "I have gone a long journey, shed my precious blood, and suffered the pains of hell, to save sinners: but these say on the matter, I might have staid in heaven; I might have kept my blood in my veins; or, I died as a fool dieth. They give me no thanks for all my pains." O! sinners, consider what you are doing; would you go about to frustrate Christ's glorious expedition, or give him cause to repent of his death and bloody agony?

5. This sin brings on inevitable wrath and misery, Heb. ii. 3. As Christ hath cords of love, so he hath a rod of iron; if you break his cords, he will take his rod. If mercy manage it, it will but wound you; but, if justice take it, it will grind you to powder. O provoke not the Mediator to take his iron rod; for his vengeance is heavy. Though he be the meek "Lamb of God," and be clad with priestly garments, yet he hath "feet like brass, as if they burned in a furnace," both heavy and hot to trample on his enemies, Lev. i. 13, 15. If you refuse Christ, your misery is as inevitable as that of the devils. For they perish, because they have no Mediator; and you perish, because you will not have a Mediator. O why will you put yourselves in the same case with devils? Nay, your case in some respects, will be worse than theirs; for they never rejected a remedy. The most scorching corners in the fiery oven of God's wrath seem to be reserved for unbelievers, Luke xii. 26. The breath of his mouth, that before invited them, will eternally blow their fire, Isa. xxx. 35. Mercy itself will be incensed, and plead against them at the great day. You will be more excusable than the heathens: they will have something to say for themselves, "We never had an offer of Christ, we never once heard of him;" but what can you say for yourselves, who have had so many thousand offers, and so many knocks and calls every Sabbath to accept of Christ? You must surely stand speechless: there remains nothing for you but a "fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries." Yea, "it will be more tolerable for Sodom in that day of judgment, than it will be for you," Matt. xi. 22, 23. The sins of Sodom were so monstrous, that they made a hell upon earth. O what punishment must they have now, when the beginnings of it in this world were so terrible! If the punishment of the least sin will be intolerable in that lake, O what will the punishment of the Sodomites' horrid and unnatural sins be! Yet their case will be easy, in respect of them that have slighted the gospel: these will even gnash their teeth for envy of the happiness of a damned Sodomite. Nay, O gospel slihter, you will then wish a thousand times you had rather been living in Sodom, when fire and brimstone was rained from heaven on it, than have lived in Scotland, where manna was rained, and the light shined so abundantly! So much for inward sins.

OF OUTWARD SINS OF COMMISSION ON THE LORD'S DAY.

II. I come, in the next place, to caution you against outward sins, whereby the Lord's day is too commonly profaned.

1. Beware of the sins of the tongue. It is a most essential part of true religion, to govern the tongue aright. For, "if any man seem to be religious, (saith James,) and bridlenth not his tongue, that man's religion is vain." The tongue is a most unruly thing; and therefore the Psalmist treats it as he would do an unreasonable beast, Psal. xxxix. 1, "He keeps it in as with a bridle." God hath set a double hedge about this unruly member, both of the teeth and lips, (to show with what care we should keep it;) and yet how oft doth it break loose, notwithstanding of both? God hath also placed it betwixt the brain and the heart, that it might take counsel of both; and yet how oft doth it act, without advising with either the one or the other? God hath given us two ears, and but one tongue; to teach us to hear much, and speak little. "Be swift to hear, and slow to speak," Jam. i. 19, for "he that refraineth his lips is wise," Prov. x. 19; often have we cause to repent our speaking, but seldom our silence.

As we ought to watch our tongues every day, so especially on the Lord's day; for on this day we are forbid to "speak our own words," Isa. lviii. 13. Not only must we this day abstain from lying, swearing, reproaching, backbiting, &c., but also from all idle words, yea, from all such discourse as is unsuitable to the work of this day, though it might be lawful on other days. The hearts of men may be very much known by their Sabbath-day's discourse; for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." We guess by people's language what country they belong to. Is thy speech vain and worldly upon the Lord's day? It is a shrewd sign of a carnal, unrenewed heart; "Thou art a Galilean, thy speech bewrayeth thee." This is God's holy day, and he will have it sanctified by our whole man, and by our words as well as our actions.

"Set a watch then this day before your month, and keep the door of your lips," and strive to "season your speech with grace;" for you may profane the Sabbath by your words as well as by your works, and by vain words as well as by vile words. O then, what cause have we to lament the profanation of the Sabbath by vain and idle discourses, which is so common among us? If Christ should join himself to many this day, in their coming to and going from the church, as he did the two disciples going to Emmaus on this day, Luke xxiv. 15, 17, and ask, "What manner of communications are these which you have one with another?" Might not this question strike us speechless, and make us blush? Who can tell what day this is by many people's discourses? Jests, stories, and idle talk, are as common with them this day as any other. It was Plato's proposal, "That men's speeches at their meetings and tables should be written." If this were practised on the Sabbath, would it not put many to shame, to read over their words before them? But though men do not register them, yet, remember God doth it, especially on his own day, which he hath so much honoured. He has a book of remembrance to write down all that men say, as well as what they do, Mal. iii. 16. See what he saith, Matt. xi. 36: that scripture may cause us all tremble, and take heed to our words, while we have a day to live; "I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof at the day of judgment." O what long accounts will many have to clear for idle words on the Sabbath, besides on other days! And if they must account for idle words, how much more for ill and sinful words, for base lies, and bloody oaths? O the tongue is a world of iniquity! How shall we answer for it at God's bar, without timeous repentance, and fleeing to Christ for mercy? If you would have your tongues renewed, and to become as choice silver, to speak the language of Canaan on the Lord's day; then see to get sanctified hearts. Cleanse the fountain, that the streams may run clear; "wash your heart from wickedness, and let not vain thoughts lodge within you," Jer. iv. 14. Shut out vain thoughts, as well as vile thoughts: and, if they break in upon you this day, do as the ravished virgin under the law, cry out to God for help, and you shall not be held guilty.

Secondly, There are sins in action, whereby the Sabbath is frequently profaned by many.

1. Many encroach upon the Lord's holy day, and profane it by worldly diversions and recreations, and by seeking their pleasures in the fields, which I have handled already at some length. Others profane this holy day by making it a day of idleness, or a visiting-day among their friends and neighbours. Others by making it a reckoning day with workmen and servants. And many profane it by doing unnecessary servile work in and about their houses, which might either be done on the Saturday before, or delayed till Monday thereafter; such as the gathering pease, shearing of grass, cutting and shearing of kail, fetching in water, sweeping the house, drying of clothes, brewing of ale, and the like. These things not being works of necessity or mercy, but our own works, done for our worldly profit, or to indulge our carnal ease and pleasure, are certainly unlawful on the Sabbath, according to Isa. lviii. 13. Yet, alas! how is the Lord's day profaned by these practices in some places of the land! Let ministers do and say what they will, still many will be stealing a part of God's day for their servile work; and it cannot but be heinous and provoking in the sight of God, being done against so much light and manifold reproofs.

OBJECT. Why do you exclaim so against us on this account? we do no harm to any; we thank God we are not thieves, extortioners, drunkards, &c.

ANS. Nay, you are thieves, for you rob God, and steal from him that which is his proper right, for "the seventh day is the Lord's." You would be ashamed to be found stealing any of your neighbour's goods, and think you no shame to be found robbing God of his holy day? Is not sacrifice the worst kind of theft, stealing from God worse than stealing from man, the sins against the first table greater than the sins against the second table? Besides, they that begin thus to steal from God, may, ere all be done, come and steal from men too; for false to God, true to no man. Many a thief at the gibbet hath confessed, that he began his loose life and stealing with breaking of the Sabbath-day; that this was his leading sin, and the occasion of all the rest.

OBJECT. We are not singular, we do but what neighbours and others about us do.

ANS. You ought to be singular, and do more for God and your souls than others, if you would "enter in at the strait gate." God forbids you to "follow a multitude to do evil," Exod. xxiii. 2. The commonness of a sin doth not extenuate but aggravate it in the sight of God; for, the more common it be, it hath the louder cry in his ears for vengeance. God hath common plagues for common sins in this world, and a common hell for common sinners in the world to come. Think not, that your association with others, will anywise alleviate your torments in that lake below; nay, it will rather heighten them: for the more faggots are thrown into a fire, it will burn the more vehemently.

OBJECT. These things which we do are but little trifles, soon done, and do not hinder God's service on the Sabbath.

ANS. 1. Was not gathering a few sticks on the Sabbath as little? Yet we see how highly God resented it. Think no sin small which is committed against an eternal God, and his holy law. There is more evil in the least sin, than all the angels in heaven, or ten thousand worlds, can expiate; and, if its guilt or punishment due to it were laid upon thee, it would make thee gnash thy teeth eternally, and curse the day that ever thou wast born. Nothing less than the death of the eternal Son of God can make atonement for the least sin. Believe it then, that lesser sins, if known and reserved, will carry thee to hell as surely as greater sins; for, the less the sin be, the less temptation hast thou to commit it, and the less excuse for it. A small leak in a ship, kept open, will sink her, as well as a greater; a stab with a pen-knife will kill a man as well as a sword. If thou allowest Satan but the smallest grip of thy soul, he will pull thee to hell by it, even as a butcher can drag a beast to the shambles by one foot, as well as when bound by all-four. And, if Satan get thee to hell, he doth not much care by what sins thou goest thither, whether small or great.

2. God hath framed all his commands in infinite wisdom, and he best knows what is consistent with his own worship, and what is most for his own glory. It is presumptuous in any man to say, that this or that piece of our work on the Sabbath will be no hinderance to the service of God, seeing he himself hath said, "In it thou shalt do no manner of work." The Israelites must not gather manna this day, Exod. xvi. O might some have said, "Why? it will not hinder God's service; we gather it early in the morning, and so we will be at God's worship in time enough, and have all the rest of the day to serve him. Again, we need not travel for it; it lies round about the camp, and near our very doors; it will be no great labour: and, besides, we may have good thoughts in time of doing it." No, you must not be wiser than God; he hath set apart this day for his own use, and you must not cut and carve upon it.

In like manner, some excuse their walking or travelling upon the Lord's day: "O, (say they,) we can employ our thoughts profitably by the way." But, though you could do it, pray, can you undertake that your example shall have no ill effect upon others who are looking on you? What think you of that awful word, Matt. v. 19, "Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, (that is, shall make others break it by what he doth or saith,) he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven?"

3. Vanity and gaudiness of apparel is opposite to the sanctification of the Sabbath. Some dress up themselves this day in such vain attire, and undecent fashions, as tend to draw the eyes of others to gaze upon them, and so their hearts to wander from God and his worship. Think what guilt you hereby draw upon yourselves, of the sins of others as well as your own. The practices of some heathens may put many professed Christians among us to the blush. Valerius Maximus tells of a heathen young man, named Sparina, who was exceedingly beautiful; but observing that many fixed their eyes on him, and fearing the consequences of it, he disfigured his face, lest his beauty should prove a snare to others. May not this heathen condemn such, who are so far from disfiguring themselves lest they should prove a temptation to others, that they disfigure their faces by painting and patching, to seem more beautiful than God has made them, without fearing whatever the consequences of it may prove. Is not this a showing a dislike of God's workmanship, and a desire to mend it? Jezebel was infamous for this art, and no sober woman should desire to follow her fashion. A Christian should be so far from being proud or vain of his apparel, that the sight of his garments should humble him, and keep him in mind how he came to need them: was it not sin that stript man of his glory, covered him with shame, and put him to seek clothing to hide it? Would it not be distraction in a malefactor to pride himself in a stigma which he had got for a foul crime? Consider also the garments you are proud of, what they are: the beasts have the same naturally to cover them, and will you be proud of a beast's covering? It was the saying of a heathen to a vain gallant, "Why art thou proud of that which a sheep wore before thee?" Or, what though they be finer than wool? yet their original is no better, but rather worse: what are velvets, silks, and satins, but the excrements of a vile worm? and is that a matter to be vain of? Remember, that ere long God will cause thee to wear another suit thou wilt have small reason to be proud of; he will even clothe thee with worms and putrefaction. May not the thoughts hereof keep you humble, and teach you to come to the church gravely and decently apparelled? especially since you come into the presence of that God who resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble.

4. The institution of holy days is an encroachment upon the fourth commandment, and opposite to the sanctification of the Sabbath, which is the only day now appointed to be kept holy to God. What is it, but an usurping of Christ's legislative power, and a vilifying of the Lord's day, to set saints' days, or days of human institution, on a level with it, by obliging people to abstain from labour thereupon. The church hath no power to consecrate such days: nay, the apostles did it not: there is no word of their consecrating a day to Stephen the proto-martyr, nor to James whom Herod killed with the sword. Yea, it may be reckoned an idolatrous practice to consecrate days to saints and angels, and keep them to their honour for publishing their praise, and commemorating their acts, since this is a piece of worship that belongs only to God.

Lastly, Not a few in some parts of the country do profane this holy day, by their set cabals and drinking-meetings upon it, by reading profane books, and telling profane stories, by scoffing at religion and religious persons, and by many other acts of wickedness. Alas! what hellish madness is this, that some are given up to! It is even a riding post to hell, a dedicating God's holy day to the honour and service of the devil, a hanging out a flag of defiance against heaven, and declaring war against your Maker. It is the saying of one, "To keep the Sabbath in an idle manner, is to keep the Sabbath of oxen or asses; to keep the Sabbath in diversions and pleasures, is to keep the Sabbath of the golden calf. But to keep the Sabbath in drunkenness and lewdness, is the Sabbath of Satan, or the devil's holy day." O profane sinners, what a dreadful mark of wickedness is it, to dedicate God's day to the devil! You cannot possibly offer a greater affront and indignity to the God of heaven, than to serve the devil in the works of darkness, upon that very day which is solemnly consecrated to the honour and service of the great God. And, can you think that a jealous God will pass such an indignity, and take no notice of it? "Do ye thus provoke the Lord to jealousy? are ye stronger than he?" Will you fight against him that made heaven and earth with a word, and by a word can unhinge them again; yea, by the breath of his mouth can crumble you to dust? What are you in his sight, but as a handful of silly worms? and do you think to be able to wage war against the Almighty: no, no; be the combination never so strong, the rebels never so stout, the enemies never so numerous, he is fully able to master them, and will certainly do it, Prov. xi. 21, "Though hand join in hand, yet the wicked shall not be unpunished. O what cause have we to pity and pray for such heaven-daring sinners, and weep in secret places for their souls, who wilfully destroy themselves, and pour contempt on their Maker; who live as if either there were no hell, or were afraid it should be full ere they got thither; and who seem to long to be companions of devils, and damned spirits! The God of infinite mercy open the eyes and stop the career of such, before they be beyond the reach of mercy!

And, before I close, let me ask the breakers of the Sabbath, what they will answer to the Author of the Sabbath, for despising and abusing such a rare privilege as the Sabbath is? When the Lord calls you, poor sinful creatures, who deserve to be banished eternally from his presence, to come and enter into his rest, and refresh your souls with the views of his redeeming love, and enrich them with the treasures of his grace set open before you: O what a sin must it be for you to turn your back upon them, and go about to weary the Lord by your sins, when he offers sweet rest to you! O believe it, sirs, Sabbath-breaking is not such a light sin as many imagine; surely the day is very near when you shall be brought to think on these days you now misspend and make light of. O how will you then mourn for the loss of these precious Sabbaths which God gave you to find peace and rest to your souls in, when you shall have no rest night nor day, but the smoke of your burning and torment shall ascend for ever and ever! How will you mourn then to see Abraham's bosom afar off, and thousands at rest in it whom you hated, and where you might have been at rest as well as they, if you had not despised the rest of the Sabbath here below! It is said, Lam. i. 7, "Jerusalem remembered, in the days of her miseries, all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old; then the adversaries saw her, and did mock at her Sabbaths." So the days of your miseries approach, O Sabbath-breakers, when with sad hearts ye shall remember the pleasant ordinances and seasons of grace you had of old; and then the devils and heathens will mock at you for the loss of your Sabbaths! Why then should you go to add to the sins and miseries of your eternal state, the heinous guilt of abusing such a great number of precious Sabbaths, as God in his mercy now affords you for the saving of your souls!

AN EXHORTATION TO SANCTIFY THE LORD'S DAY.

I SHALL conclude this subject with a serious exhortation to all ranks, strictly to observe the Lord's day. Read and consider what hath been already said, and you will find many arguments for pressing this exhortation: nay, this is the scope of all that hath been said. But, that you may the more effectually be convinced of the excellency and necessity of this duty, I shall further subjoin these few motives.

I. The strict observation of the Sabbath is the most effectual mean for preventing atheism and profaneness, in regard that, by the frequent recurring thereof, the remembrance of Christ and heaven is still kept up, and sin and vice are kept under constant rebukes and disgrace. If it were not for the observation of the Sabbath, atheism and irreligion would quickly overspread the world: and there is nothing tends more to harden the heart, fear the conscience, and give loose reins to scandalous sins and outbreaks, than the profanation of the Sabbath. This (as hath been said) many malefactors at gibbets have confessed to have been the first beginning of their loose lives, and that which paved the way to their other wicked courses, and provoked God to leave them to fall into these heinous crimes which brought them to such fatal ends.

II. God's great goodness and gracious design in allowing you the Sabbath, lays you under strong obligations to keep it conscientiously: he gives it not for a penance, but a privilege. It is not that he may get advantage from you, but that he may give blessings to you. He hath not commanded the business of the world to cease every seventh day, because he is tired with governing the same, or to take any ease to himself; but it is that he may give rest to your bodies, and heavenly refreshment to your souls. Would you have Christ and the riches of his grace? Would you have your souls nourished, and weak graces repaired? Then keep the Sabbath, for it is God's weekly market-day; and a free market it is, wherein we may "buy, without money and without price," the richest commodities that heaven and earth can afford, even the bread and water of life for the lives of our souls, the wine of Christ's blood to cheer us, the gold of his grace to enrich us, and his precious eye-salve to enlighten us, and his white raiment to clothe and adorn us. Is this day so profitable to us, and will we not regard it? It is the soul's festival, a day of reaping and ingathering, and of laying up in store for the time to come. It is God's stated alms-day, or public deal day, wherein he scatters blessings and crumbs of the bread of life among needy souls. It is the queen of days, the dawning of glory, and day-break of heaven. It is the day for ascending mount Tabor, to see Christ transfigured before our eyes: and for getting to the top of Pisgah, to get a sight of the promised land. O then! what horrid ingratitude must it be to a good God to profane this blessed day, and slight God's unspeakable kindness, in allowing it to us for our souls' advantage?

III. The strict observation of the Sabbath is an excellent mean to sweeten both the thoughts of death and heaven to us.

1. As for death, a retiring from the world once a week, will prepare us to welcome our final removal from it the more cheerfully. But they who think it hard to leave their worldly concerns for a day to worship God, when they expect to return to them on the morrow; what a hard pang must it be for them to part with them altogether at death, never more to come back to them?

And this we must all shortly do, whether we will or no. But to a conscientious keeper of the Sabbath, the parting with the world will not be such a hard task.

2. It will also sweeten the thoughts of heaven to us; for the work and comforts of the Sabbath below, are the foretastes of the employments and enjoyments of the everlasting Sabbath above. And they who delight in the Sabbaths on earth, (which are the days of heaven, and typical resemblances of it,) cannot but rejoice in the forethoughts of celebrating the eternal Sabbath above, in the immediate fruition of God's presence, and beholding him as he is for evermore. But the thoughts of heaven can be nowise pleasant to a Sabbath-breaker; yea, it would be an uneasy prison to him. For, if it be a penance to him to be a few days in God's worship now, what a punishment would it be to him to be engaged in this work for ever?

IV. Consider who it is that requires you to sanctify the Sabbath, even that good and gracious God who giveth you all things richly to enjoy; that God who giveth you your being, your breath, your health, your food, and all earthly comforts. O how bountiful is he to the sons of men! he gives you the sun in the heavens to shine upon your bodies, and the Son of his love to die for your souls. He allows you six days for your profit and pleasure, he reserves one for his glory and service; and will you not frankly give him his one day, when he is so liberal to you? Say then to your vain companions, when they would tempt you to profane the Lord's day, as Joseph to Potiphar's wife, when she tempted him to sin, Gen. xxxix. 9, "My master hath not kept back any thing from me but thee, because thou art his wife; how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" So say you, God, the sovereign Lord and Master of the world, hath kept back no time from me, but one day, because it was his; how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?

V. A conscientious keeping of the Sabbath, disposes the soul the more for the service of God all the week over. If your soul be in a good frame on the Sabbath, it will prosper the better all the week for it. Your conscience will be the more tender, your thoughts the more spiritual, and your affections the more lively. If you be in the mount with God on the Sabbath, the face of your conversation will be fair to shine in holiness through the week.

VI. Our regard to the Sabbath is a trying test of the state and frame of our souls, whether we be spiritual or carnal, love God or the world most. It tries also the conditions of our graces, whether they be waxing or waning, in a prospering or decaying state. Hence God frequently calls the Sabbath a "sign betwixt him and his people," Exod. xxxi. 17; Ezek. xx. 12, 20. And indeed our conscientious keeping and sanctifying of the Sabbath is a sign to us several ways.

1. It is a sign of God's sanctifying our hearts, and an evidence of a good work wrought in us by the Holy Spirit.

2. It is a clear sign to distinguish us from the unsanctified and profane people of the world.

3. It is a sign of our having a conscientious regard to all the other commandments of God; and all observing persons will find this sign to hold in their daily experience. If you keep not this commandment of sanctifying the Sabbath, it is a sign you will little regard all the rest. If you serve not God on his own day, you will make little conscience of serving him on the following days of the week; but, on the contrary, if you worship God sincerely on the Sabbath, and regard this holy day, it is a token you will regard all other duties of religion. Let us observe these very noticeable words of God, Jer. xvii. 24, 26, "If ye hallow the Sabbath-day, to do no work therein: then shall they come from the cities of Judah, and all other places, bringing burnt-offerings, meat-offerings, incense, and sacrifices of praise, unto the house of the Lord;" that is, the church of God and true religion shall flourish, and the name of the Most High be exalted in the world. And, indeed, for my part, I despair ever of seeing Christianity and reformation considerably advanced in the world, till once the Lord's day come to be highly esteemed, and strictly observed: for still it is to be seen, wherever religion flourisheth in the power of it, there it is that most conscience is made in the observation of the Sabbath.

4. The conscientious keeping of the Sabbath is a sign betwixt God and his people, in respect it is a token of a good understanding and correspondence betwixt him and them, that controversies are removed, and peace and friendship maintained. To whom is it that God manifests most of his gracious presence, and the emanations of his special love? Surely it is to those who have the Lord's day highest in esteem, and who are the most strict and careful observers of it. Upon all which accounts,

Lastly, The Spirit of God makes this duty a sign and character of the blessed man. For, Isa. lvi. 2, (speaking with a special eye to the New Testament times,) he saith, "Blessed is the man that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it."

O Christians, would you be blessed indeed: Then sanctify the Lord's day, by sincere worshipping your Creator, who this day made light first to shine; and honouring your Redeemer, who this day rose from the grave, and completed the work of your redemption. As the angel said to the woman that came to the sepulchre, Matt. xxviii. 6, "He is not here, he is risen, as he said; come, see the place where the Lord lay." So say I to every true lover of Christ, "He is not here, he is risen; come, observe the time when the Lord rose." Observe it to his honour and praise, and he will surely bless you, and make you glad with the light of his countenance. There was never any who truly observed this command, but will say, that rare and blessed are the fruits which are to be reaped from this blessed duty.

Would ye then share of these fruits, and please God in keeping his Sabbath? Then take the following advices:

(1.) Remember to honour and glorify God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, upon this holy day, by ascribing to each person of the blessed Trinity the glory of his proper work. As, 1st. Ascribe to the Father, the glory of his power, wisdom, and goodness, in creating the world for our accommodation, and contriving our recovery when we had lost ourselves, and, for an example to us, resting on the Sabbath after he had reviewed his work with delight. 2d. We ought to glorify the Son this day, by ascribing to him the honour of undertaking and carrying on the work of our redemption, by his incarnation and death, and by his rising from the dead on the third day, now set apart for the Lord's Sabbath. 3d. We are to glorify the Holy Ghost, by ascribing to him the honour of applying the purchased redemption to believers, in his work of regeneration and sanctification, which he began in a glorious manner, by that wonderful effusion on the church in the day of Pentecost, being also the Lord's day. In this manner we ought to glorify God, giving honour to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, upon this holy day, if we would keep the Sabbath acceptably to the Lord.

(2.) Let us mind the direction of the Holy Ghost, in Isa. lviii. 13, with respect to the keeping of this day, to wit, to "call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and honour him, not doing our own ways, nor finding our own pleasure, nor speaking our own words." Which direction teacheth us, that the best way to prevent Sabbath-breaking, and to honour God on his own day, is to "call the Sabbath a delight." O that we knew what this meaneth!

QUEST. When may we be said to call the Sabbath our delight?

ANS. 1st. We call it our delight, when we rejoice at the approach of the Sabbath, and make due preparation for it; and when we solace our souls, in the joyful expectation of communion with God on his own day, saying with David, Psal. xliii. 4, "Then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy." 2d. When we give the Sabbath an early welcome, and stir up ourselves to seek God betimes upon it; like David, Psal. lxi. 1, "O God, thou art my God, early will I seek thee." 3d. When we are dissatisfied with these things that would hinder us from the right keeping of the Sabbath, and are grieved that we can keep Sabbaths no better. 4th. When we esteem every minute of Sabbath-time to be most precious, and are careful that none of it be wasted away; but order matters so wisely, that one duty of the Sabbath may not jostle out another; that is, to be so early in our closet devotion, that the closet may not hinder family duties: and so to perform these, that they may not encroach upon God's public worship. 5th. When we are concerned to have all belonging to us to keep the Sabbath as well as ourselves, and glad to see this holy day regarded and honoured by all about us. Then it may be said, we "call the Sabbath a delight."

Now, after all I have said, let me come in the end, in the name of that great Lord who instituted the Sabbath for his own glory, and the good of men, earnestly to exhort, beseech, and obtest, all ranks and degrees of persons, whether they be parents or children, masters or servants, magistrates or people, young or old, to put all honour and respect upon this holy day; to sanctify it as God requires, and abstain from all worldly employments and recreations upon it. Do not grudge your Maker his one day of seven, but be willing to dedicate it wholly to his worship and service. O how do you think to spend a whole eternity in God's holy presence, and in holy, spiritual exercises, if you cannot bring yourselves to spend one day in a week in holy work? Again, see that you be impartial in his service; be as willing to hear what God saith to you from his word, as you would have God to hear what you say to him in prayer. Some are all for prayers, as if they were only to tell God what they would have from him; but care not for sermons, or for hearing what God requires and expects from them. But, if you would have God to hear your prayers when you speak to him, you must diligently hearken to his word when he speaks to you. It is by hearing the word upon the Lord's day, that God hath converted many thousands to himself. The Sabbath is a merciful institution to lost sinners for their salvation, and many have been, and will for ever be thankful for it. For hereby they have been led to make proper stands in life, and to review their bypast actions, so as to order their course more wisely for the time to come; which they had never done, if they had not been led to a religious retirement on the Lord's day.

Seeing this holy day is such a blessing and privilege to the world, let me entreat parents, masters, magistrates, and all who have power, to exert it for promoting the keeping of it. You are not only to sanctify the Sabbath yourselves, but also you must do your utmost that those under you do it likewise. This you are bound to by the Lord's express charge in the fourth commandment, where it is said, "Thou, thy son, thy daughter, thy servants, the stranger within thy gates;" importing, that you are to use your power and influence over all within your gates, to cause them observe the Sabbath, and keep them from profaning it; lest God impute their sins to you, as to Eli in the like case, for not using his power to restrain them. It is not indeed in the power of persons in authority to make all those religious who are under their jurisdiction; but it would put them in a likely way of being so, to keep them from such things as would hinder the religion of that day, and cause them attend the means of instruction; and also to tell them in private of the rest and happiness of the world to come, purchased by Christ, which the right keeping of the Sabbath leads unto. This ought to be the great care of parents with respect to their children in younger years. It is one of the first things that children are capable of, namely, to distinguish this day from others. And then they should be taught to lay aside their other days' diversions, even before they are capable of godly exercises; and thus they are gradually to be inured to Sabbath-keeping, as the beginning of wisdom. This method God took to introduce religion into the world. It was his first appointment and institution, to rest on the seventh day, and to sanctify it, Gen. ii. 3, as if he designed this to be the foundation and beginning of all religion. Let all heads of families follow this great example.

Likewise, we see God requires masters to take care that their servants, and all within their gates, keep the Sabbath. And, indeed, it is highly their interest and wisdom to do so; for, if you be careful that your servants do their duty to God, God will take care that your servants do their duty to you. In like manner, the civil magistrates, who are the fathers of cities and states, should use their power over all within their gates or jurisdiction, to cause them observe God's holy day. We see Nehemiah threatened bodily punishment on the men of Tyre, for breaking the Sabbath, Neh. xiii. 21. And Jeremiah, by God's appointment, calls upon the princes to see that the Sabbath be not profaned, and that upon their highest peril, Jer. xvii. 19, 25, 27; and hence it is, that our kings and parliaments have made so many excellent laws against the profanation of the Sabbath. May God put it into the hearts of those who ought to be preservers and executors of laws, to put them in execution! This would tend much to the glory of God, and the welfare of nations, cities, and families. But lastly, Let me exhort all in inferior stations, both young and old, to observe the fourth commandment, as they regard the salvation of their precious and immortal souls in the eternal world, and the peace of their consciences when they come to lie on a death-bed, which they should be looking out for every day. Let me address both young and old upon this head.

I. As for you that are young, I entreat you to "remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy." Improve this day with all care and earnestness; for it is the day wherein poor sinners usually begin their acquaintance with God, and conversion to him: and the proper season for this work is the time of youth; for now the heart is most tender and pliable, and sooner melted for sin, than afterwards, when you come to greater age: for, the longer you go on in sin, the heart will turn the harder, and the conscience more seared. The longer you forget God, the more estranged you will grow, and unwilling to return to him. The branches of a tree, while young, may be bowed and trained up any way; but when they are old they will not ply.

Again, consider, that the sooner you begin to sanctify the Sabbath, and be serious about your souls, God will love you the better. See how he remembers the kindness of youth, Jer. ii. 2 "Thus saith the Lord, I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness," &c. He loves those who come in at the first sound of the gospel, far more than rebels, who stand out till the last, that they can do no more. The fewer calls and invitations you resist, the more kindly will you be accepted of God: he loved a young Abijah, a young Josiah, a young Timothy; and John is called the "disciple whom Jesus loved," John xiii. 23, because he was youngest and earliest converted. See how affectionately Paul salutes Epenetus, by the title of his "well-beloved," because of his being "Christ's first fruits in Achaia," Rom. xvi. 5. And if Paul loved him so much, to be sure Christ loved him far more.

Moreover, do not think that justice will spare you, if it find you in sin, and out of Christ, because you are young. Presume not upon mercy upon this account; remember that threatening, Psal. lxxviii. 21, "God shall wound the head of his enemies, and the hairy scalp of him that goeth on still in his trespasses." You have no ground to think that he will spare you till you be old and bald-headed: no, he may even take you by the hairy scalp while you are in your youthful vigour and freshness, and punish you, as he hath done many others before you.

O young folk, if you would mind your souls, and sanctify the Sabbath in the days of youth, take these few directions:

1. Look always on death as near, and within a few steps of you. Alas! many young folk think it as improper for them to be thinking on their graves, as to think of going to bed at noon: their sun is high, and it is a long time to night; they look on death at forty or fifty years' distance. O what folly is this! Do you not see graves of your length, and skulls of your size, in the church-yard? Yea, do you not see twenty die young, to one that lives to old age? Let death and eternity be then the frequent subjects of your meditation on the Lord's day.

2. Think much this day upon your vileness and misery by nature; that you are "children of wrath, heirs of hell, enemies to God, and strangers to Christ and the covenant of grace; yea, servants to sin, and bond slaves to the devil:" for the prodigal never thought of turning to his father, till he saw himself in a lost and undone condition.

3. Think much on Christ's fitness, fulness, and suitability for all your wants and maladies. In him you may find a remedy for whatever troubles you. Is it guilt? here is pardon. Is it great sins? here is a Redeemer's blood that cleanseth from all sin. Are you condemned? here is sufficient righteousness to justify you. Is pollution and filthiness your fear? here is a deep and open fountain that runs continually. Are you chained prisoners? here is liberty. Are you drowned in debt? here is a ransom and surety. Are you diseased? here is balm. Are you poor? here is fine gold. Are you dead? here is the resurrection and the life. Are you starving? here is the manna and the fatted calf. Are you weak, and unable for duty? here is all-sufficient grace and strength. Yea, he "is able to save them to the uttermost that come to God by him:" and particularly, he says of little children, "Suffer them to come unto me; and, him that cometh (saith he) I will in nowise cast out."

4. Let children and young folk carefully attend ordinances this day in the church; lie close by the pool side, till it please the angel of the covenant to come and put you in. Study to remember what you hear; and give an account thereof to your parents when you come home.

5. Early acquaint your souls with the scriptures; read much of them this day, and meditate on them, Psal. cxix. 9, "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? by taking heed thereunto, according to thy word." How came Timothy to be so well acquainted with Christ and his way? but because "from a child he knew the scriptures," 2 Tim. iii. 15.

6. Be much this day in prayer; for the prayers of young folk are very pleasant music in God's ears. It would be both very pleasant and profitable, if children of the same family would take some time this day to meet, and read, and pray together; for so the examples, and hearing of one another, would be mutually helpful, and stir them up to a concern about their duty. It is the fault of parents, that do not put them on to this practice. If children did thus begin early to the service of God, it would become habitual and delightful to them afterwards. But, alas! instead of this, many parents let their children run and play through the streets, and in the church and church-yard, on the Sabbath, without restraint. But, let such parents remember, that though children die in their iniquities, yet their blood God will require at their hand one day.

II. I shall close with a word to aged people. You that are old men and women, give ear to what I am to say. Consider how many Sabbaths you have misspent, and mourn for it. In threescore years' time you have above three thousand Sabbaths to reckon for, and if God "lay judgment to the line, and righteousness to the plummet," you will not be able to answer for one of them. O humble yourselves deeply before God, and employ Christ to clear your accounts for you. Put on resolutions in his strength, to improve time better for the future, and particularly the Sabbaths which God may yet allow you, for securing an interest in Christ, and making provision for long lasting eternity. Have you not great need for it? Alas! there are many old persons who have all yet to do. Their glass is near run, and their sun is at the setting; and yet they have their work to begin, and their journey to set out for; though they have lived threescore years in God's world, yet they never spent three hours of all that time in sincere serving of God, or providing for endless eternity. They never communed with their hearts, thought on their ways, shed a tear for sin, or fell on their knees to cry, "Lord, what shall I do to be saved?" What hope shall I have in a dying hour? Where will I take up my lodging through eternity? How many old persons are grossly ignorant of the first principles of religion? Yea, many children of five or six years old will far outstrip them. O what is the reason of all this, but the neglect and misspending of the Sabbath-day, and the contempt of the means of grace and knowledge which you might have enjoyed thereupon? Well then, what resolve you to do for the time to come? Have you not forgotten God and Christ, and neglected your souls and heaven long enough? Or, will you do it to your dying hour? Are you content to go to the grave without Christ, and without hope? O what a sad sight is it, to see gray hairs and gracelessness meeting together! to see men put to look through their spectacles, but never minding to look to their Saviour! to see them leaning on their staves, but never thinking of relying on Christ for salvation! to see age forcing them to bow and bend their bodies to the earth, but yet never bowing a knee in secret to beg repentance! O what a shame is it to live fifty or sixty years in the world, without a fervent prayer, or penitent tear for sin! to live without God, without Christ, and without faith! O what will you answer for the fearful abuse of God's long suffering patience! Old sinner, better thou hadst died when a child, or when first born, than to have lived so long, and go to hell at last. If thou diest old in age, and old in sin, what a hot and fiery hell mayest thou look for at last! O how many Sabbaths and sermons!

how many calls, counsels, and exhortations, have you to answer for! Remember, you will be called to an account for every year, month, day, and hour, you have lived: and, what account can you give of fifty years spent in sin, sixty years lived in a Christless and prayerless state, or three thousand Sabbaths trifled away? Will you be persuaded then to flee to Christ, as thy surety and cautioner, to clear thy accounts, and pay thy debts before the door be shut; and improve the time and Sabbaths which remain, for God's glory and your precious soul's advantage? And to him, who can effectually persuade and enable you so to do, be praise for ever. Amen.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE SABBATH-DAY.

MEDITATION I.—ON THE BURIAL OF CHRIST,
FROM JOHN XIX. 40, &c.

ON our Friday, Christ was crucified and laid in the grave; on our Saturday, which was the Jewish Sabbath, Christ lay dead and buried all that day in the grave; on the Sunday, or first day of the week, Christ rose from the grave.

Observe, 1. How low Christ did humble himself for us; he was content not only to become a man, but a poor man of sorrows for us, yea, a deserted man, a condemned man, a dead man, and lie as a dead corpse in the earth for us. This is the lowest step he could descend, Psal. xxii. 15, "Thou hast brought me into the dust of death."

2. Observe how he humbled himself in his burial: 1st. He was not buried by friends, but strangers. 2d. Not with heralds, escutcheons, hearse, and other solemnities, as became the Prince of the kings of the earth, but in a very private, hasty manner. 3d. Not in the sepulchre of the kings, and of his father David; not in the burying-place of his ancestors, but in the sepulchre of a stranger. Behold! how poor was the Heir of all things! While he lived, he had not a house of his own where to lay his head; and when he was dead, he had not where to lay his body. O deep humiliation! Was he who lay in the Father's bosom from all eternity, now laid in the bosom of the earth? O wonder at it, that he was willing to stoop so low, to ransom our souls that were sunk as low as hell by sin! O! men and angels can never enough admire this love of Jesus! that he who wore the keys of hell and death at his girdle, should be content to be locked up in the prison of the grave, and to be arrested there this whole day, for our debt, by divine justice.

3. Observe how long Christ the Lord of life continued death's prisoner, the grave's captive; how long death had power and dominion over him, even to the third day. O how did devils triumph this day! We have not only bruised his heel, but his heart also, and behold he lieth in dust. How did wicked men rejoice! how did death domineer over him! Men have brought him into my territories, and there I hold him bound with my fetters. Now would his enemies say, Is this the light of the world, that lies so low in the land of darkness? Is this the teacher of the way to heaven, that cannot now move his tongue, or speak a word? Is this he that raised others from the dead, that lies himself among the dead? Well, but the triumph of these wicked ones was but short. Christ rose and put them all to silence.

4. Observe Christ's love, that was content to let devils insult and triumph over him for a while, that they might not triumph over you, O believer for ever. He was humbled to lie in the grave for a while, that you might not lodge in hell for ever.

5. Observe, Christ lay buried this day, that he might bury all the elect's sins for ever out of God's sight, that they might never rise against them in judgment. O what comfort is this, O believer! thy sins are buried, and shall never appear against thee to thy condemnation.

6. Observe, Christ lay buried this day, that he might bury the Jewish seventh-day Sabbath, with all the rest of their Levitical types and ceremonies. Christ has taken off that yoke from our necks, glory to his name.

7. Observe how Christ lay buried this day, that he might sweeten the grave, warm and perfume that cold, unpleasant bed for believers to lie in. The grave was once a part of the curse denounced against fallen mankind, and it is so still to sinners out of Christ, Gen. ii., "Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return." The grave had the nature and use of a prison, to keep the bodies of sinners against the great assizes, and then to deliver them up to the hands of a great and terrible judge. But Christ, by lying in it all this day, has turned it from a prison to a bed of rest, Isa. lvii. 2, "He shall enter into peace; they shall rest in their beds, each one walking in his righteousness." Why? as Christ there did rest in hope, so shall believers be partakers of his hope. See Psal. xvi. 10, "My flesh shall rest in hope." So Prov. xiv. 32, "The righteous hath hope in his death."

Exhortation.—As ye would partake of the virtue of Christ's lying in the grave, see that ye get union with Christ now by a true faith; death nor the grave will not loose this union, it is indissoluble. O believer, the grave shall be a sweet, privileged place to you; sin nor guilt shall not lie down there with you. Sin is a bad bed-fellow, but a worse grave-fellow. That is a terrible word, Job xx. 11, "His bones are full of the sins of his youth, which shall lie down with him in the dust." It shall not be so with you. No, Christ has freed you of guilt, and has made your bed to sleep in; it is like a soft bed in a quiet room, where the weary shall be at rest. Christ himself keeps the keys of the room, and watches by you while you lie sleeping there, and will be ready to open the door to let you out again. "I have the keys of death," Rev. i. 18. None can take them out of his hand.

world which he gave out; because the majesty of heaven would never have given an impostor such glorious credentials as a resurrection from the dead; a work which nothing but omnipotency could accomplish.

2. If Christ rose from the dead, all the promises of the gospel, relating to the enjoyments and blessings of a future life, will certainly be fulfilled to them; and whatever Christ has said may be depended on, and trusted to, as certainly to come to pass.

3. It is true indeed, the Christian religion is so framed, as in all respects to be admirably serviceable to the ends and purposes of a temporal felicity; for the devout and awful regard to God, and a future life, and those principles of generous love and charity, which it tends to inspire mankind with, contribute highly to the good order and peace of the world. If pride and envy, if covetousness and ambition, if malice and revenge, if falsehood and deceit; if such passions as these are the true causes of all those calamities and misfortunes which men groan under, then the gospel, which strikes so directly at all these, even in men's tempers and hearts, as well as in their outward conversation, doth lay the surest foundation possible for a quiet and comfortable life in the present world.

Yea, the gospel of Christ strengthens the obligations of the law of nature; it furnishes men with far nobler motives to perform all the duties of that law, and threatens severer punishments for the breach of it; and thus it highly conduceth to the welfare of society and government.

4. The true foundation and origin of atheism or deism is a man's coming under a stated resolution to endure no curb or restraint in the prosecution of his design of being happy in this world, by the enjoyment of its pleasures; and therefore the scripture or the gospel, which pretend to abridge men of this liberty, and would oblige them to a strictly abstemious and self-denying life, and a ready submission to all sufferings, which the power and malice of the world may at any time inflict, for the profession of it must, of course, be rejected as any divine revelation, and made the mere invention of a set of crafty designing men, who were fond to be the heads of a new religion, and of bringing the world to submit to their impositions.

5. As for the religion of Mahomet, he was a man of a vicious, profligate life; and he framed it to serve a carnal, worldly interest; it was planted in the world by force and violence, and never offered any other arguments to persuade men of the truth of it, but the sword and heavy taxes and exactions. But, with respect to the Christian religion, nothing of this kind can be pretended.

MEDITATION II.—ON THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST, FROM 1 THESS. I. 10, "WHOM GOD HATH RAISED FROM THE DEAD."

THE resurrection of Christ from the dead is a fundamental article of our religion, and serves to support all the rest. For,

1. If Christ rose from the dead, then he was a person sent from God, to do that work in the

6. The law of nature is a divine impression on the reasonable nature of man, by which he is informed what is good and evil, and directed how to behave himself, as a rational creature ought to do. Now, the gospel adopts and enforces this law with the strongest arguments and considerations.

7. Many who are baptized into the name of Jesus Christ, do treat him in such a manner, as Mahometans, who are his professed enemies, would abhor to do. The Mahometans do honour him with the venerable titles of the Word and Power of God. And though they will not allow him to be so great a prophet as Mahomet, yet their prophet has taught them so much respect, and so high an esteem for ours, that, should they be witnesses to the affronts some offer him here, they would be ready to revenge them upon them.

8. Some matters of fact may be so convincingly made out by the testimony of others, as to bring men to a perfect assurance of the truth of them, so as there can be no room left to suspect any fraud or deceit therein. For if we must not thus believe the testimony of others, there could be no administration of justice in the world; for legislators and governors cannot be in every place to observe what is done by every person, but must depend on the testimony of others in dispensing rewards and punishments to good and bad, according to their several merits. Again, all our civil interests and privileges depend on this kind of testimony; for how can we justify our claim to houses, lands, goods, or effects, which we come to possess by virtue of birth or parentage, will or testament, disposition or sale, but by the testimony of others? Again, the refusal of this testimony would cut off all kind of history, geography, or chronology, as useless, or as mere fable and romance. We should not believe there was ever any such thing as the Roman empire, or Roman emperors; we should not believe there is any kingdom or city in the world, but such as we have seen with our eyes.

9. All sects and parties of men, since Christ's days, have granted that there was such a person as Jesus Christ, who was born at Bethlehem in Judea, in the reign of Augustus Caesar, and crucified at Jerusalem, in the reign of Tiberius, Pontius Pilate being then the Roman governor in Judea. The Mahometans acknowledge all this frankly, except the last part, out of an excess of respect to Jesus Christ; they will by no means allow of his infamous crucifixion and death; but affirm, that he was taken up into heaven, and some image of him only left upon the cross in his room, by which the Jews, as well as his own followers, who pretended to be witnesses of the fact, were imposed on, and made to believe that he suffered, when in reality he did not. But this is a groundless fiction, contrary to all sense and reason, like many others in their Alcoran. But, however, they all own that there was such an excellent person, who lived such a life, taught such doctrine, and wrought such miracles as Christians give out.

10. The Jews freely own there was such a person who died such a death at Jerusalem: and hence they bestow the reproachful name on him of Talui, or a person that was hanged, and call the Christians the servants of Talui. Though they disown him to be the Messiah, yet they never refuse there being such a person. Their learned countryman, Josephus, (no Christian,) his testimony concerning him is well known to all the learned world, Antiq. Jud. lib. xviii. cap. 4. p. 261, Edit. Genev. 1635, where he plainly testifies of the life, miracles, crucifixion, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, and of the fulfilling of the prophecies in him, and of the wonderful conversion both of Jews and Gentiles to the faith of his gospel. Some, indeed, question the genuineness of this passage of Josephus, but without just ground; for we find this testimony taken notice of as his by very ancient writers, as Eusebius in Hist. Eccles. lib. 1. cap. ii. p. 30, Edit. Paris, 1659, in vita Tiberii; also by Nicephorus Calistus, by Sozomen, by Jerome, by Isidorus Pelusiota, &c.

OBJECT. This passage is not taken notice of by the ancient defenders of Christianity, as Justin Martyr, Origen, Tertullian, &c.

ANS. The reason of this might be, the copies of Josephus they chanced to make use of might want this testimony, which, in all likelihood, was erased out of as many copies as the malicious Jews could come at. For this testimony of such a famous man as Josephus, one of their own country and religion, against the Jews, for treating such an excellent person so barbarously, could not but expose them as an execrable generation through all the world. So that it is not to be doubted but they would use all possible artifices to take out this testimony of Josephus, wherever they had the management of the copies, either by themselves, or others, their emissaries for that purpose. But it was not possible for them to compass the erasing it out of all the copies dispersed up and down the world. Besides, this famous testimony hath the manifest stamp of Josephus' style and diction. Again, we have certain evidence of other testimonies being erased out of Josephus. For Eusebius, we find, quotes Josephus as recording how just and righteous a man James was, called the brother of Christ, and saying, that the sober and more considerate men among the Jews believed the destruction of Jerusalem to be a punishment inflicted on them for murdering of him. Likewise we have Origen, and Jerome, and Suidas, quoting Josephus for the same passage. And yet in our days there is no such passage to be found in Josephus. Now, would so many authors have agreed in appealing to Josephus for such a passage, if they had not really found it in him? Would it not have exposed their cause to the contempt of all the world, to have asserted a thing which every body could have refuted as false?

11. Ancient Pagan writers have owned the same thing concerning Christ, as Suetonius, Tacitus, Pliny, &c. Yea, Lucian expressly owns the crucifixion of Christ, though he jeers both him, and the Christians his worshippers, on that account. So doth Julian the apostate; he owns the truth of facts concerning Christ, though he endeavours what he can to lessen the reputation of his life and miracles, and alleges, that all he did was no great matter, but only to open the eyes of the blind, restore limbs to the lame, and deliver persons possessed from the power and enchantments of devils, which he seemed to make little account of. It is true, he doth not notice his raising the dead, but passes that by in silence, being what he could not pretend to answer. The Jews also owned the miracles; but alleged that he did all his wonderful works by virtue of the sacred tetragrammaton. Also Celsus, that enemy of Christianity, confesses the truth of Christ's nativity, his journey into Egypt, his passing from place to place with his disciples, the fact of his miracles, his being betrayed, and, lastly, his death and passion. I grant they make all these concessions, in order to their scoff and ridicule. However, it shows the things were so evident, they could not be denied; but Origen sufficiently chastises and exposes him for railing.

12. It is certain, that the writings of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, concerning the life and actions of Christ and his apostles, were their genuine compositions, and not the writings of any other. To confirm this, consider that there is no reason to doubt, that the first teachers of the Christian faith would use the most effectual means for propagating a doctrine they so zealously espoused themselves, and they would not on that score neglect so direct and necessary a method for obtaining their end, as that of committing their doctrines to writing. This is what may be rationally expected from the policy and care of the first founders of any sect, as being a step so necessary, in order to the preservation and progress thereof. All the sects who have made any figure in the world, have taken this course, and so have the founders of Christianity too. While the autographa, or original manuscripts of these penmen, were preserved in the church, there was no access to impose doctrines or facts on the world in their names, contrary to what they had written. And Tertullian, who flourished at the latter end of the second century, or the very beginning of the third, intimates that these venerable writings were preserved till his time. Again, no particular sect of Christians could ever get the writings of the New Testament so forged or adulterated, but all the other sects of Christians would have proclaimed the imposture to the world. The enmity and quarrels among different parties, were a strong guard on these sacred books, that no designing party could ever thrust into these books their own notions, seeing the copies were dispersed among all the sects.

MEDITATION III.—OF THE CERTAINTY OF CHRIST'S RESURRECTION.

WE have many undeniable evidences of it.

1. The testimony of many eye-witnesses; for, besides the apostles, who were witnesses of it in an eminent manner, there were many others. For Paul tells us, that in his time there were still remaining the greater part of more than five hundred, who did all at one time see Jesus after his rising again. Now, an imposture may lie concealed for a while in a few hands, but it is next to impossible that it should lie long undiscovered in the hands of a great many. It shocks a man to think, that so many persons should agree in all the punctilios of a notorious lie, and that they should agree to stand by it in so peremptory a manner as these persons did, and never clash together in any instance whatsoever. It is commonly observed, that plots never thrive so well as when there are few let into the secret; and large cabals of knaves and liars seldom fail to tell tales of one another.

2. These witnesses had personal knowledge of what they testified. Yea, they not only declared that they saw Christ, but many of them, that they saw him frequently and familiarly, and that for a considerable tract of time. They conversed with him for forty days; they eat and drank with him; they saw him do several wondrous works; they received orders and instructions from him about the government of his church; he bid them, "Go, teach and baptize all nations;" he promised them his peace and blessing in so doing, to the end of the world; he commanded them to tarry in Jerusalem, till they were endued with power from on high; and a great many other things are recorded, that he said to them; and after all, they saw him taken up from them, and ascend into heaven, angels standing by. Now, it never could be a dream or imagination in so many men—men, for so many weeks, to fancy all these things alike, without the least variation.

3. Consider the manner of the testimony, and how they delivered it. They invoked God's tremendous name, and begged his assistance and blessing. They appealed to him as the omniscient judge of the world, concerning the sincerity and integrity of their hearts. They declared they did not this of themselves, but by God's order and appointment; and that he gave them power of working signs and wonders for the confirmation of all they said, and accordingly wrought them before all men.

4. They did not testify of a matter that was transacted at a distance from the place where they gave their testimony, nor a long time after the thing was done. No, there is no ground of objection on any of these accounts: for those men appeared upon the very spot that was the scene of the action, at Jerusalem, where Christ was crucified, and where they affirmed he also rose. They neither sent people a great way to inquire, nor did they defer the publication of it till Jesus Christ was forgotten, and the story of his resurrection worn out of mind. No, instead of that, they did it while it was fresh in the minds and mouths of all men, and while those persons who could have confuted them were alive, and ready to be produced, if they had any thing to have advanced against it.

5. They did not make a secret of this matter, but declared it in the most public and open manner that possibly could be. It was not a story whispered among those of their own party, but proclaimed in the ears of all people, and at a time when Jerusalem was crowded with foreigners of all nations, and where was no want of persons able and curious enough to inquire into the truth of all the strange reports they made. They went into the temple and into the synagogues, and preached the resurrection of Christ; yea, in the most august councils of the Jews, they testified it to the rulers and high-priests who had condemned Christ. Peter's bold speech is most remarkable, Acts iv. 8—12. And we see how confounded the whole council was with their testimony; and not one of them had the confidence to tell them that they were publishing a notorious lie.

6. These persons were men of such probity and virtue, that none of their adversaries could ever call in question, nor show to the world that they were ill men.

7. They were persons not bred up in courts, nor instructed in the arts and intrigues of the world, able to persuade people by elegant discourses, &c. No, they were generally mean, though plain and honest men, and their discourses plain and homely: and though Paul was a man of polite learning, yet he would make no use of human learning in the propagation of Christianity.

8. They could not possibly have any secular view, by preaching such a doctrine to the world: nay, in preaching it, they acted against all the rules of worldly interest and policy, and could have no prospect from the world, but what was frightful and discouraging; their doctrine being to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness. They could not propose to themselves either to gain reputation and esteem, or to advance their fortunes in the world; nay, suffering the greatest hardships was all they had in view.

9. Consider how severe the laws were which they published against lying, forgery, and a false testimony: and if they themselves were guilty of it, they were condemned to everlasting punishments for doing what they did, by the very doctrine which they preached. Yet in this doctrine they persisted to the last, and if it were a lie, they went out of the world with a horrible lie in their mouths, which is horrid to think; for so they could have no hope of finding mercy and forgiveness at God's hands; and thus you would make them the most depraved wretches in the world.

10. Now, had they been men who had no religious awe or sense of God themselves, how is it credible that they would have been so very zealous and industrious to impress it upon the minds of others, and to press them to love and fear him, as the scope of all their writings and sermons show? How oft do they tell us of a judgment-day, and of God's being the searcher of the thoughts and counsels of the heart.

11. It is plain to a demonstration, that these persons heartily believed the doctrines they preached to the world: otherwise, how would they have exposed themselves to such dangers and sufferings upon that score?

12. The Jews who lived at that time were infallibly convinced of the resurrection of Jesus Christ: which appears from this, that the writers of the gospel-history did in express terms publish to the world, that the Jews bribed the soldiers to report that the body of Jesus Christ was stolen out of the grave by his disciples. Now, this was a home charge on the Jews, and shows them to be the most degenerate wretches, that they would stick at nothing to carry on their designs, even the most abominable piece of forgery and bribery. Nay, their priests and rulers would be guilty of this villany, to tamper with soldiers in this manner. Well, if these chief-priests and fathers of Israel had been unjustly calumniated in this manner, it might have been expected that they would have exerted themselves in some extraordinary manner to clear themselves of this aspersion, and that the whole nation would have been in a tumult about it. For they would see that their religion, as well as their credit, was at the stake; this account of their proceedings was like to be published through the world, and transmitted to the latest posterity. Now, surely one would think the Christians would have been solemnly called to account for this provoking piece of history, and challenged to make it good, and that with the greatest zeal and concern. Well, but there is nothing like this; the Jews content themselves with private whispers, to set the story about, which the bribed soldiers had reported, and make no resentment of the charge. From all which, we may warrantably conclude, that they were conscious to themselves of the truth of the charge, and knew that they had bribed the soldiers to make the report, and consequently that they knew Christ was risen, otherwise they had not bribed the soldiers.

13. Although the disciples of Christ had been so wicked as to have contrived the stealing away the body of Jesus, it was impossible for them to have accomplished it. The Jews were extraordinary intent and watchful about this event; for they came to Pilate, and told him, that Jesus had foretold, while alive, that he would rise again the third day; and it was proper that a guard should be set upon the sepulchre till that day was over, lest his disciples should come and steal him away, and say, that he was risen, and so the latter error would be worse than the first. They were sufficiently aware of the consequences of this event, that it would overturn their religion, and establish Christianity, and therefore they take all necessary precautions; and this was ordered by God's wise providence for ascertaining the truth of the event.

14. The coined story of carrying off the body of Jesus, while the guard slept, is so very gross, that it will scarce bear a telling. For if the disciples did this while the soldiers slept, how could the trick be known? Did the disciples tell it themselves, or were the guard conscious of what passed in their sleep? Were not their senses locked up during their sleep?

15. If the disciples had been concerned in so vile a piece of imposture, with what courage or confidence could they have entered on their ministry, and preached salvation in Christ's name? Could they have ever hoped for any countenance from heaven, or for assistance from the Spirit to work miracles, while they were propagating a notorious cheat. They might have expected that both heaven and earth would be engaged against them in every step of their undertaking, and so would have dropped their design of propagating the Christian faith. But being perfectly assured of the truth of Christ's resurrection, and of all they preached, they undertook and went through their work with that indefatigable zeal and industry, with that life and spirit far transcending all that ever was known in human nature before, that no storms nor difficulties, dangers nor deaths could in the least shake them; yea, were animated the more by the greatest of trials and persecutions.

For confirming the truth of the witnesses testimony concerning our Lord's resurrection, consider the horrid and intolerable absurdities that would follow on questioning or denying the truth of it.

1. A deist, who denies it, must believe that a despicable company of wilful impostors and deceivers, men of a hated nation and religion, without power or force, without learning or experience, without wit or policy, should be able to run down all wit, learning, power, and policy of the world; and by preaching a most despised, incredible, and seemingly ridiculous doctrine, directly contrary to all the worldly interests and humours of men, and to their religions and customs, yea, and to their reason and philosophy too, should propagate the belief of it far and wide through the earth, so that there was scarce a nation in the whole compass of the globe, but what in whole or in part received this fiction, as the most sacred truth of God, and accordingly laid the whole stress of their salvation upon it! Or, if deists will suppose that the apostles and their companions were a company of brain-sick enthusiasts, or of lunatics and madmen: then they must own that such pitiful, weak persons argued with so much art and force as to overpower all the learning and wisdom of the world: that all the sages, philosophers, and statesmen, who embraced Christianity in great numbers, as well as the poor and illiterate, were convinced and persuaded by mere enthusiasm; that they mistook downright raving for the strongest reason, and a chain of incoherent falsities for bright and evident demonstrations of truth!

2. The deists must believe that twelve poor fishermen were not only able to compass that vast design of making the world stoop to the laws they imposed; but also that they laid their plots so deep, that the effects of it should be permanent and lasting, and no succeeding age or generation ever be able to fathom it, and show where the cheat lay. Strange! that a company of illiterate men outdid the profoundest wisdom and sagacity of mankind, and concerted matters so artfully, that none of all the penetrating wits of the world should, for so many centuries, after the strictest examination, find it possible to discover the least failure or flaw in the contrivance.

3. They must believe that these persons absolutely divested themselves of all regard to their own preservation or happiness; that they despised all the comforts and enjoyments of life, and ventured upon poverty and misery, upon torments, upon death, yea, upon damnation itself in the next world, and all for nothing, but the propagating of a cheat, which is most absurd to suppose.

4. They must believe that these very persons, who, but a few hours before, had so little spirit and courage left them that they forsook their Master in his extremity, and durst not own themselves his disciples, nor show themselves openly for fear of the Jews, should all of a sudden grow so resolute, as to venture on that bold and hazardous undertaking of forcing the sepulchre, and carrying off his body; and that they effectuated the design without being challenged by one of the guard.

5. They must believe that these timorous men would, in an enterprise that required so much expedition and dispatch, spend so much of their time in divesting a dead body of its burial-clothes, and wrap them up by themselves; and not rather choose to carry off all together in haste, lest the next minute the guard might awake, and come upon them.

6. They must believe that a set of the greatest cheats that ever the world saw, did, notwithstanding, furnish mankind with the most exact system of morality that ever was, and lay the best foundations and scheme for the peace and happiness of the world, that could be laid! That the vilest hypocrites would spend all their time, and lives too, in indefatigable labours to make other men upright and sincere, and denounce damnation against lying, dissimulation, &c. That the system they compiled of religion was a standing comment of their own shame; and that all their sermons and writings were but so many satires and lampoons upon themselves.

OBJECT. Christ's resurrection is attested only by his own friends and disciples. Why did he not converse as publicly with men as he did before? Why did he not appear to the chief-priests and elders of the Jews, to have convinced them of the truth of this fact?

ANS. 1. We are not to prescribe rules to the Divine Majesty; all his works are done in infinite wisdom, and he is not obliged to account to us for his actings; he himself knows best what makes most for his own glory and the happiness of his creatures.

2. It was not to a few that Christ appeared, but to the twelve apostles, to the seventy disciples; yea, to five hundred brethren at once, to whom he gave the most convincing proofs of his resurrection.

3. It was a sufficient demonstration to the Jews of Christ's resurrection, Pilate's securing the sepulchre with a guard of soldiers, and Christ's body not being found therein. They might have been assured that a handful of timorous men would never adventure on stealing it: and they had a sufficient confirmation from the soldiers, who came into the city, and showed to the chief-priests all the things that were done, viz. the earthquake, angel's descent, &c., Mat. xxviii. 11.

4. Christ had given sufficient proof of his divine mission to the Jews before, by the miracles he wrought, which they blasphemously opposed, and maliciously prosecuted him to death as a traitor; and therefore, because of their malice and obstinacy, they were unworthy of such a privilege as his conversing with them.

5. Though he had appeared to them, these malicious men would not have acknowledged him to be the person that was crucified, but would have alleged he was an impostor, set up by the Christians to personate the true Jesus, and been more enraged against his followers than ever.

6. Though Christ had risen and appeared in such a manner, yet deists would have quarrelled the testimony of witnesses the same way they do now, saying, "How should we believe the report of others, and credit what we see not with our own eyes," &c. Christ's miracles were as publicly transacted as could have been desired; all men, and the greatest enemies, were allowed to witness the same; yet deists now treat them as mere forgeries, and so would they have done Christ's appearing even to the whole Jewish sanhedrim.

Improvement. 1st. From the resurrection of Christ, we may infer that death is fairly overcome, and swallowed up in victory. Christ went into the very den of this dragon, and foiled it. Now, though it retains its dart, yet it hath left its sting in Christ's side, so that the believer may triumph, as 1 Cor. xv. 55—57, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." The true believer need not have any slavish fear of death, though it frighten, yet it cannot hurt him. 2d. Let believers dispose and employ their bodies, as those who know what is prepared for them at the resurrection. 3d. Let us all secure to ourselves an interest in Christ and his blessed resurrection. It is this hope that supports under all the troubles of this life.

MEDITATION IV.—FROM EPH. VI. 16, REDEEM THE TIME.

1. TIME is one of the most precious blessings which man enjoys in this world, a jewel of inestimable worth: it is a golden stream continually running down by us, yea, carrying us alongst with it: it is a stream running from one ocean to another, from an eternity behind us, to an eternity before us.

2. That which makes time so precious mainly, is, that the salvation of our precious and immortal souls, through all eternity, depends thereupon. Upon the improvement of this short moment of time, depends a long-lasting and never-ending eternity.

3. The expense which God the author of time is at, to create and beget it for us, shows the preciousness of it. Why? God, by his almighty power, doth continually wheel about these great luminaries of sun, moon, and stars, in their annual and diurnal revolutions, to beget and furnish time to us; and these do never halt nor stop, nor come short of their appointed times of rising and setting, and all for the service of man, that he may have time for the service of his Maker, and the saving of his soul.

4. The haste that time doth make, and the consideration of its shortness, that it will quickly be gone, and that a minute of it can never be recalled, shows forth its preciousness.

5. Also the important business we have for every moment of our time; although each of us had a thousand years to live, the service of God, and saving of our souls, is such a vast work, as would require every minute of it.

6. We are ready to pass into another world, an eternal state, where every minute of our time must be accounted for, and then it must fare with us eternally, as we have spent and improven this short time here.

7. For as precious as time is, it is undervalued and lavished away more than any thing is. It is seldom taken notice of, until it is quite past away from us; we never consider its worth and usefulness, till it is just ending.—Hence Solomon saith, Eccl. ix. 12, “Man knoweth not his time.”

8. It is most just, that he who hath the ordering and disposing of all things else concerning us, should he also the supreme Lord and disposer of our time, and therefore hath right to determine what time is to be allotted for our work, and what for his: and most just it is, that he, from whom we have all our time, should have his choice of it.

9. Of all time Sabbath time is the most precious and valuable; it being the time God has allotted and set apart for himself, and upon the improvement whercof, the glory of God and salvation of our souls depend in a most peculiar manner, it being the day of special access to God, and of free commerce and correspondence between heaven and earth. It is heaven's weekly market-day, or God's deal-day to the poor and needy; the day of access to God's presence-chamber. Time by some is compared to a gold ring, and the Sabbath to the sparkling diamond, which gives it its lustre, and heightens its value. Wherefore, if we be wise, we will show a peculiar esteem for the Sabbath above all the days of the week; we will reckon every moment of Sabbath-time most precious, and desire that none of it may be misspent. What Christ said to his disciples concerning the loaves and the fishes, the like he seems to speak to us concerning his holy day, “Gather up the fragments,” gather up all the parcels, the spare hours and minutes of it; account them as precious as the goldsmith doth the smallest filings of his gold, and let nothing of Sabbath-time be lost.

Exhortation. 1. Above all time, redeem carefully Sabbath-time, and improve it diligently. Consider what a blessing the Sabbath is to you, if rightly improved: 1st. An inn for refreshing the weary traveller, that hath been toiled and tossed with storms through the week. 2d. It is Christ's weekly market-day, wherein Christ sets forth the richest wares and commodities for us to buy “without money and without price,” Rev. iii. 18. 3d. It is the King of heaven's public deal-day, wherein he deals his bread to the hungry, and gives alms to the poor and needy. 4th. It is the day of conversion, of inbringing and gathering the elect. Multitudes have been brought in to Christ this day. 5th. It is a day of access to God, and correspondence with heaven; a day when Christ is to be seen and conversed with. You may not only have correspondence with Christ at a distance, but immediate access. You may be taken into the palace, the presence chamber, and see the King in his beauty, hear his voice, get the kisses of his mouth, the embraces of his arms; and should not this time be redeemed? 6th. It is the day of heaven's festival, wherein Christ useth to feast his saints with the fatness of his house. 7th. It is a day of reaping and gathering, and for laying up in store for the time to come. 8th. A day for ascending the mount of transfiguration, to see Christ transfigured, a day of ascending to mount Pisgah, to see the land that is afar off.

2. Redeem Sabbath-time, for it is flying fast away; you may have but a few more Sabbaths to enjoy. The Sabbath is fast approaching that will be your last Sabbath, after which you shall see no more in this world.

3. Redeem Sabbath-time, for much depends on it, the glory of God, and salvation of your immortal souls through eternity. So important is the business that depends on the improvement of your Sabbath-time, that it would call for the improvement of every moment: yea, though each of you had ten thousand Sabbaths to spend, the service of God, and saving of your souls, is such a vast work, as would require every minute of them.

4. Redeem Sabbath-time, for we cannot recall one Sabbath that is past; no, though we had a world to give for one Sabbath, we could not recall it. O many will be put one day to wish and cry in vain, O to recover one of these lost Sabbaths, wherein I had the free rich offer of a crucified Christ.

5. Redeem Sabbath-time, for you are just ready to pass into another world, where you must give a strict account of every Sabbath you have enjoyed, and answer for every minute of precious Sabbath-time. How will you answer for all the Sabbaths you have misimproved, for the Sabbaths of threescore years, which are above three thousand: O that will be a terrible item in the accounts of old graceless sinners.

Directions in redeeming Sabbath-time.

1. Carefully avoid whatever hinders it; as, 1st. Atheism, or misbelief of the truth, and of the great end and design of the Sabbath. 2d. Ignorance. Many are so ignorant, that they think if they pass away the Sabbath without any gross breach of it, they do well enough. 3d. Sloth and laziness. Up and be doing.

2. If you would redeem Sabbath-time, repent of former misimprovements, and humble yourselves for lost Sabbaths, and cry for mercy through Christ's atoning blood.

3. Study to recompence former mismanagements by your future diligence; as a traveller who finds himself like to be benighted by his former laziness, mends his pace, and goes as many miles now in one hour, as formerly he did in two.

4. Spend every Sabbath now as it were your last; and this approaching Sabbath be as diligent on it, as if it were your last: prepare for it in the evening; get up early next morning, pray, read, meditate, examine yourself, and wrestle for God's presence with you in the ordinances.

5. Hearken presently to Christ's calls in the word; believe and embrace Christ's doctrine, and his righteousness, and close with him as your only help and remedy.

MEDITATION V.—UPON JOHN XX. 20, "AND WHEN HE SO SAID, HE SHOWED THEM HIS HANDS AND HIS FEET. THEN WERE THE DISCIPLES GLAD, WHEN THEY SAW THE LORD."

THIS was the first Christian Sabbath, and upon it the disciples met for the work and duties of the day, prayer, and godly conference. Well, did the disciples meet for this work? Christ will not let them part without his peace and blessing. He comes in the midst of them, when the doors were shut, no doors nor bands can shut out Christ's presence from his disciples; and what is his salutation to them? "Peace be unto you." A most comprehensive blessing! This was the legacy he had left them a few days before, and now he makes prompt and ready payment of it to them, he will not be long owing it.

QUEST. What sort of peace is it?

ANS. Peace with God, peace of conscience, and peace with one another. This was a blessing most suitable to them, who were so full of fears and disorders.

After this salutation, he gives them a most comfortable discovery of his pierced hands and side, to convince them of the truth of his resurrection, of which they were still in doubt, by the marks and scars of the wounds which had been made a few days before by the nails and spear. he shows them that the body they now saw alive, was the same individual body they and many others had seen dead on the cross a few days before. From this,

Observe 1. That Christ retained the scars of his wounds after his resurrection. He was not ashamed of them, but gloried in them, as conquerors glory in the marks of their wounds after bloody battles. Moreover, Christ had use for them: 1st. They were to speak on earth, and demonstrate the truth of his resurrection to the world, particularly to convince unbelieving Thomas. 2d. They were to speak in heaven, by the intercession that he makes for his people there, in doing whereof he shows his wounds, and therefore he ascended with them, and now appears in midst of the throne as a lamb slain, with his wounds, as it were, bleeding afresh, Rev. v. 6. 3d. Nay, he retains them, that he may come back with them, for it seems they will be then visible, that enemies may look on him whom they pierced, Rev. i. 7, "Behold he cometh with clouds: and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him."

2. Observe the condescension and pains of a crucified Jesus to satisfy his disciples: he showed them his hands, he is at pains first to open his hands, to let them see the marks of the wounds he got by the nails driven therein. Next he opens his breast, to let them see the wound he got in his side by the spear that was thrust into it. O the condescension of our Lord, to confirm the faith of his poor staggering and doubting disciples!

3. Observe the effect and impression of this sight upon the disciples, "they were glad when they saw the Lord." It revived their drooping spirits, it convinced their doubting hearts and strengthened their faith, and faith produces joy, Rom. xv. 13; 1 Pet. i. 8. Now Christ fulfilled what he said, John xvi. 22, "I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice."

Doctrine. A believing and appropriating view of the wounds of a crucified and risen Jesus, is a most joyful sight.

QUEST. What grounds of joy have we in this sight?

ANS. 1. This sight shows that Christ hath loved us, and given himself for us, who are objects of wrath.

2. This tells us our debt is paid, justice is satisfied, our Surety is risen, and let out of prison.

3. We have ground of joy, that we see a shelter against all the challenges of the law and justice of God; for Christ has wrought a law-biding and justice-satisfying righteousness. Here is our city of refuge against the avenger of blood. How glad were the manslayer at this sight!

4. Thou art sure of access and acceptance with God. Why? Here is a powerful ground of intercession, the wounds and blood of the Son of God, "which speaketh better things than that of Abel." The wounds are like a mouth still open for thee; the blood like a tongue still speaking for thee.

5. The fifth ground of joy is, that the covenant is confirmed, whereby thou art safe from the deluge, the rainbow appearing, even the scarlet-coloured wounds and blood of Christ, which is a sure token of God's covenant.

Inference.—Then we have reason to bless God for the approach of the Sabbath; and more especially for the news of a communion Sabbath approaching, wherein we may see, in a remarkable manner, the wounds of a crucified Jesus discovered to us. O that is the most joyful sight the world ever saw! Let us welcome the Sabbath, and especially a communion Sabbath, which brings us such a sight. Every Lord's day is lovely and desirable; but a communion Sabbath is in a special manner a day of the Son of man, a solemn and high day, a day to be remarked and remembered by all the disciples of Jesus. As the Sabbath is the most excellent of all the days of the week, so a communion Sabbath is the most desirable of all the Sabbaths of the year. For, upon such a day, a crucified Jesus is most evidently set forth before our eyes; then he appears in his dyed garments, glorious and red in his apparel, a most lovely sight to the eye of faith. These are days in God's court indeed, far better than a thousand elsewhere.

MEDITATION VI.—ON THE SABBATH BEING CALLED A DELIGHT, FROM ISA. LVIII. 22, "CALL THE SABBATH A DELIGHT."

GREAT stress was always laid upon the due observation of the Sabbath-day; and it was particularly required from the Jews, when they were captives at Babylon, that by keeping this day they might distinguish themselves from the worshippers of the gods which have not made the heavens and the earth, Isa. lvi. 1, 2. We must put all honour and respect upon it, and call it a delight, not a task or burden. We must not only count it a delight, but call it so, by openly professing the complacency we take in the day and duties of it. We must call it a delight, 1. To God, in a way of thanksgiving to God for it, and earnest desire of his grace to enable us to do the work of the day, because we delight in it. 2. We must call it so to others, to invite them to come and share with us in the pleasure of it. 3. We must call it so to ourselves, that we may not entertain the least thought of wishing the Sabbath gone, that we may sell corn or wine.

QUEST. 1. What is imported in calling the Sabbath a delight?

ANS. 1. A belief that God is the author and institutor of it. 2. A knowledge of the ends and designs of it, that it is in honour of God the Creator, and of Christ the Redeemer, and for our good. 3. A thankful sense of God's goodness in instituting the Sabbath, it being a day of communion with God. 4. A high esteem of the Sabbath, as the best day of the week. 5. A cheerful compliance with the work and duties of the Sabbath. 6. A thinking on the Sabbath, looking, longing, and preparing for it, before it come. 7. A conscientious and willing performance of all the Sabbath duties. 8. A hating and avoiding all those evils and practices that are contrary to Sabbath sanctification.

QUEST. 2. When may it be said that the Sabbath is our delight?

ANS. 1. It is our delight, when we esteem it a privilege and favour from God to have the Sabbath; when we say, O what a favour from God is this to me, that when I have been wearying myself six days for the world, God hath appointed this day, that we may refresh ourselves from such labours, mind our souls, and seek after heaven! If we value God above the world, and the joys of heaven above the pleasures on earth, so we will certainly value this day above all other days.

2. It is our delight, when we make it a day of visiting God, and keeping communion with him in his ordinances. The people of the world find delight in visiting their friends, and conversing and holding society with them; but much more may we have in visiting God, and seeing him in the sanctuary, and holding sweet fellowship with him there.

3. When we are not satisfied this day with a bare approach to God; but when we go to God this day as our exceeding joy, Psal. xliii. 4, and place our happiness in the serving of God, and enjoying of him; and when we go with joy to draw water out of the wells of salvation.

4. When we draw forth our graces into holy actings and vigorous exercise: the more we are employed this day in the actings of faith and love, and hope of heaven, it will be the more delight to us.

5. When the work and duties of the Sabbath are our element and recreation; when we are in David's frame, Psal. cxii. 1, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go up into the house of the Lord." This is prophesied of believers under the gospel, that they flock to ordinances on the wings of delight, "as doves to their windows," Isa. lx. 8. How great was David's delight in them, when he "desires it as one thing, that he might dwell all his days in God's house, to behold the beauty of the Lord," Psal. xxvii. 4, that is, that he might always have free access to God's house, and enjoy communion with God there. Hence he counts "a day in God's courts better than a thousand elsewhere." David had many earthly things to delight in, such as, 1st. Great victories over enemies, which generals and warriors greatly delight in. 2d. He had palaces and gardens, which great men delight in. 3d. He had instruments of music of all sorts, which great musiciens (such as David the sweet singer of Israel was) delight much in: yea, he invented to himself all sorts of musical instruments, Amos vi. 5. Well, but though David knew as much of these earthly delights as most men, yet he delighted most of all in the Sabbath, "a day in God's courts."

6. It is a delight when we find increase and growth of grace in and by the ordinances. We see men delight in a market-day on which they gain much of the world; and much more will they delight in the Lord's day, who find their love to God on it more inflamed, their desires after him more enlarged, and their hope of heaven more confirmed.

7. It is a delight when we come thereon to discover our interest in the Lord Jesus, and are made to see that it was he who died and rose from the dead this day for us. O, how delightful to think, this is the day my Redeemer lived again! Do others delight in the day of their birth, and shall not I delight in the day on which my Lord did live again?

8. It is a delight when we come on the Sabbath to get assurance that we shall keep an everlasting Sabbath with God above. And if a transient enjoyment of God in a Sabbath here be so pleasant, how much more to have the full enjoyment of God on that Sabbath above to all eternity!

QUEST. 3. Do not the special delights of the Sabbath excel all other delights, and wherein do they excel?

ANS. 1. They transcend them in their foundation; they are well founded, not on mistakes and delusions, as carnal delights and pleasures are, but on the sure word of God, that is unalterable, his well-ordered covenant. Carnal men rejoice in fancies and delusions, but know not how matters are with them. If they knew how near hell and damnation they are; if they knew the shortness of their pleasures, and the length of their sorrows, they would have little heart to sport or laugh; nay, it would soon turn their laughter into mourning and lamentation.

2. Spiritual delights surpass them in reality; the pleasures of the wicked are but seeming and outward, but believers' delights are real, hearty, and inward. In the midst of the laughter of the wicked, their hearts are sad; though their senses be someway tickled and affected, yet the heart is not. But with believers it is otherwise, Psal. iv. 17, "Thou hast put more gladness in my heart," &c. Spiritual delight goes to the heart.

3. They are suitable delights, seeing they are intellectual. Carnal delights in drinking, sporting, &c. make men more like beasts than men. The beasts have pain and pleasure by their senses, but not sorrow nor delight, because these are intellectual. So the joy of carnal men is rather pleasure than delight; but the more intellectual and chaste our delights are, the more pure and suitable are they to the human nature. Yea, the more our delights are in loving, praising, and worshipping God on the Sabbath, they make us more like angels than men.

4. They surpass them in innocency. Carnal delights, the more we use them, the more we are ensnared by them; they pervert the heart, disorder the mind, and indispose for duty. But spiritual delights have no such effect; they are so far from perverting or disordering, that they corroborate and strengthen the graces; they compose and purify the mind; they make sin the more odious, and fortify us the more against the baits of sense.

5. They excel them in security. Spiritual delights are pure, like crystal streams, whereas carnal delights are imbittered with fear, stings of conscience, and sense of guilt.

6. They excel them in strength and sweetness. There is delight in thinking on our temporal interests, but much more in thinking on Christ and our interest in him, and the well-ordered covenant. Yea, there is more delight in the hardest part of Sabbath work, viz. in mortifying one sin or lust, than carnal men have in satisfying a thousand.

7. They are more profitable delights. There is more profit in one day, yea, one hour's communion with God, than in the worldly gains of a thousand market-days. O! do men toil hard in labouring six days of the week for gains of the world, and will we not labour one day for that which endureth to everlasting life?

8. They are more satisfying than all worldly delights. Surely there is more satisfaction in the spiritual recreations of this day, than in all carnal sports and pastimes whatsoever. O what satisfaction is there in thinking on the work of redemption, and of all that Christ did and suffered for the accomplishment of it! What a pleasant recreation is it to find and feel the actings of love and desire to God, and to have a sense of God's love unto the soul; to meditate on the eternal Sabbath of rest from sin, sickness, temptation, and all evil whatsoever, and of joining in the perfect love and praises of that blessed company above to all eternity!

9. They surpass them in this, that they end well, whereas carnal delights do not. Carnal delights are like the crackling of thorns under a pot; they make a great blaze and noise for a little, but then they go out in darkness; or, like the light of a candle, that doth shine for a little, but then goes out in a stinking snuff. So with carnal delights, they make way for sorrow, "for the end of that mirth is heaviness," according to Prov. xiv. 13. Carnal delight and recreations, especially on the Sabbath, leave a sting behind them, whenever conscience is awakened, and these are the forerunners of hell.

QUEST. 4. What are those things in the Sabbath we ought to delight in?

ANS. 1. In the restraints which the Sabbath lays on us, in hindering us from our worldly employments and recreations, and from all the pleasures of sin; this we should delight in.

2. In the duties and services which the Sabbath obligeth us unto.

QUEST. 5. What are those duties and services of the Sabbath which we ought to delight in?

ANS. 1. There are public services and duties which we should delight in; as in the hearing of the word, prayer, praises, and receiving of the sacraments.

2. Private duties, as reading of the word, prayer, meditation, Christian conference, mourning for sin, &c.

A SACRAMENTAL DIRECTORY.

PREFACE.

THIS directory being first published in the year 1716, the preface was added to the second edition of it in the year 1726, in which now I have made some additions and alterations. The book itself also is considerably enlarged from what it was at first, namely, in proving and pressing the necessity of communicating, in obedience to our Lord's dying command; and it is to be regretted that there should be still so much need for urging it. Ah, that so many Christians, who profess respect to Christ as their Saviour, should live in the neglect of his dying charge! Perhaps, my friends, upon viewing the hazard of eating unworthily, some of you may think you are on the safest side to keep away from this ordinance altogether; not considering, that the danger of unworthy refusing is fully as great as that of unworthy receiving: for you see those who make light of Christ's invitation to the marriage-supper escaped no better than he that came without the wedding-garment, Mat. xxii. 7, 13. Likewise I have adduced many arguments to press frequency in communicating, and have answered objections against it; which, if you duly consider you must own that frequent partaking is most advantageous and necessary for the exigencies of your souls, and highly acceptable unto God. If there be "a book of remembrance written before the Lord, for them that feared the Lord, thought upon his name, and spoke one to another," Mal. iii. 16, we have no ground to question but there is a book of remembrance written for them that love their Redeemer, and often remember his death and sufferings in the sacrament which he hath instituted for that end. And as I would have you come frequently to this solemn ordinance, so I would always have you coming with suitable preparation; and, for your help in this matter, I have composed the following directory. Special care should be taken, that our frequency do not breed formality, but that we be as devout as frequent; and, though we communicate never so frequently, that we trust not to former preparations, but that we examine and prepare ourselves of new for every communion.

But seeing it is in vain to exhort Christians to frequent receiving, unless ministers do also frequently administrate this ordinance, and call their people to partake thereof; it may be proper to speak something of the necessity of frequent dispensing of the Lord's supper. All the arguments and reasons which I bring in the ensuing treatise, to prove the necessity of peoples frequent partaking, do as much prove the necessity of ministers frequent dispensing: seeing, if ministers do not dispense, the people cannot partake: but, besides these, I shall, with all humility and becoming respect, add some things here, which, I hope may be of weight with myself, and other ministers of the gospel to persuade to frequent dispensing.

I. The inspired apostles of Christ, and other pastors of the church, that were contemporary with them, did (in obedience to the intimation which their Lord and master gave them at the first institution) frequently dispense the Lord's supper to the Christians in their days; yea, it was their ordinary custom to do it every Lord's day, Acts ii. 47; xx. 7. The inspired penman of that book mentions the breaking of bread as a constant concomitant to the apostles' doctrine and prayers, Acts ii. 4.

II. In imitation of the apostles, the pastors of the ancient church kept up the practice of celebrating the Lord's Supper every Lord's day, through the second, third, fourth, and fifth centuries. To evidence this (if it were called in question) I might cite many passages from the histories of Eusebius and Soerates, and the writings of Justin Martyr, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Hierom, Ambrose, Augustine, and several others, who on that account used to call the Lord's day, day of bread: but, it being a matter of fact so well known, I need not blot paper with quotations to this purpose. Nay, it is plain, from the foresaid ancient writers, that the Lord's Supper continued to be dispensed in some places, not only every Lord's day, but also every day of the week, and that for several centuries: which practice Augustine (who lived in the fifth century) doth not seem so heartily to approve: for Lib. de Ecclesiasticis, cap. 53, he hath these words: "I neither praise nor dispraise daily receiving of the Lord's Supper; but I would have all men to communicate each Lord's day." Moreover, learned men, who are best acquainted with the antiquities of the Christian church, do observe, that unfrequency in celebrating this sacrament crept in together with other antichristian errors and defections, into the church of Christ.

III. I shall therefore pass the ages of darkness and defection, and come to the two last centuries of the church, and take a short view of the practice of some Protestant churches since our reformation from popery. I grant, the Lord's Supper hath not been celebrated so often since that time, as in the first ages of the church. We have the reason pointed at in a book, which represents the practice of the church of Geneva, particularly in celebrating the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which was four times in the year. The book is entituled, "Laws and Statutes of Geneva, anent Ecclesiastic Discipline," translated out of the French, and printed London, 1643, p. 7, we have these words: "for as the Supper hath been instituted by our Saviour Jesus Christ to be frequented and used, and also it hath been observed in the primitive Christian church, until such time as the devil hath turned all upside down, setting up the mass instead thereof, which fault ought to be corrected, and also the rare celebrating thereof: we have determined and ordained, that it shall be ministered four times a-year."

Again, let us look into the practice of the reformed churches of France whilst their liberty continued. In the acts of the national synod held at Charentoun, printed London, 1644, cap. 12, art. 14, we have these words: "although it hath been a custom in most of the churches in these parts, to celebrate the holy communion only four times every year; yet it is much wished and desired that it might be used more frequently."

As for the reformed churches in the United Provinces, or the Dutch churches, we see what was their practice, in "Corpus Disciplinæ," published by the ministers and elders of the Dutch congregation in London, 1645, cap. 3, sect 2, art. 3, "It is appointed that the Lord's Supper be administered every two months (i. e. six times a-year) wherein the churches under persecution are left to their liberty."

As to the churches in New England, we have an account of their practice, "Brief Narrative of the Practice of the Churches in New England," printed London, 1651, p. 8. "As for the administration of the Lord's Supper, because Christ desires us to do it often, we commonly have it monthly, though we tie not ourselves to any set time, but alter it as often as reason appears."

Let us come to the church of Scotland, and consider the ancient practice of our worthy reformers in this matter. And, in the first place, if we look to the old Scots liturgy or the "Book of Common Order," which was written by John Knox, first for the order of the English kirk at Geneva, whereof he was minister, and approved by John Calvin, printed at Geneva, 1556, and afterwards received and used by the reformed king of Scotland; we will find, in the 10th chapter, concerning the manner of administration of the Lord's Supper, these words: "the day when the Lord's Supper is ministered, which is commonly used once a month, or so often as the congregation shall think expedient, the minister useth to say as followeth," &c. From which it appears, that the first practice of our reformers, after the reformation of this nation from popery, was to administer the Lord's Supper commonly once a month. Afterwards, it seemeth, they found that the people did not so generally fall in with the fore-said order for monthly sacraments as could be wished: and therefore in the General Assembly which was held at Edinburgh in December 1562, they thought fit to condescend to a less frequent administration of this ordinance; for, in their act thereanent, recorded by Calderwood in his history, page 816, we have these words: "It is ordained, that the communion be four times ministered in the year within borough towns, and twice in country parishes."

Here, indeed, there is a distinction made betwixt the frequency in boroughs and country parishes: but, in the first book of discipline, which was compiled by several of our famous reformers, by way of address to the civil government, and much about the same time approved and established both by church and state, we find four times in the year condescended upon for the sacrament, without any distinction of congregations, cap. 2, parag. 2. They tell us indeed, that the order of Geneva, concerning the ministration of the sacraments, was at that time used in some of their churches, i. e. the "Book of Common Order" forecited, which declareth for monthly sacraments; but, in cap. 11, parag. 5, they give their judgment for quarterly communions, in these words; "four times in the year we think sufficient to the administration of the Lord's table, which we desire to be distincted, that the superstition of times may be avoided so far as may be; for your honours are not ignorant how superstitiously the people ran to that action at Pasch, even as if the time gave virtue to the sacrament; and how the rest of the whole year they are careless and negligent, as if it appertained not to them but at that time only. We think it therefore most expedient that the first Sunday of March be appointed for one time, to that service, the first Sunday of June for another, the first Sunday of September for the third, the first Sunday of December for the fourth. We do not deny but any several kirk, for reasonable causes, may change the time, and may minister oftener; but we study to repress superstition."

From all which we may see what it was that came to be the more general, settled, and declared mind of the Church of Scotland after the Reformation, concerning the frequency of the Lord's supper, viz. that it should at least be celebrated once in the quarter, allowing liberty to any minister or congregation to administer it oftener, if they thought fit. Some, perhaps, may doubt if it was altogether right in our reformers to reduce the primitive practice of celebrating the Lord's supper once a week to once in the month, and afterwards to once in the quarter; but we are to suppose they had weighty reasons for it at that time: but there are many now of the mind, that we of this age cannot now so well account for reducing the ancient practice of this church in administering this sacrament once in the quarter to once in the year. Is not this a lamentable deviating from the sentiments and practice of our great and zealous reformers? What can our unfrequency in celebrating this Christian commemorating ordinance be imputed to, so much as a sad decay of love to a crucified Jesus? Alas, that love to our unchangeable lovely Redeemer should cool by length of time! We sadly verify what he foretold of the latter days, Matt. xxiv. 12, "Iniquity shall abound, and the love of many shall wax cold." But O! are not Christ's benefits as great as ever, his blood as fresh and efficacious as ever? Why then should not Christian love be as warm as ever, and their respect to his gospel institutions as strong as ever? O that the Christians of this age were sensible from whence we are fallen; how far we have departed from the zeal of our ancestors, and left our first love to a crucified Christ; so that all ranks were concerned to revive and recover it, in and by the use of the means which God hath appointed for that end; that by degrees we might again attain our reformers' frequency of celebrating this Christ-exalting and love-inflaming ordinance, and so change our annual to quarterly communions! I know it is affecting to some hearty well-wishers of the prosperity and credit of the Church of Scotland, to think that a church so excellently well constituted, and which had attained to a greater pitch of reformation in other things than her neighbours, should yet lie behind them in this point.

I acknowledge that matters were so put out of order in this church, by reason of the long oppression she groaned under, and the great defections of many, before the late happy revolution, that ministers in several places were afraid to dispense this sealing ordinance to their flocks for some time: and finding themselves very much straitened betwixt the indisposition of their people, and the hazard of a total omission, they came to an unfrequent celebration of this ordinance, perhaps but once in two or three years, till this unfrequency became customary and too general. Serious Christians indeed flocked unto those places where it was dispensed, whereby their loss at home was in some measure repaired.

But the General Assembly, being sensible of the evil of this unfrequency, began to take notice of it, and make several excellent acts for the more frequent celebration of the Lord's supper, as in the years 1710, 1711, 1712, and 1724. Though these acts have not hitherto had their full effect, yet they have been so far effectual as to bring the ministers generally to administer this ordinance in their congregations at least once in the year. I know several worthy ministers have some years ago given a laudable example to their brethren, in celebrating the Lord's supper in their congregations twice a year; though indeed it is to be regretted that so few hitherto have copied after it.

The authority and judgment of the great Calvin (whom the Church of Scotland doth most deservedly regard and esteem) concerning annual and frequent communicating, hath very great weight with me: we have it in his Institutions, lib. 4. cap. 17. par. 46. mili fol. 507; after he had showed what was the practice of the ancient church in purest times, he hath these words: "And indeed this custom, which commands to communicate once only in the year, is most certainly the invention of the devil, whoever was instrumental to introduce it. When there was a law made for communicating once in the year, it came to pass, that almost all, when they had once communicated, turned slothful and slept securely throughout the rest of the year. But it should have been far otherwise: every week, at least, the Lord's table should have been set before the assembly of Christians, and the promises therein set forth upon which we should feed spiritually: no man indeed should be compelled to come by force, but all should be exhorted and excited; and the sloth of all the negligent reproved." And upon the margin, we have these words; "The popish custom, which enjoins men to communicate once a year, is a cursed invention." And certainly the godly and judicious Calvin's observation is most just: for when we call our people to come to the Lord's table but once in the year, and there believingly to remember a crucified Christ for the remission of their sins, the most part are tempted to think, when they have done that, their main work is over for that year, and so fall asleep and turn secure through the rest of the year; upon which account he calls this popish custom "a cursed invention," and an "invention of the devil." It is to be hoped that the Church of Scotland, which so much abhors popery and all popish customs, will at length throw out this of annual communicating, as well as they have done others.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

OBJECT. I. By divine appointment the passover was celebrated but once in the year; and now the Lord's supper is come in room of the passover.

ANS. 1. It must be remembered, that as the passover served to signify and prefigure Christ's death and sufferings to the Jews, and their spiritual redemption thereby; so it was instituted to preserve the memorial of their temporal freedom and deliverance from the bondage of Egypt, which God wrought for them on the fourteenth of the first month, Exod. xii. 17, 18. And therefore he appointed them to keep the passover annually upon that day of the month. But the Lord has fixed no certain day of the year for the Lord's supper under the New Testament times; but only in general hath enjoined a frequent celebration of it.

2. The Jews did not need a very frequent celebration of the passover to put them in mind of the coming, death, and sufferings of the Messiah; seeing, besides the passover, they had, by divine appointment, many other lively types, figures, and institutions, which were designed for that very same end, such as the sacrifices of slain beasts, which they frequently witnessed in the temple: yea, every day they had, both morning and evening, a lamb killed in the temple, its blood poured out, and its flesh burnt on the altar, for a sacrifice to God for their sins; which did in a most eminent and lively manner represent to them the death, bloodshed, sufferings, and bitter agonies of Christ, the great sacrifice for the sins of the world, just in the same manner as the passover did; only it was not eaten in every house, as that was. So that we see a plain reason why the Jews did not stand in need of such a frequent celebration of the passover to be a remembrance of Christ under the law, as we do of the Lord's supper under the New Testament times, when we have no other ordinance instituted to keep up the remembrance of Christ's death and sufferings, but this alone: and therefore it ought much more frequently to be celebrated than the Jewish passover was.

3. Supposing the Jews had no other ordinance but the passover to keep up the remembrance of the Messiah that was to come; yet, seeing our Messiah hath now come, and actually sacrificed himself upon the cross for our redemption, hath fully completed the work, and made far more bright displays of his love and glory to us Christians than he did to the Jews under the law, and hath instituted the Lord's supper for a memorial for what he hath done and suffered, limiting us to no time, but enjoining frequency in the use of it; I say, seeing the case is so with us, we are under many strong ties to be more zealous and frequent in celebrating the memorials of Christ's love to us in the Lord's supper, than the Jews were to do it in the passover. The apostles and primitive Christians were so sensible of this, that they thought themselves bound to remember Christ crucified once a week in their gospel passover, which the Jews did but once a year in theirs. From all which, we see no argument can be brought, from the Jews' annual custom in celebrating the passover, to justify annual communion.

OBJECT. II. To administrate the Lord's supper frequently, would tend to diminish the respect and reverence which is due to it, and at length bring it into contempt among the people.

ANS. 1. If we make conscience of our duty, our Lord will see to the credit of his own ordinance.

2. Will any say, that the apostles and primitive pastors brought this ordinance into contempt by celebrating of it every Lord's day? Did they not esteem and prize it much higher than we who celebrate it but once a year? And why should we think, that the administrating of the Lord's supper twice, thrice, or four times in the year, would at all derogate from the credit of it.

3. Were this reason valid against the frequent dispensing of this ordinance, why not against other ordinances also? And so we should but seldom preach, or read the scriptures in the audience of the people; we should seldom pray or sing psalms with our flocks, lest we contribute to lessen the esteem and reverence due to these ordinances, by the frequent use of them.

4. Are not there many serious exercised Christians, who communicate almost every Sabbath during the summer season, when they can have the occasion in neighbouring congregations, who can tell us that they reap spiritual advantage by so doing; that their esteem of the ordinance is much increased, and that they do not at all find that their frequent partaking tends to bring this awful institution into contempt with them? And why should it be thought that their communicating twice, or even four times a year, in their own congregations, at a convenient distance, would produce that bad effect? No: I am persuaded it would not; for the oftener that this sacrament is worthily received, instead of diminishing our respect, it increaseth our reverence of God, and our affection to our Saviour. I am sure, a conscientious owning of God's authority is a greater sign of holy reverence, than the neglect of his institutions.

5. We may perhaps think to keep up the credit of this solemn ordinance, among those who are not the better sort, by seldom dispensing it; but it should be minded, that it is not true esteem which ariseth merely from the rarity of a thing, but that which springeth from knowledge of its intrinsic worth, and experience of its usefulness: and those people who have no heart-acquaintance with precious Christ, and the ends, uses, and success of his ordinance, will never have a due respect unto them. Let us by all means recommend to such persons the worth and excellency of Christ, show them their daily need of him, and his daily usefulness to them, and press their making suitable preparation, by searching themselves and closing with him, before they be admitted to partake; and then we need not much fear the frequency would detract from the reputation of this ordinance: for frequent experience of its usefulness would beget the highest esteem of it, and sharpen the appetites of people for it. As he prayeth best, and with most delight, that prayeth oftenest; so a worthy communicant increaseth in the love of God and of religion, the oftener he receives: the more acquaintance and communion he attains to with Jesus Christ in this ordinance, he values it still the more. I cannot think this blessed sacrament will be undervalued by frequent repetitions, but by persons most unworthy, who ought not much to be regarded; for no true-hearted Israelite would loathe his heavenly manna because it is common, and afforded us in plenty.

Lastly, And with all due submission to others, I strongly incline to have a great regard to the judgment of the famous Mr. Calvin, and many learned and godly divines, who are so far from thinking that annual communicating is a mean to preserve the esteem of this ordinance, and prevent people's carelessness and formality in receiving, that they rather judge it a device of Satan, to cherish sloth and security in sin, to stifle true Christian love, to discourage endeavours after serious godliness, and to obstruct very much the life and continued exercise of religion.

OBJECT. III. We see how much the other sacrament, baptism, is contemned, because of its frequent repetition; and so might it also fare with this.

Ans. 1. If the people's contempt of sacraments be a good argument against the frequency of one sacrament, it is as good against the frequency of another: and so we ought to set up for the administration of baptism but once in the year, to preserve the esteem and solemnity of it, as much as we do for that of the other sacrament. Are they not both precious institutions of the same Lord? Both seals of the same covenant? Why then should we put the one at so great distance from the other, and seek to raise its honour so much above the other?

2. Though baptism be frequently administrate, yet the Lord doth still keep up the reputation of his ordinance, so that no man is easy to be excluded from it: yea, people generally have stronger impressions of the necessity of this sacrament than of the other, notwithstanding of all our endeavours to maintain the credit of the other more than this; which may teach us, that we ought still to go on in the way of our duty, and leave it to God to see to the credit of his own institutions.

3. It is not so much because of the frequent administration of baptism, that people slight it, as because they, not being to partake of it themselves, do commonly apprehend they are no more but spectators (though indeed there is much more incumbent on them;) but were they bound to partake frequently of this sacrament, as of the Lord's supper, and that under the pain of Christ's highest displeasure, if they either neglected it, or performed it slightly; all sober people would reckon themselves obliged to attend it when they had the opportunity of doing so, and that with some awe and fear too.

OBJECT. IV. There is more slightness and formality amongst the communicants in those churches where the Lord's supper is frequently dispensed, than where it is seldom.

Ans. 1. This is not generally true; for as there may be much slightness and formality in some places where it is but seldom dispensed, so there is much devotion and seriousness in other places where it is frequently administered.

2. The people's slightness in receiving, may proceed very much from the pastor's slightness in administering. Were due pains taken to keep back the unworthy, to inform people of the greatness of the work, to warn them of the danger of unworthy receiving, to observe fasts, preparation and thanksgiving days; to choose suitable texts, preach awakening doctrine, make particular application, and to fence the Lord's table with awful solemnity, perhaps there would not be such slightness among the people in receiving.

OBJECT. V. It will not be easy to get different texts and subjects suitable to such frequent communions.

Ans. A crucified Jesus is a subject most suitable, and one so large and copious as cannot be exhausted. The apostle, while he preached at Corinth, determined to know nothing among the people, but "Christ and him crucified," 1 Cor. ii. 2. He resolved to make this the great and constant subject of his sermons; and can any think it too much to preach upon this theme, twice, thrice, or four times a-year?

Certainly a crucified Jesus is the spring and scope, the matter and end, of all gospel-preaching. Every thing we say is reducible to him; and the design of all is to exalt him, who is the great founder of our religion, and the foundation of all our hopes: when we dehort from sins and vices, we do it mainly because they were the cause of Christ's sufferings, and tend to crucify him afresh: when we exhort to duty, we do it chiefly from this topic, that we should live to him that died for us: and that the love of Christ should constrain us to follow his pattern, and obey his precepts. We press duties as a necessary fruit of faith in Christ, and of love to him; and we teach, that they are only to be performed by his strength, and accepted through his merits. Nay, Christ crucified is the scope and substance of the whole Bible; "for to him give all the prophets witness," Acts x. 43.

A crucified Christ is a subject so pleasant and so fertile, that we cannot be strained to preach directly thereupon many times a year, if we take a view of these things in him, viz. the infinite dignity and glory of his person; the perfections of God that shine in him; the freeness and greatness of his love; his eternal undertaking; his glorious suretyship; his wonderful incarnation; his three-fold office, significant metaphors and types, whereby Christ and his benefits are represented; his manifold sweet relations to his people; his mediatory fullness; his deep humiliation; his innocent life; his holy example; his heavenly doctrine; his unparalleled sufferings; his meritorious death; his victorious resurrection; his triumphant ascension; his prevalent intercession; his glorious coming again; the excellency of that covenant he hath confirmed; the sufficiency of the sacrifice he hath offered; the necessity and completeness of the righteousness he hath wrought; the innumerable benefits of his death; the unsearchable riches of his grace; his exceeding great and precious promises; the incomparable virtue of his blood; our union with him by faith; our adoption by relation to him; our justification by his merit; our sanctification by his Spirit; our fighting and conquering under his banner; our protection under his shadow; our bearing burdens by his grace; our performing duties by his strength; our holy walk in obedience to his injunctions; the thankfulness we owe to him in heart and life; and the sweet communion believers have with him in duties and ordinances. Yea, we have blessings unspeakable, grace and glory, peace and pardon, light and life, strength and growth, riches and wisdom, joy and hope, perseverance in grace, comfort in affliction, conduct in life, throughbearing at death, resurrection from the grave, absolution at the tribunal, happiness through eternity, and all things coming to us with and by a crucified Jesus. So that in this noble subject there is a perpetual plenty and variety of suitable matter for sacramental occasions.

OBJECT. VI. To administer the Lord's supper so frequently, would occasion very much labour and toil to the administrators.

Ans. 1. Did we dispense this sacrament more frequently, probably the labour and toil would be lessened; we might come to find our people habitually in a better case for that solemn ordinance than at present generally they are; so that less pains in exciting, instructing, and preparing them for it, might be more successful than greater is now.

2. We have no cause to distrust our faithful and kind Lord, who doth not fail to give strength and furniture to his servants, as their needs require, according to his gracious promise, Deut. xxxiii. 25, "As thy days so shall thy strength be." We have experience hitherto of his pitying our weakness, supplying our wants, and helping us in time of need; so that we may assure ourselves that he will send none to warfare upon their own charges.

3. If we put the glory of our Master, the advantage of our people, and the increase of our reward in the balance with our labour, I hope we will not think it deserveth once to be mentioned. Though we had no more to expect, it is a great reward in itself to be honoured to bring glory to our Redeemer, and to advance the salvation of immortal souls: and seeing the season of our capacity for either is so very short, with what cheerfulness should we bestir ourselves to ply that blessed work? What a pleasure would it be to see Christ in esteem, sin in disgrace, the world in contempt, and religion in prosperity amongst men! Well then, would we contribute thereto in our station; would we have a lively remembrance of God, and Christ, and heaven, kept up in the world; would we have our people closely and constantly to bear in mind the evil of sin, the preciousness of immortal souls, the love of God to mankind-sinners, the death and sufferings of the Son of God in our room: let us frequently administer the Lord's supper in our congregations.

Would we help the carelessness of our people's minds, and the weakness of their memories; would we give our hearers a compendious and affecting view of the Christian religion; would we bring them to have fresh and lasting impressions of its truths and doctrines;—I know no more effectual means for it: for, in this solemn ordinance, we have man's fall and disease, together with his recovery and remedy, set forth to the life; and that in such a way as makes impression on the outward senses, so that the eye may affect the heart.

Would we have sin and vice kept under constant rebukes among our people, let us keep their eyes always fixed upon the bleeding wounds of a crucified Jesus: would we have them carefully to maintain family religion, secret duties, and a holy, tender walk; let us constrain them to it by the love of a dying Jesus, frequently set before their eyes in this ordinance. This, through the divine blessing, would be an excellent means and help to carry about with us always the dying of the Lord Jesus, and to make the print of his wounds deep and lasting on our hearts.

If we duly ponder these things, I hope it will appear that the advantage of the frequent celebration of the Lord's supper will abundantly recompense our small toil and pains.

OBJECT. VII. The unworthiness of the people is a great discouragement to the frequent celebration of the Lord's supper among them: we have but few that are in any measure fit to be admitted to it.

Ans. 1. If this reason were valid, it would conclude as strongly against the dispensing of this ordinance at all, as against the frequency of it: and we know an argument that would prove too much proves nothing.

2. I know many are unworthy, but all are not alike; and the unfitness of many cannot excuse us from administering to those that are in some measure fit. As it is a sin for parents to keep back from their children their due and necessary food, because of some unworthy persons that are in the family; so it is a sin for pastors to withhold the soul-nourishing meal from those of their people that have a right to it: for, though not a few slight and abuse it, yet there are others hungry and needful of it; and these ought not to be denied the advantage of frequent partaking, for the fault of their neighbours.

It is the saying of one, that we find fault upon good ground with the papists for denying one of the elements to the people: and how can we justify these that deny both elements to their people, at least for a long time?

3. Though the number of our communicants be small, that should not discourage us from our duty; for the divine blessing is not tied to numbers. God did own the institution of the passover, though there were but few that eat it together; and our blessed Saviour had but a small number that did partake with him at the first communion: but, for our encouragement in that case, he graciously promiseth, that "where two or three are met together in his name, he will own them with his presence and blessing."

OBJECT. VIII. To administer this sacrament so frequently as before-mentioned, would require considerable expenses to furnish communion ele- ments, and otherwise; and we have no sufficient fund for that charge.

Ans. 1. Though we should be put to more charge this way than formerly, I hope no faithful minister will say, that this consideration should be laid in balance with the glory of God, and good of souls; we should all be willing to spend and be spent for Christ: and whatever we expend of our private goods this way, is surely lent to the Lord, who will repay it.

2. The law provides a fund in every parish for such expenses; and, where it is not settled, our judges are very favourable to the church, and give a liberal allowance to such ministers as apply for it: and, no doubt, if the sacrament were more frequently celebrated, they would not grudge to augment the fund, when it is not sufficient.

3. If a sufficient fund cannot be had otherwise, let collections be made in parishes for defraying this charge, as Eusebius tells us was done by the primitive Christians in this case; and surely there is no honest-hearted Christian or communicant but would contribute liberally for that effect, rather than the Lord's work should be hindered.

Lastly, We may see from the old acts of assembly, that the General Assembly, 1638, had this very objection under their consideration, and declareth that the charges should rather be paid out of that day's collection, than that the congregation want the more frequent use of the sacrament. But I hope the General Assemblies of this church will in due time take this and other objections under further consideration, provide effectual answers and remedies thereunto; so that this solemn ordinance shall be more frequently celebrated amongst us than it is at present: and I wish all may pray fervently, that, together with the foresaid laudable practice, something of the warm love and zeal of the ancient Christians may be happily revived in our land.

Before I conclude this preface, there is another thing I would advertise the reader, that in the following treatise I have endeavoured to keep by the form of sound words in use amongst us, avoiding both the extremes of Antinomianism and Legalism, seeing the principles of this church guide us equally to avoid both the one and the other. And it must be acknowledged, that it is not easy to shun these extremes; for people commonly, when their zeal is excited against one extreme, are in great hazard of sliding insensibly into the other. And indeed, not only fools, but some of the greatest and wisest of men, have erred in this respect: it was Mr. Baxter's zeal and great keenness against Antinomianism, that drove him to some rash and dangerous assertions on the other side. And this should be a warning to us, always to take heed to ourselves, and be careful to guard on all sides; for we are still in hazard this way, and especially when things come to warm disputations with us.

It is possible that some who preach the gospel, may pick out some of the glorious truths thereof; such as "the freedom of grace in the salvation of sinners, our justification by the righteousness of Jesus Christ as our surety, the excellency of faith in Christ, the privileges of the covenant, and blessings of Christ's purchase," and may make these truths almost the only subject of their preaching; and yet, perhaps, manage them so unhappily as not to lead people to study regeneration of heart, holiness of life, abhorrence of sin, tenderness of walk, and the conscientious practice of all commanded duties. And surely in this way of doing they in great measure miss the design of our Saviour's incarnation, and the end of the doctrine of grace, which is "to destroy the works of the devil, and to teach men to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world."

On the other hand, it is as possible that others may insist very much in enforcing morality, and make very fine rational harangues of its excellency; and yet make little use of gospel motives to press it, and be at little pains to show the gospel principles from whence it must proceed. Likewise they may preach against vice and immorality, and warn people of the evil of it; and yet take up but little time to teach them concerning the root and spring of vice (viz. our fall in Adam, and the corruption of our natures), and the necessity of an inward change by a work of regeneration, for healing of the inward disease and plague of the heart. Also they may press holy duties very much, and yet make little mention of the true fountain and source of holiness (viz. our union with Christ by faith, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost), and speak little of the necessity of Christ's blood to wash our performances. Now both these extremes, in the way of preaching, are equally to be avoided.

It is a prevailing conceit among many, that there is no more requisite to make a man a Christian than morality, or a blameless walk before men. Morality indeed is a very comely thing, and most necessary both to beautify and preserve human societies; and therefore it is to be wished that there were much more of it in the world than we see there is, and every preacher of the gospel ought strongly to recommend the practice of it; but yet it is certain that morality is not sufficient to make a man a Christian, seeing it hath been found in heathens, and those that were ignorant of Christ, and the way of salvation through faith in him.

Christianity indeed doth enforce morality and moral virtues by the strongest motives and arguments; but in the mean time it teacheth us that these virtues are never good and acceptable to God, until they be the fruit of the Spirit's operation, and spring from their proper principles, faith in Christ, and love to him: they must be grafted in Christ as their root, have a new principle to quicken them, and a new end to direct them, before moral virtues can commence Christian graces. Unregenerate morality will never please God: let men advance it never so far, yet, till the heart be renewed, it is still but nature at best; and the fruit is always sour that grows not upon the root, Christ: it can never be acceptable unto God, while Christ's strength and Spirit is not sought and employed in it, nor his righteousness to cover it. So that there is a great difference betwixt morality and gospel holiness.

A moral man, then, though he profess himself a Christian, yet he really is not so, if he lives not as one that looks for and receives daily influences from Christ; if he hath not Christ still in his undertakings, duties, and affections, and be not saying, "How empty and vain are all my duties without Christ! yea, though I could do never so much, I should be utterly lost and undone, if it were not for Christ my surety, and his righteousness. I count all but loss and dung, that I may be found in him."

This church a good many years ago manifested much zeal against Antinomianism, and doctrines which seemed to tend that way: and surely it is incumbent upon all churches to watch and take care that the obligations of Christians to holiness and good works, and to all kinds of duties, both of the first and second table, should never be in the least weakened, by the preachers of the gospel, under the specious pretext of exalting free grace; seeing free grace and strict holiness nobly consist together.

Again, on the other hand, it should equally be the church's concern to labour to prevent the spreading of legalism, or the preaching of morality and the practice of duties in a legal strain; that is, in a way tending to the neglect of Christ and his righteousness, or to the disparagement of the doctrine of free grace. It was the flagrant reports of the abounding of that sort of moral preaching, especially among younger clergymen, that occasioned the bringing in an overture to the General Assembly, 1726, for an act to discourage the same, and to direct to the right method of preaching Christ, and how to preach morality in an evangelical strain. But, though endeavours were used by several to get this overture turned into an act, it was hindered by some leading men, lest it should reflect upon the characters of some preachers to whom they had respect: so that an act of this kind could never be got brought to a bearing until the Assembly, 1737: and then those who were most zealous to promote the act, in order to get it the more unanimously agreed to, were fain to drop out of its preamble the true cause of making it, namely, the abounding of legal preaching in the land, or of a wrong strain of preaching the gospel. But, notwithstanding of this, the act itself is of excellent use, if duly regarded and put in execution; and without this the best acts in the world signify nothing. O that I could persuade all ministers and preachers of the gospel to consider and observe the foresaid act! It would surely fare the better, both with themselves and their hearers: and if no more may be done for that purpose, let me at least use some means to get the act made known to them, by transcribing it in this place.

“EDINBURGH, May 21, 1736, Sess. 8.

“The General Assembly being moved with zeal for the honour of God and our Lord Jesus Christ, especially at a time when the Christian revelation is openly impugned, and infidelity, deism, and other errors, do so much prevail: they do hereby recommend to all ministers and preachers, seriously to consider and observe the directory of this church concerning the preaching of the word, which is approved by the General Assembly, 1645: and, in particular, that they be careful to warn their hearers against any thing tending to Atheism, Deism, Arianism, Socinianism, Arminianism, Bourignianism, Popery, Superstition, Antinomianism, or any other errors. And that, in their sermons, they insist frequently upon the truth, necessity, and excellency of supernatural revelation, the supreme deity of the Son and Holy Ghost, as well as of the Father; together with the oneness of the Godhead, our sinful and lost estate by nature, the necessity of supernatural grace, and of faith in the righteousness of Christ, without which the best works cannot please God: and that they make it the great scope of their sermons, to lead sinners from a covenant of works to a covenant of grace for life and salvation, and from sin and self to precious Christ. And the General Assembly recommends to all who preach the gospel, when they handle the doctrines of God’s redeeming love, and of his free grace in the justification and salvation of sinners, the blessings of the Redeemer’s purchase, and privileges of the new and better covenant, to study to manage these subjects, so as to lead their hearers unto an abhorrence of sin, the love of God and our neighbours, and the practice of universal holiness; seeing it is one great end of the gospel to destroy the works of the devil, and to teach men to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. Upon which account, it is incumbent on all who preach the gospel to insist, not only upon the necessity and excellency of faith in Jesus Christ for salvation, but also upon the necessity of repentance for sin, and reformation from it; and to press the practice of all moral duties, both with respect to the first and second table of the law, as indispensably necessary, in obedience to God’s command, to testify our gratitude to him, to evidence the sincerity of our faith, and for the benefit of human society, the adorning the profession of religion, and making us meet for eternal life, seeing without holiness no man can see the Lord.

“And the Assembly do seriously recommend to all ministers and preachers of the gospel, that in pressing moral duties, or obedience to the law, they show the nature and excellency of gospel holiness, and enforce conformity to the moral law, both in heart and life, not from principles of reason only, but also and more especially of revelation. And, in order to attain thereto, it is necessary to show men the corruption and depravity of human nature by their fall in Adam, their natural impotence for, and aversion to, what is spiritually good, and to lead them to the true and only source of all grace and holiness, viz. union with Christ, by the Holy Spirit’s working faith in us, and renewing us more and more after the image of God: and to let their hearers know, that they must first be grafted into Christ as their root, before their fruit can be savoury unto God; that they must have a new principle to animate and a new end to direct them, before their actions become gracious and acceptable in the sight of God: and that they teach them the necessity of living by faith on the Son of God, in a constant looking to and dependence upon him as the great Author of all gracious influences for the performance of every duty: and withal, that after their best performances and attainments, they must count them but loss and dung in point of justification before God; and to make it their great desire only to be found in Christ and his righteousness. And that ministers, in the application of their sermons, endeavour rightly to divide the word of truth, speaking distinctly to such various cases of the converted and unconverted, as arise natively from the subjects they have been handling; and that, in the whole of their discourses, they take care to suit themselves to the capacity of their hearers, as to matter, method, and expression; and to the prevailing sins of the time and place, with all prudent and zealous freedom and plainness: as also, that they make gospel subjects their main theme and study, and press with all earnestness the practice of moral duties in a gospel manner: and that they forbear delivering any thing in public, that may tend more to amusement than edification; and beware of bringing into their sermons and public discourses, matters of doubtful disputation, which tend to gender strife rather than to promote the edification of Christians. And the assembly exhort all to study to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

“And, finally, the General Assembly recommends to all professors of divinity, to use their best endeavours to have the students under their care well acquainted with the true method of preaching the gospel, as above directed; and that presbyteries, at their private censures, inquire concerning the observation of this act.”

Now, blessed be the Lord that there is such a public act in record, as a standing witness for Christ in the midst of all our backslidings and defections: may God put it in the hearts of all who preach the gospel among us, to observe the directions of it; that the scope and tendency of their sermons may still be to exalt Christ, and raise him above all in the business in our salvation; to press the doctrine of regeneration and the new birth; to preach up justification by Christ's righteousness alone, apprehended by faith, and the necessity of the inward operations of the Holy Spirit, which Christ hath purchased and promised for working that faith in us, and for bringing about the gracious change of the new birth, and carrying on a work of sanctification in us, and for enabling us to live the spiritual life! This being the scope of the act, happy were it for the land if it were also the main scope of our sermons. But, after all, if professors of divinity do not their part in training up students according to it, and if presbyteries do not theirs in calling to account those who do not observe the act, the church will not reap much benefit by it, as I fear she hath not yet done: for, if she had, “what meaneth the bleating of the sheep,” and “the lowing of the oxen,” which we still hear? what means the murmuring of serious Christians from several corners, for want of the proper food of their souls? what mean the continued complaints of the growth of deism and infidelity through the land? It is a just observe, that when moral preaching in a Christless way doth much abound, it makes way for the increase of deism and infidelity; for when persons do long hear moral sermons, and little of Christ in them, or the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, they are tempted to think there is but little difference between them and the discourses of Seneca and other heathen moralists; and therefore, that they may be safe enough, and win to heaven, without Christianity at all, and that every moral man is a good enough Christian.

Oh! this is a fundamental defection, of most heinous guilt; it is a God-provoking and unchurching evil, which all the ministers and lovers of Christ should be deeply concerned about: for if we suffer ourselves and others to fall from our regard and love to glorious Christ, neglect to exalt him in our sermons, and to preach salvation to men only through Christ's suretyship and sacrifice, and to tell the world, and inculcate it daily upon them, that this, and this only, is the way for them to obtain pardon, peace, grace, glory, and every good thing; I say, if we turn careless and negligent in what so nearly concerns Christ's glory, and our own office as Christian preachers, may he not justly plead a controversy with our church, smite us with the most awful judgments, suffer a flood of infidelity, error, and profanity, to invade us, withdraw his Spirit from ordinances and judicatories, infatuate our councils and conduct, mingle a perverse spirit in the midst of us, and give us up to the most unnatural divisions and mournful breaches among ourselves? Ah, how much is this the ease with us at this day! And no wonder, seeing Christ's glory is so little minded, notwithstanding of the foresaid excellent act of assembly, and many other good acts, that are sadly neglected this day by ministers and preachers among us. And how can we expect that any individual man should pay regard to them, and particularly to the 7th act of assembly 1736, concerning preaching, when he sees whole judicatories pay no respect to the 14th act of that assembly against intrusions, nor to the 10th act of assembly 1712, and the 9th act of assembly 1715, concerning the usurpation of patronage upon the church, and her right of calling her own ministers; which acts are conform to other ancient acts of this church and to our reformation principles declared in “Second Book of Discipline” (see chap. 3, par. 4, 5, chap. 12, par. 9, 10,) and which are sworn to in our national covenant, and ratified by many acts both of church and state?

Now, how strange and surprising is it, to see men deliberately going contrary to these excellent acts and deeds of the church, both ancient and modern (which are well founded upon the word of God and sound reason), by drawing on the yoke of patronage upon the church without necessity, voluntarily strengthening the hands of patrons in their spiritual tyranny, and encouraging men in that vile church-breaking and soul-destroying practice of accepting presentations (which no law requires), and adhering to them in opposition to the people's choice? and yet this way is continued, even after conviction, by long dear-bought experience of the pernicious effect of it. I well remember the time (yea, it is not above twenty years ago) when it was thought to be the universal opinion, that accepting of presentations was inconsistent with Presbyterian principles, and the rights and rules of this church, which we are solemnly engaged to maintain by our formula 1711, and otherwise: at that time, presentation- hunters among Presbyterians would have appeared as monsters, and their society frightful; but now, alas! they are become tame and familiar creatures to us. It is this woeful practice, together with the itel of pleasing great men, that hath of late been the great snare to draw in judicatories to go across to our declared principles maintained in this church ever since the reformation (which we should have firmly cleaved to, and never declined from in any case), by making intrusions and violent settlements in Christian congregations, to the ruin, alas! of the glorious gospel, and of precious souls therein: and upon that account alone, though we had no acts nor declared principles against intrusions, it is astonishing to think how any man, that hath the glory of his Master and the saving of souls at heart, should ever concur in a violent settlement that is manifestly destructive to both. That is an awful threatening to ministers, Jer. xxiii., "Woe be unto the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture, saith the Lord:" and yet, notwithstanding, we see many, who go under the character of wise men, still persisting in that miserable infatuation and destructive course, driving multitudes of hearty friends and serious Christians out of the church, and never gaining any to it of those they intend to gratify; yet acting as if they were joined in conspiracy against the Commons of Scotland, and were carrying on a plot to strengthen the secession from the church. But let me tell these wise brethren, if our conventions and parliaments had paid so little regard to the inclinations of the people of Scotland, as our judicatories do now, we would not have had these courts at this day to sit in. I shall not insist here upon this melancholy subject, having said so much on it elsewhere; only let me add this word, if leading men go on in these methods, though they may enjoy their ease, power, and preferments, for a while; yet upon their grave-stones it is too likely it may be written, "Here lie the men who destroyed the most beautiful national church and constitution that was in the world."

But, alas! we have cause not only to lament our departing from reformation-principles, and weakening the establishment, but also our shameful defection from vital and practical religion. The power of godliness is at a very low ebb among us, and little of God's Spirit is to be found in our administrations: God is angry, and threatens to cast us off. Ah! great ground have we to bewail our mournful case, and cry with the prophet, under the fearful tokens of God's anger, Jer. xiv; Lam. v., "Hast thou utterly rejected Judah? Hath thy soul leathed Zion? Why hast thou smitten us, and there is no healing for us? We looked for peace, and there is no good; and for the time of healing, and behold trouble.

We acknowledge, O Lord, our wickedness, and the iniquity of our fathers: for we have sinned against thee. Do not abhor us, for thy name's sake? do not disgrace the throne of thy glory: remember, break not thy covenant with us. The anger of the Lord hath divided us. The crown hath fallen from our head: woe unto us that we have sinned. Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever, forsake us so long time? Turn thou us unto thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned: renew our days as of old." There are many other passages in Jeremiah's writings very suitable to our present case, such as Jer. xii. 10, 11, "Many pastors have destroyed my vineyard, they have trodden my portion under foot, they have made my pleasant portion a desolate wilderness. They have made it desolate, and, being desolate, it mourneth unto me." Well, what can the sons of Zion do for their mother in such distress? They must even bring her case to the Physician of Israel, when it is wholly desperate and incurable as to human help, and cry, as in Psal. lx. 2, "O God, give us help from trouble; for vain is the help of man." Let us fall in with Christ's call to the man with the lunatic child, whom his disciples could not cure, Mat. xvii. Bring him hither to me, saith our Lord. Let us bring the case to Christ, when it is desperate and incurable by all others. The church's extremity is Christ's opportunity: he can help her, even then when all her friends are going with their hands on their loins in the greatest anguish and trouble; according to that word, Jer. xxx. 6, 7, "Wherefore do I see every man with his hands on his loins, as a woman in travail, and all faces are turned into paleness? Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it; it is even the time of Jacob's trouble." Yet even then, when Jacob's trouble comes to that extremity that none can match it, the Lord pities and adds that word, "But he shall be saved out of it." A matchless trouble cannot nonplus his saving skill. Now, how doth he save Jacob out of such extremities? Not by human might or power, but by his own Spirit, Zech. iv. 6. O that God would help all Zion's friends to plead with him for an out-pouring of his Spirit upon ministers, preachers, students, and all ranks, for saving his covenanted land out of extreme darkness, and reviving primitive Christianity among us! This, and nothing else, will do it. O that he would speak such a comfortable word to Scotland, as that he said to the Jews when their state was low, Hag. ii. 5, "According to the word that I covenanted with you when ye came out of Egypt, so my Spirit remaineth among you." Fear ye not! He hath remembered his covenant with Scotland in former times, and surprised our fathers with gracious effusions of his Spirit: let us steadily look up to him, who hath still bowels of pity, and can help us as well as others in distress.

We have heard of the wonderful goodness of the Lord of late, in pitying other nations and countries, when under great darkness, deadness, and distress, by sending down his Spirit to revive his work among them in an extraordinary manner, which may be ground of hope to others. How glorious was the appearance of his sovereign grace about eight or nine years ago in Saltzburg in Germany, in determining about twenty thousand of the inhabitants to embrace the reformed religion, merely by reading of the bible; yea, and to become so zealous for it, as to be willing to forsake houses, lands, temporal goods, and relations, and all they had in the world, that they might enjoy the preaching of the gospel.

How marvellously did he display the riches of his grace, and the work of his Spirit, in the wonderful conversions of great numbers in Northampton, and other parts of New England, by the ministry of Mr. Jonathan Edwards, and others in that country, about five or six years ago, of which we had a well attested narrative published among us?

Nay, within these two years we have most surprising accounts of the goings of our God, and the effusions of his Spirit on several places of Old England and Wales, our neighbouring countries, where, by the ministry of Mr. George Whitfield, Mr. John Wesley, and others (who insist mainly on the doctrine of the new birth, and justification by faith in Christ), great numbers, even of the most profligate, are convinced and pricked in their hearts, and brought to cry out, "What shall we do to be saved?" Which extraordinary work I hear doth still continue in divers places of England.

And this very same year we have the like accounts from Georgia, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New York, and other of the English plantations in America, by the ministry of Mr. Whitfield and others. Likewise, we have very strange accounts of the success of the gospel in many different parts of the world, even among the heathens, by Count Zinzendorf, bishop of the Moravian church, and his missionaries.

Verily these good news which we now hear, of God's glorious appearances in the gospel, look as if God was about to accomplish his promises to his church in the latter days, "when the whole earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord." O how refreshing are the remotest dawns of the glory of these days?

Also, they serve to teach us how easy it is for God to rise up, when he pleaseth, for the revival of his work in decayed churches, when their case seems to be very hopeless. How easy it is for him to raise up instruments to preach his gospel with such life and power, as to awaken whole towns and countries of sleepy sinners together to hearken to the gospel call? He can make a nation to be born at once; which should encourage us to wait on him still. And now, when our blessed Lord is graciously pleased to mount his white horse, as king of Zion, and make his circuit in other countries, to give such evidences of his glorious power, and send down pleasant showers of his grace among them, and make many to bow down at his feet: may we not hope that he hath a great work on the wheels, and is on his march to go through his church in a conquering manner, to confound deists and infidels, and quell the daring boldness of his adversaries? And, in that case, may not Scotland look for a visit from him among the rest, and even plead that ancient kindness may revive towards it? May we not draw hope from the second Psalm, and other scripture passages, where God promiseth to "give his son the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession; and that the isles shall see his salvation, and wait for his law," among which places Scotland certainly is? And though it be a land that is little and despised among the nations, yet he, whose thoughts are not like man's thoughts, has showed a distinguishing respect to it, by his early sending the gospel to it; and, when overspread with darkness, promoting reformation in it against both the power of the mighty and counsels of the crafty; nay, advancing reformation so far, and making gospel light so clear and powerful in it, by the remarkable down-pouring of his Spirit, that Scotland was noticed by divines of other places, and called "Philadelphia," and the "morning-star of the reformation." Nay, he took Scotland into covenant with himself in a peculiar manner, and gave singular tokens of his presence with his people: he hath wonderfully appeared for the interests of religion, when almost sunk in it: he hath raised up saviours on our mount Zion, and brought about great deliverances for it (as for Israel of old) when grievously oppressed and brought low. And, from these ancient and peculiar proofs of our Redeemer's care, may we not humbly hope that he will not leave the land that is given him by his father, and solemnly devoted to him by its inhabitants?

Our decays and backslidings from God, indeed, are very great, fearful, and threatening; yet, he hath still left a mourning and praying remnant in the land, who are sensible of the want of his Spirit and presence in ordinances, desire to lament after the Lord, and cry for all the abominations that are found in the midst of the city: and though her desolations are mournful, the breaches in her walls many, and the glory of the Lord is gone up from the cherub; yet it seems still to hover and stand over the threshold of the door, and there is a remnant among us wrestling and pleading against his departure. There is a number who take pleasure in our Zion, have a kindness for her stones and rubbish, and cease not to lift up a prayer for the remnant that is left: and we see gracious promises made to the prayers and tears, wrestlings and witnessings, of a small godly remnant, Psal. xii. 5; cii. 13, 14, 17. Alas, that this remnant in our land is so sadly broken and divided in the way and manner of their witnessings at this day! O that the meek Jesus, who rules in Zion, would meeken all their hearts, save from a spirit of bitterness, and from dangerous extremes in separating from one another! O that the God of peace, that hath the command of hearts, would unite his broken remnant together, give them a Christ-like spirit, and make them one stick in his hand! It is nowise difficult to him to accomplish this union, even when the case is most hopeless in our eyes, and instruments to meditate for healing breaches are out of sight. Let us remember and plead that promise, Jer. xxx. 17, "For I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord, because they have called thee an outcast, saying, This is Zion whom no man seeketh after." Many of God's worthies, now in glory, have gone off the stage in the belief and hope that God would yet arise and have mercy on his Zion, that he would signally build her up, and appear in his glory; yea, that there would be more glorious gospel days seen in Scotland than either we or our fathers have beheld. Surely these considerations may encourage God's remnant in Scotland, to wait and pray in hope, however dark and cloudy our day be at present.

In the mean time, let us rejoice and bless the Lord, that he is pleased to pour out his Spirit, make bare his holy arm, and glorify his power in other parts of the world, yea, and get himself a great name amongst those that have not known him, whatever he doth with us: may his right hand and holy arm get him the victory among them more and more, that we may hear gospel songs from the uttermost parts of the earth! Likewise, let us mourn for those sins, both old and late, which provoke God to make our heavens as brass, and to withhold those pleasant showers from us he is letting fall upon others: and let us plead that Scotland, which formerly was the glory of all lands for the effusions of the Spirit, may not now be past by and left behind all others. O let her fleece be dry, when many others have their fleeces wet; and, when they are getting abundance of rain, may we have a little cloud appearing like a man's hand to prognosticate a shower is coming! May the Lord rise up from his place, and come mercifully to decide the quarrel between deists and us; and let infidels, and the profane scoffers of these last days, see that the bible is the word of God, and that the preaching of it is his institution; that there is a supernatural power attending it, for changing men's hearts as well as lives! May he let the world see it is not fine moral harangues, nor the enticing words of men's wisdom, but the plain preaching of a crucified Jesus, is the only remedy for lost sinners, that becomes the power of God to the conversion and salvation of men!

But some have their questions, "By whom shall Jacob arise? will he show wonders to the dead? shall the dead arise and praise him?" These, indeed, are non-plussing difficulties to us, but none at all to him who raiseth the dead, and calleth the things which be not, as though they were. He hath still spirit and clay enough for new instruments; yea, he can make strangers build up his walls, and the greatest enemies become zealous for his glory. And, however unlikely the appearance of things may be at present, both scripture and experience assure us, that the time of God's people's extremity (as I said before) is his usual season of appearing for them; "it is in the mount that the Lord will be seen:" so may the text be rendered, Gen. xxii. 14. God did not appear any way for Isaac's deliverance all the three days' journey he made with his father, till he came to the top of the mount, and was just ready to be sacrificed: neither did he interpose for the Jews in Esther's time, until the decree was past, and day fixed, and but a hair-breadth betwixt them and ruin; then God steps in, and posts are instantly dispatched to stop the execution. Thus the Lord acts agreably to his promise, Deut. xxxii. 36, "For the Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone, and that there is none shut up or left." Here, then, is food for faith and prayer in the most straitening times. O for grace to pray in hope, mourn in hope, labour in hope, and wait in hope, seeing our dearest Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, who is our hope, is gone up, and sits at the helm! O when shall the power of this great Lord be present to heal us! Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Amen.

DUNDEE, September 30, 1740.

INTRODUCTION.

It being our great business in the world to promote God's glory and our own salvation, and, in order thereto, to seek acquaintance with and secure an interest in the Lord Jesus Christ (the sole mediator betwixt God and men), and also to labour for the comfortable persuasion and assurance of this interest; it hath pleased God, for our assistance in this matter, graciously to prescribe to us the use of several outward means, as the word, sacraments, and prayer, and also to promise the inward influences of his Holy Spirit, for making these means effectual for the ends foresaid, to such as conscientiously attend and use them.

The sacrament of the Lord's supper, one of these means, being instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, as a bright representation and compend of the whole Christian religion, and an ordinance nobly adapted for carrying on the ends of God's glory, and our souls' salvation, and particularly for clearing up our interest in Christ, and improving our acquaintance with him; it highly concerns every Christian to make conscience of attending in a due and suitable manner.

I have elsewhere shown that the Lord's day is of divine appointment, and the celebration of the Lord's supper is the proper work of this day, and one special design of its first institution. Now, if ordinary Sabbaths require great diligence and care in our preparing for them, and improving of them; much more do communion Sabbaths, which are solemn and high days, and, in a special manner, days of the Son of man; these being times wherein we make near approaches unto God, and he makes most near approaches unto us; and so may be called days of heaven upon earth; for they eminently represent the employments and enjoyments of the glorified saints in heaven; and, by the right improvement of them, we come to be prepared for living amongst that blessed company. It is, then, our great duty and interest, carefully to make ready for these Sabbaths when they draw nigh, and to improve every hour and minute of them with the greatest diligence, when they actually come.

The subject of the Lord's supper is pretty fully handled in my Sacramental Catechism, both in a doctrinal and casuistic manner. And, seeing it is needless to repeat what is there written, I must refer my reader to it, for a more full explication of several things relating to this ordinance than what is here to be expected; seeing I mainly design in this treatise to give practical directions for the right improvement of communion-sabbaths. The subject is still very large and copious, after all that hath been said and written upon it; and there is room for much more. What I here intend may be comprehended under the three following heads:

I. Directions how to prepare for a communion-sabbath before it come.

II. How to spend it when it is come.

III. How to behave ourselves when it is over.

CHAP. I.

CONTAINING DIRECTIONS HOW TO PREPARE FOR A COMMUNION-SABBATH.

DIRECT. I.—CAREFULLY ENDEAVOUR AND STUDY TO HAVE A JUST AND RIGHT UPTAKING OF THE NATURE, ENDS, AND USES OF THE LORD'S SUPPER; AND THE WORK OF COMMUNICATING WHILE AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

THERE are many who having wrong notions of this ordinance, greatly mistake the ends and designs of it, and therefore cannot rightly partake of it: but, if we would be worthy communicants, we must seriously ponder and rightly understand the nature and ends of this solemn institution of our Lord Jesus Christ, that so we may approach his table with distinct uptakings of our works and business there.

This ordinance was not instituted to turn bread and wine into the true body and blood of Christ, for people to worship it; nor to sacrifice Christ again to the Father to be a propitiation for the sins of the quick and the dead, as the papists absurdly affirm. Neither was it appointed to make atonement for former sins, to purchase a remission, and insure heaven to us opere operato, as some ignorant people do imagine. Nor was it designed to cloak some wicked practices, or maintain a good name among men, or any other worldly end, as hypocrites intend. But it is appointed by our great Lord and Saviour, as a visible representation and commemoration of his death and sufferings for his people, till he come again to judge the world. And, in obedience to his command, all his people ought to come to his table, to celebrate this ordinance; and, while partaking of the outward symbols of bread and wine, they are believingly and thankfully to remember Jesus Christ, and his dying love; and also to receive and embrace him, as their bleeding high priest, into the arms of their faith, apply his benefits, rest upon his merits, seal a covenant with him, look upon him whom they have pierced, with a mourning heart, and a solemn resolve to pierce him no more.

This is a short account of the nature of this sacrament, and of the works of communicating. But, in order to give a more full and distinct view of this great and solemn ordinance, we may consider and take it up under these several respects following:

I. As a peculiar sign and distinguishing badge of the Christian church from the infidel world, and a visible token, that we profess and own a crucified Jesus for our Redeemer and Saviour, and that we depend only upon his death, and the merit of his blood, for the remission of our sins, and our reconciliation with God.

II. As a lively representation and memorial of Christ crucified, and the inestimable purchase of his death. This sacrament is a compendious map of the gospel, and a visible preaching of Jesus Christ. The word preached holds him forth to the ear; but this sacrament represents him to the eye, and, in a lively way, displays his redeeming love, his mighty acts, and unparalleled sufferings for lost sinners. This ordinance is a lasting public monument to the world, of Christ's glorious victories and triumphs, as the Captain of our salvation; of his vanquishing death and hell, his spoiling principalities and powers, and his obtaining peace for us. Likewise, we are to look upon it as a sure pledge of Christ's second coming, and a taste of the new wine which believers will eternally drink with him in his Father's kingdom.

III. As a special mean appointed by God for our spiritual advantage; namely, for the weakening of corruption, and the strengthening of grace. The death of our glorious Redeemer, represented in this ordinance, gives such a discovery of sin to the believer as makes his soul abhor it. And God blesseth it as a mean to excite and quicken the graces of repentance, faith, love, hope, joy, and thankfulness, in believers; by giving them something of a clearer view of the attributes of God, than they had before; as of his wisdom in the contrivance of our redemption by Jesus Christ, and his suretyship for us; of his mercy, love, and compassion, in sparing poor, guilty, and hell-deserving sinners, such as we are; of his justice and holiness, in punishing sin in such a manner, yea, rather punishing it in his own Son, than suffering it to go unpunished; of his veracity and faithfulness, in accomplishing the Old Testament types and prophecies, and confirming the covenant of grace with the mercies therein promised, by the death of Jesus Christ.

IV. As a great feast, wherein Christ holds communion and fellowship with his people, and richly entertains them. This sacrament is the supper of the great God: the feast-maker is God the Father, the provision God the Son, whose flesh is meat indeed, and whose blood is drink indeed: the guests are a company of poor unworthy sinners, for whom the crumbs beneath the table are too good; yet to such doth God give kindly welcome, saying, "Eat, O friends; drink," &c. Cant. v. 1. A strange feast! Christ is both the maker and matter of it, the feeder and the food, the giver and the gift! O what noble provision is Christ's flesh and blood to the soul! John vi. 55. As bread and wine afford strength, comfort, and nourishment to the body; so the flesh and blood of Christ, received here by faith, do yield the same to the soul. How great is the variety of heavenly dainties presented to us in this feast! viz. pardon of sin, reconciliation with God, and adoption into his family, peace of conscience, spiritual strength, increase of grace, the precious promises of the covenant, the gracious presence of Christ, the smiles of his countenance, the comfort and quickening influences of his Spirit. O what rare and delicious dishes are these for hungry souls! O for appetites for the full feast which Christ doth furnish us in this wilderness.

V. We ought to view this ordinance as the solemn sealing and confirming of a covenant betwixt God and us. This sacrament is one of the seals of the covenant of grace which God makes with believers in Christ; and by it he gives them santine and infetment of all the benefits of the covenant, and of the glorious inheritance purchased for them by Christ. It was usual for people in eastern countries to ratify their covenants by eating and drinking together; so did Isaac and Abimelech, Jacob and Laban, &c. Gen. xxvi. xxxi; 2 Sam. iii. This sacrament is a covenanting feast, wherein a bargain is solemnly ratified and sealed betwixt God and us. God's exhibiting the elements to us, is a seal of the covenant, on God's part, that he will be our God, and doth freely give us his Son with all his purchase, and will fulfil his promises to us in him: our taking the elements is a seal on our part, of our accepting of Jesus Christ upon the terms of grace, our engaging to be his people, and that we will, in his strength, perform all the duties required of us. Here Christ gives us his body and blood to save us, and here we give our souls and bodies to serve him.

VI. As a solemn military oath, whereby we bind ourselves to be true and faithful soldiers to Jesus Christ, our Captain and General in the spiritual warfare. For the word sacrament, according to its ancient use among the Romans (from whom it is borrowed), doth import so much. Let communicants then consider what they do at the Lord's table. You do most publicly, before men and angels, swear allegiance to the King of heaven, over the broken body and shed blood of the Son of God. Now, if the dust of Christ's ministers' feet will be a witness against the slights of his gospel, and cry for vengeance on them; surely Christ's body and blood will be a more terrible witness against perfidious communicants. Nay, the oath you here swear is not an ordinary one, but an oath attended with solemn imprecations. When ye transact with God in this sacrament, you do on the matter say, "If we be in league with sin and Satan, while we are professing to give ourselves away to the Lord; then let that wrath, which Christ suffered, fall upon us: and as certainly as we crumble the sacramental bread betwixt our teeth, let the mill-stone of God's wrath grind us to powder; and as we drink the sacramental cup here, so let us drink the cup of God's unmixed wrath eternally, if we deal falsely with God in this covenant." And thus we see how unworthy communicants and dissemblers with God, "eat and drink judgment to themselves," with a witness.

VII. We should take up this sacrament, not only as a feast of love betwixt Christ and believers, but also as a bond of mutual love and unity among believers themselves.

As this feast of love is a remembrance of the greatest love that ever was manifested, viz. of Christ's dying love to sinners; so it is an excellent mean for procuring and advancing unity and love among the saints and servants of God.

It is a mean, not only of uniting believers more firmly to Christ, their head, but also of uniting and endearing the members of his mystical body to one another.

Let us view the Lord's supper in the foregoing seven respects, that we may see what a weighty ordinance it is, and have some distinct uptakings of its nature and ends, before we approach to it.

DIRECT. II.—BE FIRMLY PERSUADED, THAT PARTAKING OF THE LORD'S SUPPER IS A MOST NECESSARY DUTY; AND THE NEGLECTING OF IT IS A VERY GREAT SIN.

THAT communicating is a necessary duty incumbent upon us, and not a matter of indifference which we may do, or not do, as we think fit, will appear from the following obligations which God hath laid upon us:

I. We have the command of our great Lord and Lawgiver, to partake of this feast, oft repeated by the evangelists: he saith to all his disciples, "take;" he saith to them, "eat;" he saith to them, "drink ye all of it;" he saith to them, "do this in remembrance of me." His precepts to pray, praise, hear, read, meditate, &c. are not more plain or express, than his precept to communicate. So that we are as much bound to give obedience to this, as to those.

II. Gratitude strongly obligeth us to obey this command, if we remember what he did for us who gave it. O believer, did he not offer up himself, soul and body, as an atoning sacrifice to satisfy divine justice for thy sins? and will not this engage you to obey him? Surely, every time you read or hear these words, "do this in remembrance of me," your heart should melt and warm within you, when you consider what he, who spoke them, hath done for you; even more than father, or mother, wife, brother, and all your relations could have done; yea, more than a million of angels could have done for you. And shall not his command have weight with you?

III. Remember the time when he gave you this charge. It was that night he was to begin his bitter and bloody agonies for you, and wade through a sea of wrath and sorrow upon your account. It was then when he beheld heaven, earth, and hell, justice, men, and devils, all conspiring against him. Just at the time when he was going to offer up himself a sacrifice in your stead, to save you from eternal flames, he gave you this charge, "do this in remembrance of me;" as if he had said, "Now I am just ready to be offered up, to die a cursed death for you, and with my blood to seal my testament, wherein I bequeath to you, pardon, peace, life, light, grace, and glory; and now there is one request I ask of you, when I am dead, you keep up the remembrance of my love and sufferings for you, by eating bread and drinking wine together with my people at my table; and there show forth my death till I come again to judge the world." The words of dying men used to be of great weight with their surviving friends; and will not the words of your dying Surety, your dying elder Brother, be of weight with you to obey his dying charge?

IV. Consider how small and easy the charge is he gives you: it is not to sacrifice your first-born, cut off a member of your body, give all you have to the poor, go in pilgrimage to the ends of the earth; it is not to go to the holy land, to visit Christ's sepulchre; or to the top of Mount Calvary, where the cross stood, "in remembrance of him." These he required not, because you might have judged them hard; and yet, as hard as they seem to be, had he demanded any of them, could you have been answerable to disobey such an one as a dying Jesus? How far less will you be able to answer at the great day for disobeying him, when he requires no such burdensome task, but graciously enjoins an action that is most easy, pleasant, and profitable to you; "eat and drink at my table, in a thankful remembrance of what I have done for you?" and will you not please him in so small a request?

V. Christ gives you this charge, not for his good, but for your own. And your obedience to it contributes highly both to your pleasure and your profit.

First, O believer, is it not pleasant to set and keep a meeting with your dear Saviour? Well, this ordinance is the solemn meeting-place where he hath appointed to meet with you; it is there you may "see the King in his beauty;" there doth his glory shine. O how glorious is he in his "dyed garments and red apparel!" With what desire should we go to see such a beautiful sight? How sweet is it to hear his voice in this ordinance, which is the very music of heaven? How refreshing for a doubting soul to hear him speak as from the cross, "it is finished, the ransom is paid, and justice is satisfied?" Can there be sweeter melody, than to hear Christ whisper in the soul's ear, "Fear not, I am thy salvation; the Lord hath put away thy sin, thou shalt not die; son, be of good cheer, all thy sins are forgiven thee!" How pleasant must it be to eat and drink at Christ's feast, with such heavenly music sounding in our ears?

Secondly, Is not this action as profitable to us as pleasant? Knowest thou, O man, what injury thou dost to thy immortal soul by neglecting it? Canst thou have any other but a lean, hungry, starved soul, whilst thou slightest the food God hath appointed for it? Dost thou know what benefit some of thy neighbours have got at this feast? some have come to it poor, and have gone away laden with riches: some have come to it hungry, and have gone away satisfied as with marrow and fatness: some have come thirsty, and have got floods poured out upon the dry ground: some have come blind, and gone away seeing; others lame, and have gone away walking. Here they have got all their diseases cured, and their wants supplied. And have you not as great need of these mercies as others? Come, then, to this enriching and soul-upmaking ordinance; take but a view of the benefits and blessings which Christ presents to you, and which he faithfully offers to seal and apply to you in this sacrament, even his own body and blood, and all the benefits and virtues of the same; surely Christ and all the benefits of his purchase is a vast portion: behold, O believer, in this ordinance you have a seal and pledge, an earnest and taste of them all.

More particularly, 1. You have here a sealed remission of sin presented to you, with the blood that was shed for the same, Matt. xxvi. 28.

2. A sealed freedom from wrath and damnation: for a crucified Jesus here represented endured that for you; and he promises that he who eats this food shall "never die eternally," John vi. 50, 51.

3. Adoption into God's family, and a right to the children's privileges confirmed; for your being admitted to sit at your Father's table, and eat of the children's bread, is a pledge of it.

4. The weakening of sin, and subduing of corruption; for here you have food that kills sin.

5. The increase of sanctification, and strengthening of grace: for here you have food that nourisheth grace: and the sanctifying Spirit is promised in that covenant, which is here sealed, Ezek. xxxiv. 27.

6. Union and communion with Christ in the most intimate manner; for, saith he, John vi. 56, "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him." We dwell in him, by faith and love, and he in us by his Spirit.

7. A title to eternal life, John vi. 51, "If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever."

8. A sealed promise of a glorious resurrection, John vi. 54, "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh by blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

9. A sealed right to all the promises of the new covenant, which are great and precious, viz. That God will "put his laws in our inward parts, and write them in our hearts," Jer. xxxi. 33. "That he will forgive our iniquity, and remember our sins no more," Jer. xxxi. 34. "That he will take away the stony heart, and give us a heart of flesh," Ezek. xxxvi. 26. "That he will put his fear in our hearts, and give us hearts to fear him," Jer. xxxii. 39, 40. "That he will cause us to walk in his statutes," Ezek. xxxvi. 27. "That he will not turn away from us to do us good, and that we shall not depart from him," Jer. xxx. 40. "That he will send sanctified rods and afflictions when they are needful," Psal. lxxxix. 32. "That he will put his Spirit within us," Ezek. xxxvi. 27. And thereupon we shall have quickening, strengthening, and sin-mortifying influences. And, lastly, which comprehends all, that he "will be our God, and we shall be his people," Jer. xxxi. 33. Thus you see what a soul-profitting ordinance this is; to slight it then, must be a dreadful despising of your mercies, and a wronging of your own souls.

VI. Let me put you in mind with what gladness the Israelites of old welcomed the news of the celebration of their passover, in the room of which Christ instituted to us the Lord's supper. O what joy did it occasion in Jerusalem, when the trumpet was blown by the priest, to give intimation to the people of the day of the pass-over! How cheerful was the psalmist's heart, when he saith, Psal. lxxxix. 1, 3, "Make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob: blow up the trumpet in the new-moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day!" This feast was still observed upon the fifteenth day after the first appearance of the new-moon: and not having almanacks, as we have, to forewarn them of it, they used to send men to the top of the hill to watch for the appearance of the new moon, who, as soon as they saw it, hastened to tell the priest, that he might blow the trumpet, and give the welcome notice of it to the people, who received the news with universal joy. And have not we, Christians, more cause to rejoice at the intimation of our gospel-passover, in which we have Christ crucified, with all his benefits, far more evidently set forth before our eyes, than the people of the Jews had?

Alas! it is sadly to be regretted, that in our age many people often hear the silver trumpet of the gospel sounding loud and long, calling them to the feast of the great King, but are not suitably affected therewith. Were this great gospel-ordinance, like the Jewish passover, to be celebrated but in one place in all the world; with what zeal and desire would people flock thither, to behold it and partake of it! And, why should we not come with the same affection and devotion now, when we have it celebrated in many places? Shall our hearts be evil, because God is good? Shall we despise mercies when they are given in plenty? Surely the frequent occasions we have of this blessed feast, should fill our hearts with the greatest thankfulness to the bountiful Maker of it, as they did the Christians in the apostolic age.

But, besides these arguments for the necessity of the duty of communicating, I shall, in the next place, show the greatness of the sin and danger of neglecting it.

I. You are hereby guilty of disobedience to the command of the highest King and Sovereign in the world; nay, of that King to whom you have sworn allegiance in baptism. Is Jesus Christ your sovereign, and will you not obey his laws? Perhaps, if you neglected any other of his commands, such as to pray, give alms, or to hear the word, for one Lord's day, conscience would smite you for it; and have you no check for disobeying this command which he gave in the most solemn manner; nay, a charge which our dying Testator gave us when his heart was full of sorrow for us, and when he was going to undergo God's wrath in the garden, be bound as a malefactor, and led away to the cursed tree for us? As the sovereign Lord, who gave us this command, hath an undoubted right to our obedience both by nature and dear purchase; so, by the neglect of it, we are at once guilty both of despising the authority of just power, and the obligation of astonishing love.

II. What a sin must it be to despise a sacrament which is one of the most solemn ordinances of this great King? You will readily acknowledge, that it is your indispensable duty to receive the sacrament of baptism, and that it is a great sin to neglect it. And why do you not own the same of the Lord's supper, seeing the same Lord who said, Matt. xxviii. 19, "Go teach and baptize all nations," said also, Luke xxii. 19, "Do this in remembrance of me?" So that you have the same authority for both sacraments. What absurd inconsistency are some then guilty of, who think if their children die without baptism (though there be no sinful neglect in the case) it endangers their salvation, but are not afraid themselves to live and die without the Lord's supper, though their neglect be wilful and sinful? Surely the practice of many, who overvalue one sacrament, and undervalue another, is most unaccountable.

III. By declining to partake of the Lord's supper, you do upon the matter renounce your baptism (though the sacrament you pretend to esteem), seeing hereby you refuse to be Christians of free choice, and in effect say, you will not stand to these engagements your parents took on in your name, but will be at liberty to believe what you please, practice what you fancy, and serve the devil, the world, and the flesh, as long as you think fit. You may profess the Christian religion; but you are never Christians by any act of your own, until you present yourselves at the Lord's table, and there personally own your baptismal engagements, and openly avouch the Lord Jesus Christ to be your Saviour, consent to his religion, and dedicate yourselves to his service. Hearing of sermons is not a sufficient test of your doing so; for many do this from curiosity or custom, more than any other principle; but the Lord's supper is the ordinance which Christ has instituted chiefly for the foresaid ends. How great then must the sin and danger of wilful neglecting it be? In effect, it is no less than an open denying of Christ before men; and such, he says, "he will deny before his Father in heaven." I would have all who bear the name of Christians to remember this; and, as they would not be reckoned among those that renounce Christ and his religion, let them not condemn that ordinance, which is the appointed badge of the Christian profession.

IV. To neglect the Lord's supper is a most unthankful requital of the kindness of our Lord Jesus Christ, in coming to free us from the burdensome service of the legal sacrifices, rites, and institutions. If we did rightly consider what we are bound to by the subjection we owe to a sovereign Lord, and by the gratitude we owe to a kind benefactor; though he had enjoined a great number of costly and laborious rites, and had laid upon us a yoke more heavy than that of the Jewish ceremonies, yet in justice we should have thought all but a small homage to his greatness, and a small acknowledgment of his infinite love. But now, when in his mercy he hath freed us from the yoke of ceremonial bondage, and, besides baptism, hath appointed but this one sacred rite for us to observe, and one that is neither costly nor troublesome, but most easy and pleasant; what monsters of ingratitude shall we make ourselves, if we slight this his gracious institution!

V. By neglecting this divine ordinance, you put greater contempt upon the true and living God, than heathens do upon their dumb idols. How great is the respect that some brutish idolators show to idols, who cut their flesh, shed their blood, sacrifice their children, and stick at nothing, though never so hard or painful, to testify their homage and obsequiousness to their ugly deities! And shall we, Christians, professed servants of the glorious Son of God, our sovereign Lord and Redeemer, neglect his easy institution, and refuse to please him in so small a thing! Surely the barbarous savages will rise up in judgment with many professed Christians, and condemn them for their disobedience. You, perhaps, on some occasions, will profess to pity the blind heathens and brutish Indians, who are strangers to Christianity, and live and die in darkness; but, have not we as much reason to pity you, who disown and pour contempt on that holy religion you were educated in, and thereby put yourselves in a condition worse than theirs? For, the apostle tells us, that it is "better not to have known the way of truth, than, after we have known it, to turn away from the holy commandment," 2 Pet. ii. 21. And our Saviour saith, that it will be more tolerable for the dark cities of "Tyre and Sidon, at the day of judgment, than it will be for the enlightened Capernaum and Bethsaida," Matt. xi. 22. Your knowledge and profession of the truths of the Christian religion do very much aggravate your disobedience to the laws and institutions thereof. You think their condition dreadful that say there is no God, and no doubt it is so; but what better is your case? you acknowledge there is a God, but live as if you defied him, by open contemning and neglecting of his ordinances.

VI. By slighting this ordinance, you condemn the most advantageous offer that ever God made unto men. Here God the Father offereth to make over Christ to you, and all his purchase, and seal your right thereto. Particularly to give you his blessed Son, as your "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption," 1 Cor. i. 30. As your wisdom, to enlighten you, and free you from ignorance; as your righteousness, to justify you, and free you from the guilt of sin; as your sanctification, to make you holy, and free you from the reigning power and pollution of sin; as your redemption, to restore you to the liberty of the sons of God, bring you to the inheritance, and free you eternally from sin and Satan, hell and wrath. Now, O sinner, if thou declinest to come here and take Christ as thy wisdom, how foolish and ignorant must thou still remain! If thou refusest Christ as thy righteousness, how naked and guilty will thy soul be! If thou refusest Christ as thy sanctification, how vile and polluted must thou still continue! If thou refusest Christ as thy redemption, who will redeem thee from the wrath to come?

Consider also the near and happy relations which Jesus Christ himself offereth to stand in to those who cordially receive him in this ordinance; such as that of a master, a father, a captain, a shepherd, a bridegroom, and husband. And, how great must our sin and danger be, if we slight such kind offers! If you refuse Christ as a master now, will not he refuse to own you as a servant in the great day? If you refuse him as a captain, will he not reject you as one of his soldiers? If you refuse him as a shepherd, will he not deny you as one of his sheep? If you refuse him as a bridegroom and husband, will he not disown you as his bride and spouse? And, if Christ thus disown you at the great day, how fearful will your condition be for ever?

VII. Neglecting this feast of memorial is a thing most unreasonable in itself, as being against all the rules of humanity and gratitude. Surely it is most agreeable to reason and equity, that all Christians should love their Redeemer and benefactor, and keep up the memorial of his great adventure for ransoming their souls. Is it not a most reasonable demand, and a very small return he requires of you for all his love, only "eat and drink in remembrance of me." It is not, go to a scaffold; but go to a well covered table: it is not to bleed and burn, but to eat and drink: it is not to feed on the bread of affliction, or water of adversity, but bread that strengthens the heart, and wine that cheers the drooping spirit; delicious fare, which your Saviour hath blessed and sweetened for you. Now, must it not be against all reason to refuse this agreeable demand, in order to preserve the memory of the love of your incomparable Benefactor, and the sufferings of your dying Friend, which he patiently endured for you?

Ungrateful world! Can ye not endure to think on that which Christ refused not to endure for you? Did he leave the glory of his Father, to be clothed with your nature and to dwell in a fleshly cottage? Did he live a life of sorrows and sufferings, and at last undergo a shameful, painful, and cursed death? Did he rise again, and ascend on high to prepare mansions, and take possession of them for you? Doth he there abide to agent and plead your cause with God? And do ye believe that he is shortly to come again to receive you to himself? And, will ye not for a short while here keep up the remembrance of his love? O, did Christ drink vinegar on the cross for you, yea, vinegar made bitter, tart, and poisonous, with your sins? And will ye not drink wine at his table, that is sweetened and made delicious with the choice blessings of his love, and consolations of his Spirit? Did he drink a cup of wrath for you, and will ye not drink a cup of blessing for him, nay, for yourselves? For the advantage is only yours.

O Christians, had we the due impressions of the amazing goodness and incomparable love of our Matchless Redeemer, the remembrance whereof he enjoins us to keep up in this ordinance; we would say, Lord, what is sufficient to be done in memory of this love? Every one of our hearts would echo back at Christ's call, "Do this in remembrance of me." Do this! Lord, what is it that I would not do for thy sake? Glorious Jesus, didst thou pass by the angels, and wouldst have no nature but mine! I will then stop mine ears against the solicitations of the world, and have no will but thine. Remember thee! Whom shall I remember if I forget thee? "If I forget thee, O my Saviour, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth: if I remember not thee, let my right hand forget her cunning." Lord, I cannot but blush when I think that I should need any memento or token to keep up the remembrance of thee. Ah! shall the trifles of the world find room enough in my heart and memory, and my Redeemer's love have scarce any place there? Lord, hadst thou required the dearest of my blood and choicest of my substance to be offered thee in acknowledgment of it, yea, hadst thou demanded my life, I owe it to thee, nay, a thousand lives, if I had them: and, shall I not cheerfully give thee up my memory and thoughts when thou art pleased to ask them.

O then, if there be any obligations in the highest authority, any allurements in the sweetest love, any reality in your professed subjection to Jesus Christ, give him this proof of it, cheerfully obey his dying charge, meet with his people, and remember his love at his feast of memorial, and join hymns of praise therewith. O please him in this so easy and so small a request.

VIII. Finally, I would have you to remember how provoking the neglect of this ordinance is to him that instituted it. You are guilty of despising the greatest preparation which the King of kings makes for his subjects; for in this ordinance he doth, as it were, kill the fatted calf, and furnish his table with the choicest rarities of heaven, and send forth his servants to invite us, saying, "I have prepared my supper, come eat of my bread, and drink of my wine which I have mingled; all things are ready, come to the marriage." So great and costly is this feast, that it cost the Maker of it his own life to prepare it. "Pardon of sin, peace with God, and communion with him," which are the dainties here set before you, cost Jesus Christ no less than his life to purchase them for you. And, do you think this glorious King can take it well at your hands, if you make light of this rare and costly feast, and slight all the preparation he hath made for you? Can you ever expect to enjoy communion with him in heaven, if you slight the offer of communion with him upon earth? Nay, you provoke him to cut you off eternally from his presence: for, as of old, the Lord threatened cutting off to the soul of him that neglected to keep the passover, because he brought not the offering of the Lord in his appointed season, Num. ix. 13, so he threatens the same to those who should slight the gospel-feasts typified thereby, Zech. xiv. 16—18; Luke xiv. 24. We see how his wrath was kindled against those that neglected to come to the marriage of the king's son, and how severely he punished them for it, Matt. xxii. 5, 7, "They made light of it, and went their ways, one to his farm, and another to his merchandise." But, when the king heard thereof he was wroth, and "he sent forth armies and destroyed these murderers, and burnt up their city." He reckons your eating not, no less sin than eating irreverently; for, as by this you are guilty of profaning the Lord's body, so by the other you are guilty of despising it, and preferring your lusts before him, which is a crime as heinous.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

Here it may be proper to answer some objections which are made against partaking of the Lord's supper; whether by the profane, slothful, or scrupulous.

OBJECT. I. Some profane persons think meanly of this ordinance, and hence they neglect it. What needs so much noise (think they) about this matter? It is but eating a little bread, and drinking a small portion of wine; what efficacy can there be in that action?

Ans. This ordinance is of divine authority, and not appointed by men like ourselves. It hath the stamp of our Lord's institution, which should make it to be highly valued by all Christians: for, as he hath wisely instituted it for most important ends and uses, so he will certainly make it effectual unto these ends. A little parchment, with ink and wax upon it, is in itself a small thing; yet, being of legal authority and institution among men, it serveth to convey a right and title to a great inheritance, and so it becometh highly valuable. The brazen serpent, that was lift upon a pole for healing the Israelites, was mean to the outward view; but, being of God's appointment, it was effectual for healing, and therefore none would despise it. So the elements in this sacrament, however common or mean in themselves, yet being of God's appointment, and consecrated for sacred uses, they are powerful and efficacious to the believing receiver, for the great ends of their institution.

OBJECT. II. We may remember Christ in the word; and what need is there for doing it in the sacrament?

ANS. 1. It is abominable presumption to think ourselves wiser than Jesus Christ, who is the "Wisdom of the Father." Hath he thought this ordinance needful, and will any man judge it needless?

2. The word only presents Christ unto the ear, but the Lord's supper sets forth a crucified Christ unto the eye.

3. There is more than a simple remembering of Christ required in the Lord's supper; there is also a renewing of baptismal engagements, and a ratifying our covenant with God. And besides, our Lord hath reserved some special blessings and communications to this ordinance, which are nowise to be undervalued or slighted.

OBJECT. III. It is hard to be at so much pains, and to employ so much time in meditation, examination, prayer, &c. as is requisite to prepare for communicating.

ANS. 1. There are many who do not grudge to be at much pains and travel, and frequently to hazard their lives, both by sea and land, for a little temporal gain; and will you grudge some pains to prepare for this ordinance, which seals a right to the unsearchable riches of Christ, and by means whereof you might, through the divine blessing, be enabled to subdue your sins, reform your lives, grow in grace, and be made ready for death and judgment? Is not this spiritual gain better than the gain of a whole world?

2. Are there not many who throw away their hours in needless pleasures and pastimes? And, with what face can such pretend they have not time to examine themselves, and prepare for this blessed ordinance? What are these transient pleasures of time you are so fond of, to the comfortable views of an interest in Christ, and of living with him throughout eternity, which may be got at his table?

3. Will you be at no pains to please that King and Sovereign to whom you have sworn allegiance, or to obey the command and dying charge of your great Master and Saviour? That vile impostor, Mahomet, forbade his disciples to drink wine; and this command hath been rigorously observed among them; and shall our renowned Saviour, who is Lord of angels, and Son of the most high God, enjoin us in the use of the wine in the sacrament; and will any of his disciples venture to disobey him? "Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon." Let not this be told among Turks, Jews, Infidels, Atheists, and the rest of the adversaries of the Christian religion, lest they should insult and triumph.

4. Our Lord Jesus had a thousand more difficulties and discouragements in the work of our redemption, and yet he did not shrink back, as you do from communicating. He never objected, "The sea is deep, I cannot wade it; the cross is heavy, I cannot bear it; the cup is bitter, I cannot drink it; the wrath is terrible, I cannot endure it." He did not plead, though he had cause, "The work is hard, it will cost me dear: and I shall meet with an unthankful world, that will slight my love, refuse my offers, and despise my institutions." No: he overlooked all that, and went cheerfully through his sufferings: "With desire have I desired (saith he) to eat this passover; the cup that the Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" When the Father called him to drink the very dregs of the cup of trembling for you, he readily answered, "Lo, I come, I delight to do thy will." But when he calls you to take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord; what grudging and backdrawing is there with you? Had Christ so great desire after the bitter cup of God's wrath on your account; and have you no desire after the cup of blessing in the sacrament! Did he go so cheerfully to die for you; and are you unwilling to go and feast with him? Be astonished, O heavens, at this ingratitude!

How wretched and perverse a creature is man! Still he would be flying in the face of God's authority: for when God saith to him, "Eat not of this forbidden fruit;" then he will needs eat, though it ruin him. But when God saith, "Eat of this bread;" he is backward to do it, though it be for his eternal welfare. O how long doth a patient and merciful God bear with us!

OBJECT. IV. I am so stated with my worldly business, that I cannot get time to prepare myself in secret, and give such attendance in public as is needful, and so I cannot come.

ANS. 1. Doth not your business afford you time to eat, drink, and sleep, and converse with unprofitable company; and can you find no time to converse with God in his ordinances, or to prepare for meeting and dwelling with God throughout eternity?

2. Can you have any greater, any better business in the world, than to remember the love of a dying Saviour, to put your souls in order to meet with him at his table, and there to seal a covenant with him, and receive pledges from him of his pardoning and redeeming love? Is there any business upon earth preferable to this?

3. When sickness and death come, you must find time to attend them whether you will or not; all your business must of necessity give place to them. And, must you find time to be sick and die how soon the summons cometh; and will you not find time in your health to prepare for sickness and death before they come? Now, if you would take time duly to prepare for the Lord's supper, you should not be found unprepared for death; for the same preparation is needful for both.

OBJECT. V. But, say some, we are not fit for the Lord's table, (and perhaps it is very true.) Why? We have but loose lices and conversations; there is some bad company we cannot be free of, some sins we cannot get left; and so we cannot come to the Lord's table.

ANS. 1. God will surely look upon it as no other than a mocking of him, to say you are not dressed for this feast, when indeed you never went about to make yourselves ready. Nay, he will look upon it as the most heinous wickedness, for you to go on wilfully in your sins and wicked courses, and then to make your sins an excuse for the neglect of those duties he commands you.

2. If you say, you are not fit for the Lord's supper here, you must confess you are less fit for the marriage-supper of the Lamb above. And, how can you live one day contentedly in that condition you dare not venture to die in; or, if you die in it, you must be eternally excluded from heaven? Consider then, O profane sinner, although you may now sit Christ's charming call to come to his table and remember him, you cannot sit his alarming call to come to his tribunal to answer before him. And how can you think to look upon that face with comfort at that day, which now you have no pleasure to behold in the symbols of bread and wine?

3. Let me ask thee, O profane man, do you intend to repent and leave your sins; or do you not? If you do not intend it, then it is in vain to treat with you, seeing you wilfully make choice of everlasting burnings. But there are few so graceless and wicked, but will say they have intentions to do it. Well, if your intentions be hearty and sincere, surely you will put them speedily in execution: and, if you do this, your objection vanisheth; your bad life can no longer hinder you from this ordinance, seeing all penitent reforming sinners are welcome to Christ, and to his table also, whatever their former lives have been.

OBJECT. VI. But (saith one) I am not in charity with my neighbours; I am at variance with such a person that hath injured me; and so I cannot come to the Lord's table.

ANS. 1. I do acknowledge, the want of love to our neighbours, and the entertaining of angry strife and discord with them, do very much discompose and unfit us for approaching to this feast of love; and therefore we should use all endeavours to remove these impediments beforehand.

2. Suppose thy neighbour hath done thee wrong, and given you just ground of displeasure with him; yet you ought to use endeavours to get the difference removed, by seeking to convince him of his fault, and showing your readiness to forgive him, and be reconciled with him.

3. Suppose thy neighbour, after all Christian methods taken with him, persists in his injuries without repentance or reparation; it is no uncharitableness to be displeased with him, if thy anger keep within just bounds, and thou dost not hate his person, or study revenge against him. The apostle saith, Eph. iv. 26, "Be angry, and sin not," whence we see that anger may be separated from sin. Now, what is not sin, doth not make us unfit for this holy ordinance. A man may be innocently angry, when he is justly displeased with another, both for offending God and himself; but in the mean time, is so far from desiring revenge, or seeking his hurt, that he pities and prays for the injurious person, and is ready to render good for evil. Now, when this is the case, as our anger or displeasure doth not indispose us for the sacrament, so neither should our neighbour's unchristian behaviour and backwardness to reconciliation deter us from our duty, or tempt us to deprive ourselves of the benefit of this ordinance.

4. But if you be of the number of those who keep up quarrels with your neighbours, and of unforgiving and revengeful spirits, you are altogether unfit for this ordinance, and should tremble to approach it in such a condition; seeing in effect you renounce Christ as a Saviour, reject his example, and despise his precepts. You cannot pray as he directs, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us;" for this were no other than a fearful imprecation of wrath against yourselves. Would you then have forgiveness of the injuries you have done to God? would you have this blessing sealed to you in the sacrament, and openly declared at the great day? then be ready to forgive those that wrong you, lay aside quarrels, abhor revenge, let not the sun go down upon your wrath, seek peace and friendship with all. Remember that those who harbour wrath and malice in their hearts, are as unfit to appear at God's tribunal as at his table.

OBJECT. VII. Though we be not in case for this, yet we resolve to prepare and go to the next communion.

Ans. 1. All delays in well-doing are highly dangerous, and particularly in the present case. Your lives are wholly uncertain, you may not live to see another communion. Many were alive at the last communion, that are now dead, and fixed in their everlasting lot; and many now living will, in all likelihood, be in the same state before the next communion; and you know not but you may be among them. And if so, consider what stinging reflections the slights of Christ and his institutions will have through eternity; therefore neglect not the present opportunity.

2. Though God should spare you to see another occasion of this sort, what ground have you to think you shall be more willing or fit to communicate then than at present?

Do you not know that by delays the heart is still the more hardened, and the habits of sin the more strengthened? And if you refuse to hearken to God's call now, he may refuse to hear your cry afterward, Zech. vii. 13.

OBJECT. VIII. But, say some scrupulous and doubting souls, this is an awful and tremendous ordinance: and it is not safe for such poor, unworthy, and unprepared creatures as we are, to meddle with it.

Ans. 1. It is very ordinary for people to run into extremes about this ordinance. Either they entertain too low an opinion, or else they have too frightful thoughts of it: and both these are to be equally guarded against. Remember that the sacrament was not instituted to terrify believers, but to bring them into converse and familiarity with their Lord and Saviour, and to give them the tokens and intimations of his love. And why should a feast of love be terrible to us?

2. Every man, in a legal sense, is unworthy to approach to this holy table: we are all as an unclean thing, and our righteousness as filthy rags before God. But he is graciously pleased to accept of them who abhor themselves for their pollution, and seek shelter under the covert of Christ's righteousness.

3. How long will you make use of this excuse of unfitness and unpreparedness? Do ye intend to do it all your days? Or, will it be of any use to you when you are called to die? When God commands you to die, will you have confidence to say, Lord, I cannot obey at this time, for I am not prepared! No, no; it would be in vain then to hang back, seeing death will not spare when it gets commission, whether prepared, or unprepared. Would you not, therefore, in such a case, set about immediate preparation, and do what you are able to get yourselves prepared for death? So do in this case; when Christ commands you to come to his table, though matters be sadly out of order with you, yet set about the work in obedience to his command, prepare what ye are able, and look to him for strength who pities the weak, and accepts of sincere aims at duty.

OBJECT. IX. But (some may insist to say) we are unworthy; for we have not only many defects in our lives, but also many inward distempers, heart-plagues, hardness, deadness, darkness, prevailing corruptions, &c.

Ans. 1. No wonder you complain of many distempers, when you refuse the means of healing. May not God look upon it as dissimulation, to complain of the hardness of your heart, while you come not to apply the blood of Christ to soften it; or of the prevailing of your corruptions, while you come not to Christ's cross to subdue them? No wonder that God withdraws from your souls, when you withdraw from your duty. No wonder you are strangers to spiritual joy, when you will not come to draw water out of the wells of salvation. No wonder you complain of the weakness of grace, when you will not make use of the means for strengthening it. Many have found at this ordinance a cure for all their diseases, a supply to all their wants, and an answer to all their complaints.

2. Study to do your part by serious preparation, and you may expect God will not fail to do his part: spread out your sores and diseases before the great Physician and look unto him for healing; press through all doubts and discouragements towards him, believing you shall be healed, if you can but touch the hem of his garment. If you sincerely, heartily, and impartially repent of all known sins, and rely on Jesus Christ for mercy and pardon, you have no reason to question but you shall be welcome guests at the Lord's table, although you find in your hearts many infirmities and plagues, and in your lives many defects and short-comings.

OBJECT. X. But (say some) that word damnation frights us, 1 Cor. xi. 29. It is terrible to eat and drink damnation to ourselves, as unworthy communicants do.

Ans. It is very true, unworthy communicants are liable to damnation; but so also are all other sinners: whosoever hears the word unworthily, or prays unworthily, incurs the peril of damnation, as well as he that communicates unworthily; and yet you do not think you ought to desist from hearing or praying on that account, and why only from communicating? Every sin, indeed, is damning in its own nature, and so is unworthy receiving in a special manner: but sincere repenting and believing in Christ is an expedient against this as well as other sins; for "the blood of Christ cleanseth us from all sins."

OBJECT. XI. We are afraid (say some) to come and enter into covenant with God, and take on comes at the Lord's table, lest we do not keep them, but fall again into new sins, and so increase our guilt.

Ans. 1. If it were left, as a matter of indifference, to come to or absent yourselves from the Lord's table, as you pleased, your objection might be pertinent; but remember, this is a duty enjoined under the highest pains. You see what fearful destruction came upon them that refused to come to the marriage-supper, Matt. xxii. 7.

2. It is good always to be jealous of ourselves; for we have good reason for it, considering the deceitfulness of our hearts. But this should not keep us from the ordinance, or make us to neglect our duty.

3. Breach of vows, or sins committed after a sacrament, though they be of greater guilt than other sins, yet we are not to judge them unpardonable; for, who is it that liveth and sinneth not? Such a notion perhaps hath possessed the ignorant Muscovites, who endeavour to fall asleep as soon as they have received the sacrament, to prevent, by that means, any occasion of sinning.

4. There is ground to suspect, that this excuse or pretence is not real with many; but rather, that they are unwilling to come under new bonds and engagements to a holy life. They entertain some affection to their old sins, and are not willing to renounce them altogether, and prepare sincerely for this holy ordinance.

5. If you be so much afraid of sin, and of sinning after the sacrament; why are you not afraid of this sin of neglecting the sacrament, which I showed before to be very heinous! Now, why do you live in this sin so quietly? Surely, if you were afraid of all sin, you would be afraid of this heinous sin too; and so would make conscience of preparing yourselves for the Lord's table, that you might be preserved from the guilt of slighting this solemn ordinance.

Lastly, Consider you are not to vow and engage here in your own strength, but in the strength of the Lord Jesus; you are to trust and rely upon him, "who performeth all things for us," Psal. lviii. 2; for he is become surety for our duty, as well as for our debt. Now, whatever be our own weakness, we should not scruple to engage with such an able Surety.

DIRECT. III. BELIEVE AND BE PERSUADED, THAT COMMUNICATING IS NOT ONLY A DUTY, BUT THAT IT IS A DUTY INCUMBENT UPON YOU TO COMMUNICATE FREQUENTLY.

BAPTISM being a sacrament appointed for the initiation and implantation of believers into the church, it is to be received but once by the same person, and not to be reiterated: but the Lord's supper being a sacrament instituted for the nutrition, increment, and growth of believers, it is often to be received and repeated by them. And this may be confirmed by many reasons:

I. Frequent partaking of the Lord's supper is enjoined by the same authority which instituted it. For Christ tells us, that we are not only to eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, but we are to do it often; as is recited by the apostle, 1 Cor. xi. 25; "This do ye, as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." And again, ver. 26; "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come." Now when our Lord doth expressly command the duty in these words, "Do this in remembrance of me;" and doth twice over annex the word often as necessary in the doing of it; it is all one as if he had said, "Do this often in remembrance of me." So that for Christians to communicate seldom, is disobedience to Christ, and a contempt of divine authority: for our Redeemer is God, and we are to look upon his commands as the same with the commands of God the Father, seeing he approved of our Mediator, and of every thing he did. Had not his institutions been agreeable to the Father's will, he had not been so welcomed at his return to heaven, and advanced to such royal dignity to sit upon his throne of glory.

II. In obedience to Christ's authority, the apostles and primitive Christians did frequently partake of the Lord's supper: yea, it was their ordinary practice every Lord's day, as is evident from Acts xx. 7, "And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached to them." The Christians there, are brought in as meeting together for partaking of the sacrament (which is often expressed by breaking of bread), without any previous warning, because it was their ordinary custom so to do. And this practice was kept up in the church for several centuries after the apostles' death, as is testified by the historians and fathers of the ancient church. And from their practice of constant breaking of bread every Lord's day, the day was anciently called Dies panis, August. Epist. 118. And this primitive practice (according to some) was grounded upon the word, Ezek. xlii. 27, "And when these days are expired, it shall be on the eighth day, and so forward, the priest shall make your burnt-offerings upon the altar, and your peace-offerings, and I will accept you, saith the Lord God." Now this vision containing a prophetic description of the gospel times, and of the ceasing of the ceremonial law for daily sacrifices, by the eighth day they understand the Lord's day, as being the eighth day following upon the seventh, viz. the Jewish sabbath, in room whereof it was to succeed. By burnt-offering, the Lord's supper, as being the remembrance of the great burnt-offering, whereby our peace was made. By peace-offerings, prayer, and thanksgiving, which are called sacrifices, Heb. xiii. 15. and are the proper work of every Lord's day. The primitive Christians were peculiarly fond of the Lord's supper; when they had the opportunity of a public assembly, though upon a week day (as severals do observe from Acts ii. 46.) they could not think of parting till they had celebrated the memorials of Christ's dying love. They reckoned this piece of worship a principal part of the Christian religion, which, in a manner, doth comprehend all other parts of it, and is an epitome of the whole. They counted it a chief means of conveying to them the benefits of their Redeemer's death. And they would not slight the occasion of taking this provision and viaticum in those stormy times, when they knew not but they might be snatched away by the fury of persecutors before the next day of public meeting.

III. The Lord's supper was appointed for the commemoration of the death and sufferings of Christ, and of his love to us manifested therein; and therefore we ought frequently to celebrate it for that end. Though gratitude to a merciful God, and love to him that loved us, and washed us in his blood, should engage us constantly to remember redeeming love: yet, alas! we are naturally unmindful of God, ungrateful to Christ our Saviour, and apt to forget his matchless love: and therefore we frequently need his help (which he of purpose hath instituted) to renew our remembrance of him. Say not, you can remember Christ frequently without this; for this were to make yourselves wiser than the institutor of this ordinance. Besides, may not experience tell you what faint thoughts and languid remembrance you ordinarily have of him, notwithstanding of the word read and preached, until this solemn ordinance doth return and revive the memory of his love, and fix your thoughts more solemnly upon him. Ah! the body of death doth hinder us from remembering the Lord of life. It is not sufficient to commemorate his love once a year; there ought to be a constant and habitual remembering of our Redeemer's death, and this habit must be acquired by frequent and reiterated acts of communicating. But supposing we would remember him without this; yet surely it would be base ingratitude to neglect to remember him in his own method, and by the means of his own choosing, when he might have put far harder conditions upon us.

IV. Christ hath appointed this sacrament as a spiritual meal for the nourishment and strength of his people, and for the growth and increase of their graces: and therefore it ought to be frequently received. Meals for the nourishment of our bodies must be often repeated, because of the frequent recurring of our needs; we are all so sensible of it, that we do not refuse to come frequently to our stated meals: and though it be not told us how often we should eat and drink, yet our craving appetites, and the sense of our want of food and strength, are sufficient to direct in this matter. And should not the sense of our souls' need of spiritual food and strength, direct us to frequency in communicating? We are in a journey, and we need strength to go forward. We are weak of ourselves, and the best are liable to frequent decays of grace, and we have all need of frequent supplies of strength, to enable us to perform duties, bear crosses, resist enemies, and beat down lusts: and consequently, we have frequent need of this quickening, restoring, and strengthening meal, which Christ hath graciously provided for us in this ordinance. It is hereby that faith is strengthened, repentance renewed, love inflamed, desire sharpened, and the soul encouraged and confirmed in the ways of God.

V. This ordinance was instituted for bringing us to near communion with God; and therefore should be frequently celebrated and attended by us. Hence it is that we call it the communion, according to that word, 1 Cor. x. 16. And as the apostle tells us there, ver. 19, 20. that the partaking of things sacrificed to idols was a fellowship with devils; so the partaking of that which was sacrificed to God, is a fellowship with God. In this ordinance there is more communion to be had with God, than in any other; more than in prayer or praise: for we have not so near communion with a prince or great man, by petitioning him, or returning him thanks for a favour received, as we have by sitting with him at his table, and partaking of the same bread and the same cup with him. It is here that believers sit, feast, and converse familiarly with Jesus Christ. Christ was "made known to the disciples in the breaking of bread," though they knew him not before in the opening of the scriptures, Luke xxiv. 30, 31. Now, if it be our duty to seek frequent communion and converse with God, and frequent views and discoveries of Jesus Christ, then surely it is our duty to make frequent approaches to the Lord's table. Do we think we can too oft behold a crucified Jesus? Can we too oft clasp about our bleeding High Priest? Can we too oft hear the music of his voice, or see the beauty of his face? Surely, if we love him, we will desire frequently to be in those ways where we may meet with him.

VI. This sacrament is an excellent mean for the weakening of sin, and keeping it under; and therefore we should frequently attend it. The soul is most animated and resolved against sin, when it sees God's wrath and indignation manifested against it: now, where can we behold this so well as in this ordinance, which represents the dreadful agonies and sufferings of Christ our Surety? Here we may see Christ sacrificed to justice, overwhelmed with blood, made a curse, and bearing all that wrath and vengeance which the law threatened for sin. The soul's looking upon Christ here, opens the spring of sorrow for sin, Zech. xii. 10. Our frequent approaches to a wounded Saviour here, kindle frequent resolutions against sin that pierced him, and make us look and cry to him for grace to subdue it. Now this is what we are constantly needing: for there is still a root of bitterness in us, always sprouting up; but frequent approaches to this ordinance contributes to curb and crop it. Sins and lusts of themselves are apt to revive and gather strength, but the sacramental cup is poison to them. Do you think then that we can too oft take this cup into our hands, or put our hands into Christ's wounds, or take a view of the sin-killing blood?

VII. This ordinance is a choice mean for strengthening our faith in the promises, and confirming us in the sense of Christ's love; and therefore it should be frequently celebrated. It was upon this account, that so great joy and gladness attended the keeping of the passover of old, 2 Chron. xxx. 21, 26. It was the frequent breaking of bread that made the primitive Christians to continue in their gladness of heart, Acts ii. 46. And no wonder a man's heart be glad, and be encouraged to go on his way rejoicing, when he gets a new seal of his pardon and peace with God. We frequently contract guilt, and thereby blot our evidences, and disturb our peace; and therefore we need to come frequently to this ordinance, to get the blood of sprinkling applied, for removing our guilt, clearing our evidences, sealing our peace, and renewing our joy. It is matter of joy to see the rainbow appearing frequently in the clouds as a sign of God's minding his covenant, and securing the world against a destroying deluge: in like manner, it should rejoice the heart, and strengthen faith, frequently to behold this sacrament, which (like the rainbow in the clouds) is a sign of God's securing the believing world against the overflowing flood of God's wrath.

VIII. We need frequently the influences of the Holy Spirit, and therefore should come frequently to this ordinance. For in this sacrament it is most likely that the Spirit will work and exert himself; when the office of the Spirit, and ends of the institutions, meet and agree in one. The office of the Spirit is to bring things to our remembrance, and the chief design of this ordinance is to bring a crucified Jesus, and his love and sufferings, to remembrance; now, surely it is the most likely time for the holy Spirit to come and exercise his blessed function, and join in with the end of the sacrament. Hither, then, should becalmed souls frequently repair, and wait for the Spirit's gales.

I might add many other arguments, but surely, if we had a due sense of our soul's necessities, we should need no more to convince us of the necessity of frequent communicating. Do we not feel our needs frequently recurring, our graces languishing, faith weakening, love cooling, affections turning dead? Are we not apt frequently to grow cold and formal in hearing and praying, yea, dull and lukewarm in all our performances? And have we not frequent need of this reviving and enlivening ordinance, to recruit us with new strength and quickening? But, alas! we have little sense of our souls' wants, and little sense of our Saviour's love; otherwise we would not be so unwilling frequently to remember such an incomparable friend and benefactor, who took our sins upon himself, and cast upon us the robe of his righteousness. Did primitive Christians think once a week little enough to commemorate his love; and shall modern Christians reckon once a-year sufficient? Is this our kindness to the always lovely and loving Jesus! O will we not remember him frequently, who remembers believers perpetually?

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

OBJECT. I. But (say some) the zeal and devotion of the apostolic age is now gone; and Christians are become more careless and formal in religious duties, than in those days, and so are unfit for frequent partaking of this solemn ordinance.

ANS. 1. I grant, indeed, the first Christians were animated with more life and love, and were habitually in a better frame for this love-feast, than, alas! the most of us are: yet, I am persuaded, you will not deny but we are under the same obligations of love and gratitude to our dying Redeemer that they were, and have as much need of the frequent application of his blood, and of a confirmed interest in his meritorious death, as they had. And seeing our obligations and exigencies are the same, our differing so widely from their practice cannot be justified.

2. The ancient church followed the example of the apostolic age, in communicating generally every Lord's day, for several hundreds of years after the apostles' days; as might be made appear, by many quotations (if it were needful) out of the histories and writings of Eusebius, Socrates, Cyprian, Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, and many others of the ancient fathers. As the blood of Christ is as fresh and efficacious in the present, as the first centuries of the church; so it should be as dear and precious to Christians in this as any former age.

3. It is most sad that Christians should be so easy under the decay of piety and love to a crucified Jesus, that is so visible in these latter days. Should not the consideration hereof be matter of bitter lamentations and complaint to all the lovers of Christ, and put us incessantly to cry to heaven, "Wilt thou not receive us again? Renew our days as of old."

4. Is there not ground to think, that the decay of piety and Christian love, in our days, is much owing to the neglect and unfrequent use of this soul-quickenings ordinance? No wonder that our hearts turn hard, when we so seldom have recourse to Christ's blood for softening them, that our graces grow weak and withered, when we so little use Christ's appointed means for cherishing and strengthening them; and that we have but little of the smiles of his face, when we so little regard his dying words. Frequent communicating in Christ's own way and method, might be a mean, through his blessing, to revive decayed religion, to keep sin under constant rebukes and disgrace, and Christ in continual esteem and respect among us. This might contribute to cure and prevent that formality in duty, carelessness of spirit, and forgetfulness of Christ, which so woefully prevails in our land.

OBJECT. II. If we communicate as often as you urge us, we are afraid frequency will breed formality in this duty.

Ans. 1. The apostles and primitive Christians found no such bad effect of their frequent partaking; but were farther from formality, and far more serious, fervent, and spiritual in this duty, than those Christians who now partake but once a-year.

2. Our formality in attending this ordinance is nowise chargeable upon the institution of Christ, or its frequent administration; but upon the corruption and carelessness of our hearts, which all Christians should carefully watch and wrestle against, and labour in the strength of Christ, so often as they partake, to prepare for it with all seriousness and solemnity.

3. Were this a good reason against frequency in this duty, it might be pleaded against frequency in other duties also; and so we should seldom read or hear the word, seldom meditate on God, pray, or sing psalms, lest frequency should beget formality therein. But it is a bad way of arguing, to say, because frequency in prayer, hearing, or communicating, may occasion formality and heart-wanderings, therefore I will seldom pray, &c. No: the inference should rather be, therefore I will watch over my heart more carefully, I will look for the renewed influences of the Spirit, and strive to be more sincere and fervent in duty.

4. Though frequency in partaking should have a bad effect on some, yet it hath and will have a good effect upon others, who make conscience of preparing for the duty. Instead of breeding formality; it begets the greater liveliness and spirituality in them, and will raise their appetite the more after the heavenly manna. It is certain, the oftener we carefully and believingly communicate, the better disposed we shall be for new approaches.

OBJECT. III. The Jews partook of the passover only once in the year.

Ans. God fixed the passover to a certain day of the year, to mind them of their temporal deliverance from Egypt, as well as of their future redemption by the Messiah's death at that time; and therefore it was annual. But besides that, they had their daily sacrifices of slain beasts in the temple, which were lively types of Christ, and a remembrance to them of his death; so that the Jews did not need such a frequent celebration of the passover for that end. But in the new testament church Christ hath settled only his supper as the great ordinance of commemoration of his death and sufferings; and therefore we ought not to confine ourselves to the Jews' annual custom: nay, on the contrary, Christians now, to whom Christ hath made such bright discoveries of his love, in sacrificing himself upon a cross for their salvation, should far exceed the Jews (who lived in such dark times) in expressing love to their Saviour, and in celebrating the memorials of his love to them. The love of the primitive Christians was so warm this way, that they thought themselves bound to celebrate their gospel passover in remembrance of a crucified Christ once a-week, which the Jews did but once a-year.

OBJECT. IV. But, saith one, my business and calling in the world is such, that I have not liberty for frequent communicating, neither have I occasions near me for doing it.

Ans. 1. I grant that all men cannot communicate alike often, seeing the worldly callings and affairs of one man administer more distraction than those of another! And some cannot command their time so much as others.

2. People should do what lies in them to order their affairs so beforehand, that they may have freedom for frequent communicating. But if persons have business brought on them, not by themselves, but by the providence of God, they are excusable for their omission at one occasion; but then they should be careful to lay hold upon the next. In keeping of the passover, there was a dispensation allowed to those that were under ceremonial uncleanness, or engaged in business on a journey, Num. ix., yet it was allowed, not for a year, but for a month's omission. For when they could not keep it upon the 14th of the first month, they were ordered to keep it on the 14th of the next month, and not to stay until the next annual revolution, Num. ix. 10, 11. As it would be agreeable to this injunction, so it would be a desirable attainment in the church, and an advantage to the members of it, if matters were so ordered among us, that, when persons are necessarily hindered from partaking of the Lord's supper in their own congregation, they might be sure of an occasion to do it next month, if not in their own, at least in the neighbouring congregation.

OBJECT. V. The last time I was at the Lord's table I got no benefit by it; nay, I fear I communicated unworthily: now, for me to come frequently in this manner, I fear to contract greater guilt, and do myself more hurt than good. Therefore I will not soon venture upon another approach.

ANS. 1. There are some good things implied in this objection, such as a review of former actions, some sense of sin and trouble for it, and a lothness to offend God; which are some desirable tokens of repentance, and may yield some comfort to an exercised soul.

2. In this case, long deferrings will do you more hurt than frequent communicating: for as by too much fasting we often loose our stomachs; so by long withdrawing from the Lord's table, you may come to lose your desire after the food of your souls, and to have a low esteem of Christ and of his solemn ordinance.

3. There is no communicant but, upon a review, may spy many defects in his frame and preparation, for which he could not answer, if God did enter into judgment with him: but he must not therefore abandon his duty, but flee to Christ's fountain for washing, and to the covert of his righteousness to screen all his imperfections. We read of several in Hezekiah's time, 2 Chron. xxx., that were not so suitably prepared for the passover as they should have been, and ate it otherwise than it was written; and yet, upon Hezekiah's praying for them, God pardoned their sin, and healed them.

4. It may yield comfort to a troubled soul, if upon a review he can say, it was his earnest desire to communicate humbly, with a lively frame, and the exercise of all the sacramental graces; and whatever short-comings he was chargeable with, they were not wilful and allowed, but matter of grief and mourning to him. If this be your case, then your defects are sins of infirmity, which your gracious God will pardon for Christ's sake.

5. Whatever your short-comings formerly have been, you ought to be humbled for them, flee to the blood of Christ for pardon, and resolve in his strength to come more reverently, humbly, and believably to his table for the future, and that in order to renew your covenant with God, and receive a seal of the pardon of all your former sins, and particularly of the sin of unworthy communicating. And this you may expect, if you persevere in the road of duty, looking to God in Christ, who is still ready to welcome and pardon the penitent believer: but to absent and withdraw from God's ordinance, is to put yourself out of the road of his mercy, and to aggravate your former sin of unsuitable partaking.

OBJECT. VI. If we did communicate so frequently, we would not have such time to prepare ourselves for this ordinance as were needful, and as now we have.

ANS. If we partook more frequently, less pains and time about preparation-work might be more successful, and sooner reach the end than all the pains and time we now bestow that way: for thus we might be helped to keep up a communion-frame habitually, and it would be no such difficulty (as now we find it) to get the tears of repentance poured out, or the fire of divine love blown up, when called to celebrate this ordinance. The believer, when in a right frame, the oftener he comes to the communion, he finds the more nourishment, and hath the greater delight in it; and so he comes to have such a longing for the ordinance as the child hath for the mother's breast.

DIRECT. IV.—BE PERSUADED OF THE NECESSITY OF SOLEMN PREPARATION BEFORE YOU APPROACH TO THE LORD'S TABLE.

If we be required to take heed to ourselves, when we enter the house of the Lord, Eccl. v. 1, much more doth it concern us to look to ourselves when we approach the table of the Lord. Why? This holy table is under the gospel the solemn meeting-place of the great God, where he useth to meet with men, and to entertain converse and communion with them. And have we not then ground to call to you in the prophet's words, Amos iv. 12, "Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel?" Remember who it is that agrees to meet with you; it is God, even thy God. Did an angel appoint to meet you at a certain place against such an hour, would you not prepare with all seriousness and solemnity to keep appointment with him? Oh, but it is the God of angels that agrees to meet with you here; even that God before whom all the angels adore, and the devils tremble: a holy and jealous God, who hath declared that he will be sanctified in them that come nigh to him, Lev. x. 3. And can you come so near him any where in the world as at his holy table? What Samuel spoke to the elders of Bethlehem, in the case of offering sacrifice, may well be applied to communicants in the case of approaching to the Lord's table, 1 Sam. xvi. 5, "Sanctify yourselves and come with me to the sacrifice." So, well may your ministers say to you, "Sanctify yourselves and come with me to the sacrament." Come here, and behold the sacrifice of the Lamb of God unto divine justice for your sins: for "even Christ our pass-over is sacrificed for us," 1 Cor. v. 7. Here he is represented as a lamb slain to pacify a holy God for our impurity and unholiness. It is most fit then that we prepare and sanctify ourselves when we venture so near this holy God, and take upon us to celebrate the commemoration of this blessed sacrifice in our gospel-passover.

The Jews had their preparation for the pass-over, John xix. 14. They took the paschal lamb and set it apart from the rest of the flock on the tenth day of the month, but did not kill it till the fourteenth. Exod. xii. 3. 6. And during the four days the lamb was kept alive (Jewish rabbies tell us) they tied it to their bed-posts, that hearing the bleatings of the lamb as they came in and went out, lay down and rose up, two things thereby might be brought to their remembrance; 1. They might look back to Egypt, and remember the sorrows and bondage they endured there, and be thankful for their redemption: and especially, for their deliverance from the destroying angel that night he passed over their houses which were sprinkled with the blood of the lamb. 2. They were to look forward to the Messiah, and remember the bitter agonies and sufferings he was to endure for their sins. Thus the paschal lamb for several days was to be prepared for its sufferings, to teach the people of God solemnly to prepare themselves for eating thereof, and therein to celebrate the memorial of the Messiah's sufferings, which were thereby typified. That the four days' separation of the lamb was a continual standing sermon, preaching, and preparation to the Israelites, as if God had said to them, "Be ye also sequestered from the world, and take time to think on the bleatings of the Lamb, the agonies of Christ, and prepare yourselves for this solemn ordinance." Oh, what shall we say of those who, instead of four days, never spent four hours in serious preparation for our great gospel-passover! O worthy communicants, as soon as you hear the Lord's supper intimated, let the lamb be tied to your bed-posts; entertain the lively meditation of your Redeemer's sufferings, and beg preparation of heart from God for celebrating the memorial thereof. Was our Lord so long a time in preparing for them, and shall we take no time in preparing to behold them especially when it is so highly for our advantage so to do?

We read that the primitive Christians and ancient fathers used to sit up whole nights at prayer, before they approached to the Lord's table, which they called their Vigiliæ.

In this ordinance, God makes great preparation for us; he hath provided a feast which hath cost more than ten thousand kingdoms, or a million of worlds: and ought not the guests who are honoured with an invitation to it to make great and solemn preparation for it? Were we called to dine with an earthly prince, we would dress ourselves, and see to have every thing about us in good order: but here we are called to feast with a holy and all-seeing God, who will infallibly spy out every unprepared communicant, "when he comes to see the guests," Matt. xxii. 11.

If the linen on the communion table, or the vessels that contain the elements, were foul, you would be ready to cry out, It is a horrid shame and abomination to see them in such a case; and so indeed it would, for there ought to be an outward decency in these things; our Lord would have the very room in good order, where he was to eat the passover. But O! it is a small crime to have a foul cloth or vessel for receiving the outward elements, in respect of what it is to have a foul heart, an unprepared soul to receive the body and blood of Christ.

Joseph prepared himself, by shaving himself and changing his raiment, before he went in unto Pharaoh; and wilt thou not prepare thyself, by putting thy soul in the holiest dress and humblest posture, when thou art to go in to the King of heaven and earth? O communicant, thou exceedingly wrongest thine own soul if thou dost it not. Preparation is the seed-time, receiving is the harvest: "as a man soweth, so shall he reap. He who soweth sparingly, shall reap also sparingly: and he who soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully," 2 Cor. ix. 6. It is in the duty of partaking, as in the duty of praying, the more prepared the heart is to pray, the greater is a man's return from heaven, Psal. x. 17, "Thou wilt prepare their heart, thou wilt cause thine ear to hear." So in the case of receiving it may be said, "Thou wilt prepare their heart, thou wilt cause thine hand to give." When God gives us a heart prepared for duty, it is a token he hath a hand prepared for mercy.

Hence it is that the Lord makes that gracious promise, Psal. lxxxi. 10, "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." I will enlarge my hand as you enlarge your hearts. He saith, as Joseph to his steward, Gen. xlv. 1, "Fill the men's sacks with food, as much as they can carry." According as Joseph's brethren prepared sacks in number and largeness, so did they carry corn away; and the fewer and smaller sacks they had, the less they carried away. So here, if you bring prepared and enlarged hearts to the ordinance, you shall be supplied with as much as you can carry.

DIRECT. V.—CONSIDER THAT BOTH HABITUAL AND ACTUAL PREPARATION IS REQUISITE FOR WORTHY COMMUNICATING.

I. HABITUAL preparation is necessary to every communicant, that is, that he be a believer, a man in a gracious state, furnished with the graces of the Spirit, endued with knowledge, faith, repentance, love, and new obedience. No man is fit to approach the Lord's table, till he have these gracious habits planted in his soul. He must be a man that is renewed inwardly by the Spirit of God, and aims at holiness in all manner of conversation. This new wine must not be put into an old vessel, else the wine will be spilt, and the vessel perish. It was an ancient abuse of this sacrament, condemned by the Carthaginian council, to give it to dead men; so it is an abuse condemned by the word of God to give it to dead souls, and those who have no spiritual life. Under the law, God forbade the offering of sacrifices that either were blind or lame, Mal. i. 8, and they that were ceremonially unclean could not keep the passover. The ignorant person's sacrifice is blind, for he cannot give account of his own work: the hypocrite's sacrifice is lame, for he halteth in God's way: the profane man is morally unclean, and so cannot entertain communion with a holy God. Holiness becomes God's house, and in a special manner his table. Habitual holiness is requisite for all that would be worthy communicants. You must be holy universally, holy in the frame of your hearts, and in all the actions of your lives; holy in your shops, by diligence and justice; holy at your tables, by sobriety and thankfulness; holy in the streets, by an innocent, useful conversation; holy in your closets, by prayer and meditation. Yea, you must account your whole lives nothing but an opportunity of serving a holy God, and of mortifying sin and corruption; and this habitual holiness would dispose your souls for the acts of immediate worship.

But unholy persons are altogether unprepared for such a near approach to God. Hearts full of rancour and malice are not meet to come to this feast of love: feet that walk in the ways of sin are not fit to tread in God's holy place: hands stained with injustice are unfit to handle these holy mysteries; mouths that are polluted with swearing and evil speaking are not fit to eat and drink the sacred symbols of Christ's body and blood; eyes defiled with unchaste looks, and bewitched with the world's vanities, are unfit to look on the holy Jesus; ears that entertain reproaches of God's people, and hearken not to the counsels of his word, are not fit to hear the joyful sound of pardon intimated at his table. They who expect the King of glory to enter into their souls at the solemn occasion, must have the doors thereof cleanly and pure. Unhallowed sinners are not fit to receive this hallowed bread and wine. Our Lord's body never saw corruption in the grave, nor will he lodge in those bodies that are as nauseous sepulchres and corrupt sinks of sin. It lay only in a virgin womb and sepulchre, to show that he will only reside in virgin souls, that are devoted and consecrated to his use, and kept pure and chaste for his service, and do not entertain his rivals. I grant, indeed, impure thoughts will sometimes be crowding into the best hearts; but if we do not entertain them, but sincerely strive against them, and earnestly wish for better company, it is a token Christ's Spirit hath entered, and is about his work of purifying the heart.

If we would be habitually prepared for the Lord's table, we must be daily acquainted with the work of mortification and true repentance. We must always eye sin as our Saviour's deadly enemy, have no pity on it, but severely condemn ourselves for every trespass, instantly grieve for it, look to the blood of sprinkling for pardon, renew our resolutions to amend, and pray for special strength against every particular sin. We must daily meditate on precious Christ, and upon his first and second coming, and live continually in the view of death. And if we lived thus, it would not be so hard to prepare ourselves for the Lord's table. If we lived in a habitual preparation for the day of death, we would also be habitually prepared for the day of communion. Had we God frequently in our thoughts, and lived constantly under the sense of his all-seeing eye; on the communion day we should find little else to do but to revive our graces by the exercise of prayer and praise.

II. Actual preparation is also necessary before our approach to the Lord's table. Seeing, alas! the most part of Christians in this degenerate age are so defective in their habitual preparation for this ordinance, they ought to be the more diligent in actual preparation for it. And this consisteth of a great many particulars; such as, 1. Sequestering ourselves from the world. 2. Self-examination. 3. Humiliation for sin. 4. Renewing our personal covenant with God in Christ. 5. Reformation of what is amiss. 6. Exercising of all the graces to a lively exercise. 7. Meditation on the death and sufferings of Jesus Christ. 8. Earnest prayer to God for preparation and assistance in the work. All these belong to our actual preparation for the Lord's supper; and of them I shall afterwards treat more particularly.

Only I shall here observe that both habitual and actual preparation must go together, if we would be worthy communicants. We must both have grace in the habit, and grace in the lively exercise. All wise virgins that wait for the coming of the bridegroom take care to have oil still in their vessels as well as in their lamps: nay, they must see to have their lamps burning every day. But when they hear that the bridegroom is actually coming, then, in order to meet him, they arise and fall afresh to the trimming of their lamps; they snuff them, stir up the light, and apply more oil to make them burn the brighter and clearer. And thus ought you to do, O communicant, if you would have a joyful meeting with your lovely bridegroom in the sacrament. Nay, if you come not with actual, as well as habitual preparation, the sacrament may prove to you as the summer brooks to the thirsty traveller, of which Job speaks, Job vi. 19, 20, "The troops of Tema looked, the companies of Sheba waited for them. They were confounded, because they had hoped; they came thither and were ashamed." Some come to the sacrament with a sort of actual preparation, but have no habitual preparation, no grace in the habit. Some again have habitual preparation, but not actual preparation; they want grace in the exercise. Both these will go from the ordinance, as the troops of Tema and companies of Sheba, disappointed of spiritual refreshment. If we would reap spiritual advantage in this ordinance, we must take care to be ready both ways, habitually and actually; for it is only such that the all-seeing Master of the feast will look upon as worthy communicants.

DIRECT. VI.—BE CONVINCED OF THE GREATNESS OF THE SIN AND HAZARD OF UNWORTHY COMMUNICATING.

WE are told both the one and the other in very plain terms, 1 Cor. xi. 27, 29, "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, is guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." And again, "He eateth and drinketh damnation or judgment to himself." So that we see the sin or crime is no less than that of murdering Jesus Christ, and of being found accomplices of the Jews and soldiers, who imbrued their cruel hands in the innocent blood of the Son of God, which is a most dreadful charge! The hazard to which this sin exposes, is both temporal strokes, and eternal damnation. Seeing I have spoken of the nature and danger of this sin, in the Sacramental Catechism; I shall say the less in this place.

Only to communicate unworthily, is to approach in an unworthy state, or in an unsuitable frame, or with wrong ends. When a person comes to the Lord's table in ignorance, without self-examination, without grief for sin, love to Christ, or faith in his blood, and is unprepared for this solemn ordinance, then he is an unworthy communicant.

Now this must be a very heinous sin; for it imports your undervaluing the blood of Jesus Christ, as if it were the blood of an impostor or malefactor. For if you look on the sufferings of Christ here represented, as the sufferings of the innocent Son of God, and the glorious Saviour of mankind, why do you not come suitably affected therewith, and grieved for your sins that were the cause thereof? But if you do not really own or regard them as such, then, on the matter, you charge Jesus Christ as being the greatest impostor and criminal in the world, in declaring himself to be the Son of God and Saviour of sinners, when, in your esteem, he was not.

If you say, God forbid we be guilty of this, we own Christ to be the Son of God, and the King of glory; why then are you guilty of treason, and of offering the greatest indignity to your prince, by throwing his picture or great seal into a mire, by defacing and defiling a statue erected for his honour and remembrance? For any dishonour done to the image or representation reflects upon the original. What horrid contempt would it be for a subject to come in with nasty clothes and filthy hands, and offer to sit down at his sovereign's table, and dip into the dish with him? Now all this, and much worse, you do, when you sit down unpreparedly at the Lord's table, and eat and drink unworthily.

Nay, you are hereby guilty of the basest ingenuity and of solemn mocking of the Lord Jesus Christ: for, by coming to the Lord's table, you pretend to be doing honour to Christ, to be deeply affected with his sufferings, and to declare your abhorrence of sin, that was the cause thereof. Now when there is really no such thing, but on the contrary, sin is hugged and embraced, what is this but horrid dissimulation with an all-seeing God? yea, it is an acting of Judas's part over again, a "betraying of the Son of man with a kiss."

But which is worst of all, by this sin you become "guilty of the body and blood of the Lord:" for, as he is justly reckoned accessory to a murder who either consents to it, makes light of it, or that abets and entertains the murderers: so unworthy communicants, who look upon the death and sufferings of the Son of God without remorse for their sins that pierced him, nay, love and lodge these traitors in their hearts that betrayed and crucified the Lord of glory, as plainly accessory to the Jews' horrid guilt of shedding the blood of Jesus Christ.

It is a fearful thing to be guilty of any man's blood, even of the blood of a wicked man: but, how much more to be guilty of the blood of a righteous person, even of the Holy One of God? Simple murder is a crying sin, Gen. iv. 10, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth to me from the ground." It cries so, that it gives God no rest, as it were, till he come and take vengeance on the shedder of it. Nature's light taught the barbarians that "vengeance would not suffer a murderer to live," Acts xxviii. 4. But O what a cry do you think the innocent blood of Christ must have against the guilty communicant! It is terrible to have that blood which pleads for sinners crying against thee. Christ's blood applied by faith, "speaks better things than the blood of Abel:" but when it is trampled on in the sacrament, it speaks and cries worse things than the blood of Abel; it will cry for more terrible vengeance than Abel's blood did. Wo to that poor soul for whom Christ's blood speaks not, but ten thousand woes to that soul which this blood speaks against.

It is the worst kind of treason to shed the blood of an earthly king; but what wickedness must it be to shed the blood of the King of kings, one drop whereof is more precious than all the blood which ever ran in the veins of the kings and princes of the world since its first creation! We see what David said concerning the motion for killing king Saul: "Who can stretch out his hand against the Lord's anointed, and be guiltless?" 1 Sam. xxvi. 9. But, O who can be guiltless that stretches out his hand against the Son of God? "Had Zimri peace who slew his master?" cried Jezebel to Jehu, 2 Kings ix. 31: and thinkest thou to have peace, O communicant, that goest to slay thy Master and Redeemer too? If God declared, that on him who slew Cain, "vengeance should be taken sevenfold?" Gen. iv. 15, what vengeance shall be taken on him that slayeth Jesus Christ? Hadst thou never harsh thoughts of the Jews for their cruelty to the Son of God, and yet wilt thou be guilty of worse thyself? The Jews crucified him but once, but thou, by continuing to be an unworthy receiver, crucifiest him often; they did it ignorantly, but thou dost it knowingly. And the time when thou committest this sin, makes thy guilt prodigiously great. Would it not be reckoned a piece of the most barbarous wickedness in a poor traveller, that was found starving by the way-side, and out of pity taken in by a person given to hospitality, for him to rise up, without any provocation, and stab his kind friend, while he was entertaining him at his own table? What a monstrous crime would this be! But how much more is it for you to pierce and stab Jesus Christ, when he is making a rich feast for you, displaying his banner of love, and inviting you to take sanctuary in his wounds!

It was a dreadful curse and imprecation that the Jews wished against themselves, Matt. xxviii. 25, "His blood be on us and upon our children." And now it has accordingly lain upon their heads these 1600 years, which has made them the most miserable people on the face of the earth. And wilt thou venture, by a rash approach to the Lord's table, to bring the Jews' curse upon thyself? Nay, stand in awe of this sin, and the curse following on it, and say with David (when Abishai persuaded him to slay Saul), "The Lord forbid that I should stretch forth my hand against the Lord's anointed." So when Satan or thy own heart would persuade thee to be slight in thy self-examination, formal in thy humiliation for sin, and careless in thy preparation for this ordinance, that thou mightest be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord; let conscience then cry out, "God forbid that I should stretch out my hand against Jesus Christ the Lord's anointed. How can I do this wickedness and sin against God," and wrong my own soul?

O communicant, if thou venturdest on this horrid crime, God will remember it against thee, and make it bitter to thee another day and in another place, if mercy prevent not. As Reuben told his brethren when they were in distress, Gen. xlii. 11, "Spake I not unto you, saying, Sin not against the child, and ye would not hear? Therefore, behold, his blood is required." So, if you approach to the Lord's table in sin, or in a formal way, and without preparation, then look for it, when affliction, sickness, or death comes; or, at least, in the other world, that conscience will fly in thy face, and say, "Spake I not unto thee, saying, Do not sin against the holy child Jesus, and thou wouldst not hear? Therefore behold his blood is required at your hands." And O, what wilt thou do in such an hour?

If thou wouldst prevent such a challenge, take heed to thy preparation, and notice the frame of thy heart. Remember, God will take exact notice of what respect thou hast to the body and blood of his Son, and how thou preparest to receive it, Matt. xxii. 11—13, "And when the king came to see his guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding-garment." Christ observes all those that come to his table; and if there be but one unprepared, he cannot escape his eye, be the number or crowd never so great. He observes with what appetite thou goest to this heavenly feast; he observes with what resolution against sin for time to come, thou goest for pardon of sins past. He notices, O communicant, if thou goest to this gospel-ordinance, in a gospel order. And wilt thou dare to trample on the blood of the Son of God as the blood of a malefactor, and even when he himself stands and looketh on. Will not the sense of his piercing eye overawe you at such a time? Surely, if in any time of thy life thou wouldst be extraordinarily serious, this ought to be the season. Now thou oughtest so to prepare for this feast, that the master of it may see that thou art watchful of his eye, tender of his honour, and fearful of his anger. Forget not what was the fate of that man who came to the wedding-feast without a wedding-garment; when the king challenged him, "he was speechless," and his sentence was, "bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into utter darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

Remember also what strict orders were given concerning Mount Sinai, when God solemnly appeared on it; "if a beast did but touch it, it was to be stricken through with a dart." And, wilt thou venture to touch the table of the Lord with a beastly heart, a heart possessed with brutish lusts? Mayest thou not fear to be stricken through with a dart of God's wrath?

We read of some, as the emperor Henry, and Pope Victor II. that were poisoned with the sacrament, by the wickedness of the priests, who mingled poison with the bread and wine. Didst thou, O communicant, apprehend that the bread and wine before thee were poisoned, would not the very suspicion make thee tremble to eat and drink of it? Well, if thou art an unworthy receiver, there is poison in it to thy soul, and thou hast ground to cry to the minister, as the sons of the prophets did to Elisha. 2 Kings iv. 40, "O thou man of God, there is death in the pot;" there is poison in the bread, there is wrath in the cup: how shall I partake, till this meal be sanctified to me, and my soul sanctified for it?

Our Lord makes a question, Luke xi. 11, "If a son ask bread of his father, will he give him a stone?" No; he will not deal so with a son that comes to his table sincerely to seek bread for his hungry soul; but with an enemy that comes unpreparedly to him, he will give a stone instead of bread: unworthy receiving makes a transubstantiation here, it changeth the bread into a stone; so that it will no more nourish thy soul, than a stone would do thy body: nay, like a stone, it will choke and kill thee, if the Physician of souls do not prevent it.

We are told by the apostle, that unworthy receiving brings on temporal judgments, as well as spiritual and eternal. It brings on sickness and mortality on our bodies, 1 Cor. xi. 30, "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep." And some think it was the pestilence, or some such mortal distemper, that the Corinthians' unworthy receiving brought on them. Well, let us think on this; surely, if ever the pestilence come into Scotland, we may look on unworthy communicating as a chief cause of this desolating stroke.

What a great risk then, O sinner, dost thou run, when thou ventur'est to this holy table without due preparation? Thou even runnest upon the bosses of God's buckler, and provokest the vengeance of God against thyself. Thou mayest justly expect that God will turn it into such a feast to thee, as Belshazzar's was to him, who, in the time thereof, saw "a hand upon the wall writing his condemnation, so that his countenance was changed, his thoughts troubled him, and his knees smote one against another." In this ordinance you make a very near approach to God that is infinitely holy, and who is terrible from his holy places. The nearer God's altar, the fire of divine jealousy burns the hotter; and a wrong touch or look at that time is criminal, and may cost you dear. The Lord smote Uzzah dead for one rash touch which he gave the ark; he smote 50,000 of the men of Bethshemesh, for an irreverent look into the ark; he devoured with fire from heaven Nadab and Abihu, for offering strange incense at his altar: and what he may do to thee for a rash approach to his holy table, none can tell. God may make thee a monument of wrath where thou sittest, strike thee dead with the bread in thy mouth, or cup in thy hand; and if it be otherwise, thou wilt be highly indebted to the divine patience for sparing thee.

And indeed, we have cause to be astonished at the matchless goodness and long-suffering of God, in suffering so many thousands of vile murderers to live so long in this world, and that he should suffer them to approach his table, and to wound and stab his dear Son over and over again, when he hath flames and vengeance at command, and can more easily crush them all, than we can do a moth; and, which is yet more, that he should unto such murderers make and repeat his offers of that blood which they have spilt, to wash them from the guilt of shedding it. And indeed it is this, and nothing but this, which is able to do it.

But, though God be patient and merciful, he will not bear always with such criminals: no, he hath many spiritual and invisible judgments, which he inflicts upon them. He makes fearful breaches upon their souls. He frequently lets loose Satan against them, so that Satan enters in with the sop. And how fearful a thing is it, for the devil to be permitted to enter into a man or woman, and to do it at the Lord's table, so that the man rises up from this holy table with more eagerness after his lusts, and with more resolution and strength to do the devil's service, than before? And thus the table of the Lord becomes the table of devils, and the cup of the Lord the cup of devils, to such persons. And, should God also let loose Satan against their bodies, as upon Judas after the sop, what terrible havoc would he make among unworthy communicants? How fearfully would he revenge the blood of Christ? Many communion-tables would he turn into Golgothas and Aceldamas, places of skulls and fields of blood.

As the sweetest wine becomes the sharpest vinegar, so communion-love, when abused, brings the sorest wrath. The death and sufferings of Jesus Christ are the most serious and awful things that can be represented in the world, and therefore not to be dallied with. The blood of Christ is the most precious thing in the world, and therefore a drop cannot be spilt without a cry for vengeance. And have not the best of us, alas, ground to fear we have contracted much of this guilt? Were our hearts never hard, our affections dead, our spirits carnal, and our minds wandering, when we have sat down at the Lord's table? Nay, have we not all reason to cry with David, Psal. li., "Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation, and my tongue shall sing aloud of thy loving-kindness?" Ought we not all carefully to guard and earnestly to pray against this crying sin, and so prepare ourselves for this holy table, that we may not poison our precious souls with that choice cordial, which is intended for our health and eternal welfare?

DIRECT. VII.—IN ORDER TO YOUR BETTER PREPARATION FOR THE LORD'S SUPPER, SEQUESTERATE YOURSELVES FROM WORLDLY CARES AND BUSINESS SOME TIME BEFORE.

WHEN you see the time of this solemn approach drawing near, separate yourselves from the world, and set earthly thoughts aside, that you may the better apply yourself to the spiritual work you have in hand. Under the law, the Jews were unfit for keeping the passover at the time appointed, in two cases, Num. ix., either if they had touched a dead body, or were in a journey. The first made a man unclean, so that he behoved not to meddle with that holy ordinance, till he were cleansed according to the instituted method, which took up some time to do it. The second made him unfit, in regard his mind and thoughts would be so distracted with the business of his journey, that he could not be in a composed frame for keeping the passover: his heart would be unfixed and disturbed with worldly thoughts.

There are not a few who seem to think, if they be free from a dead body, i. e. if they be not defiled with some gross or scandalous sin, they are fit enough for the sacrament; and that they may approach to it, though they have their hearts in journeys travelling up and down after their worldly affairs. No, be not mistaken; a journey unfits you for the gospel-passover, as well as a dead body; a journeying earthly heart, as well as a notorious defilement by any gross sin. If you would be worthy receivers, you must be abstracted from the cares and vanities of this lower world, and seek after a stayed, spiritual, and heavenly frame of heart. Be not as men in a journey when ye come to the Lord's table, but lay aside all wandering and earthly thoughts; for, if you harbour these about such a time, you will not be in case to answer the apostle's rule, 1 Cor. vii. 35, "Attend upon the Lord without distraction."

We are told, that in the temple of Jerusalem, notwithstanding of the great abundance of flesh sacrificed in it, not one fly was to be seen stirring there. And so it should be with us at the sacrament; not a fly of an earthly or wandering thought should be allowed to buzz or stir there. Now, if these flies be not driven away beforehand, they will surely pester you in the temple, and trouble you when you have most to do; nay, they will mar the duty, and corrupt the sacrifice, as that grievous swarm of flies (mentioned Exod. viii. 24,) did the land of Egypt.

It is a shrewd sign, then, that those who bring earthly and wandering hearts with them to the Lord's table are Egyptians, not true Israelites; seeing they have the Egyptian plague of flies upon them. In the forecited place we are told that there came a grievous swarm of flies into the houses of Pharaoh and his servants, and into all the land of Egypt, so that the land was corrupted thereby; but in the land of Goshen, where the Israelites dwelt, there were no swarm of flies. So, if ye would be worthy communicants, ye should be at the sacrament like the Israelites in Goshen, free of that Egyptian plague of flies; you must not have swarms of earthly thoughts to trouble you there with their buzzing noise and importunity. And the only way to be free of them is to drive them away timeously before, and purge your hearts of earthly affections.

You ought to do as Abraham when he was called by God to sacrifice Isaac on mount Moriah, Gen. xxii. 4, 5, "When he saw the place afar off, he said to his young men, Abide you here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again unto you." Abraham knew if they had gone alongst with him, they would have so disturbed him with their clamour and noise that he could not have offered the sacrifice with any freedom and tranquillity of spirit; therefore when he saw the place afar off, he orders them to stay behind. The same should we be doing with our worldly affairs when we see the time afar off, and much more when we see the time approaching and at hand: then we should give strict orders to all our earthly thoughts and business to stand aside, and not only not to go to the mount with us, but not to go to our closets and retiring places with us. Possibly at such a time some affair of importance may offer to thy mind and require to be considered; but treat all secular avocations as Nehemiah did Sanballat and Geshem, when they sent to him, Neh. vi. 2, saying, "Come, let us meet together in some one of the villages," &c. But mark how he answers them, ver. 3, "And I sent messengers to them, saying, I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down. Why should the work cease, whilst I leave it and come down to you?" And though these companions had so round and peremptory an answer, yet they were importuning him still, ver. 4, "Yet they sent unto me four times after this sort." But he still answered them in the same manner. Thus it will be with a man when he begins to sequester himself for actual preparation for the sacrament; this and the other business will be calling upon him that it may be considered and attended: but let your answer be, "I am doing a great work, I am preparing myself for the sacrament, I cannot wait upon you. Why should the work of preparation cease whilst I leave it and attend upon you?" And though they baunt and importune you many times after this sort, yet still answer them in the same manner.

-Likewise, remember how Nehemiah treated those merchants that violated the Sabbath, Neh. viii. 19, "When it began to be dark before the Sabbath, I commanded the gates to be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the Sabbath; and some of my servants I set at the gates." Do so with your worldly affairs, shut up the gates on your hearts against them, and let them not be opened till all the duties of the solemn occasion be ended. Perhaps, like those merchants, they will be hovering about the gates for entrance: and therefore set conscience to watch at the gates, testify against them, rebuke and threaten them as Nehemiah did. Let thy spirit, in a holy indignation, rise against them, check and chase them from you, as coming most unseasonably to the hurt and prejudice of thy precious soul.

As our Saviour says about prayer, Matt. vi. 6, "Enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray;" so may I say concerning preparation for the sacrament, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door prepare thyself by meditation, self-examination, and prayer; and especially shut the doors of thy heart against secular cares and earthly thoughts about thy business, and then set about the work. The work is so weighty, that it requires all thy thoughts about it. It concerns you to put your soul in the same order and state as if God were calling you to surrender it to him by death; and if you be not ready to die, neither are you to receive the sacrament. All communicants should be in such a posture as our Lord directs, Luke xii. 35, 36, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, that, when he cometh and knocketh, you may open to him immediately." Now, if your hearts be encumbered with worldly things, you cannot be in case to answer this direction; you cannot be in a fit attentive posture to meet with and wait upon the Master of the feast. O communicant, wouldst thou have this ordinance comfortable? say then sometimes before it, Farewell, my wife and children, friends and secular concerns; abide you here at the foot of the mount: be hushed and mortified all irregular passions and affections; you are a clog to my soul, I have something else to do than attend you.

It is most lamentable to consider how many come to the sacrament in such an unprepared manner. Many are in their journeys when they sit down at the Lord's table; many, Egyptian-like, are environed with a swarm of flies, wandering and earthly thoughts; many bring their servants and asses to the very mount of sacrifice; many leave the Lord's work in the very middle to meet with their Sanballats and Geshems; they open the gates on the very sacrament-day to their merchants: nay, the world is both in their hearts and mouths about this solemn occasion.

If we should ask the question at many communicants, which our Lord asked the two disciples he overtook going to Emmaus, Luke xxiv. 17, "What manner of communications are these that ye have one to another, as ye walk by the way?" What manner of conference and communications were those ye had together when ye went home from the preparation-sermon? Nay, those ye had the very morning as ye walked together to the church to receive the sacrament? How ashamed would many communicants be to tell what passed amongst them? There are many who could not answer them with these two disciples, ver. 19, "concerning Jesus of Nazareth;" we were talking concerning a crucified Jesus, our lovely Redeemer; concerning the advantage of meeting with him in the sacrament, and the preparation needful for that end. Nay, it is to be feared the answer of many would be, if they should be ingenuous, We were talking about our corn, cattle, merchandise, families, relations, &c.; these things, alas! many bring in their mouths to the very church-door. But should we search more narrowly, and propose another question: "What manner of thoughts were those you entertained that night, or that morning, before the sacrament?" Oh, the world would cry, fye and shame on the thoughts of many if they were known. Well, remember it, our all-seeing Lord knows them all, and you may expect he will answer you according to the idols of your heart. O purge your hearts from vain thoughts, and sequester yourselves from worldly business, if you would rightly prepare for this ordinance, and profit in partaking of it.

DIRECT. VIII.—SET SOME TIME APART FOR THE WORK OF SELF-EXAMINATION BEFORE YOU APPROACH TO THE LORD'S TABLE.

THIS is a duty indispensably necessary unto worthy partaking, 1 Cor. xi. 28, "But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup." The word which the apostle uses here, dokimazeto, signifies a diligent and narrow search into the nature and properties of a thing, as a goldsmith proves the goodness of his metal. It lies in a close and free communing with our own hearts, by sisting our souls before the tribunal of conscience, and bringing our state and actions to be tried there by the rule of God's word. Self-examination is a reflex act of the mind, whereby we turn our eyes backward and take a view of our bypast life; and also inward, in order to ransack the state of our hearts, and the principles and scope of our actions, by putting such questions to ourselves as these, "What have we been doing? Wherein have we offended? What are we doing now? Where am I, and whither do I design to go? What shall I do to be saved? Wherewithal shall I appear before the Lord?" This duty supposes a serious pause of the soul, an arresting of the thoughts, and an awakening of our powers and faculties to be attentive to this work, that we may proceed with all calmness and serenity, seriousness and deliberation in a matter so important, that we may find out the truth of our state, and sincerity of our performances, the corruption of our hearts, and enormities of our lives. And this must be an exact and impartial search. A general survey of ourselves will not suffice to discover things as they really are; for Satan and our own hearts are very deceitful, and ready to impose upon us in this matter: therefore we must be very faithful and particular in our examination before the sacrament, and not sist in generals, or content ourselves with a superficial inquiry. Some, at such an occasion, act like Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. ii. 3, 5, "I have dreamed a dream, (says he,) but the thing is gone from me:" so say some, "I have sinned, I have come short:" but scarce can tell wherein, when put to it.

If you would deal faithfully in this work, you must retire from the world, and summon yourselves to the bar of your own consciences, accuse yourselves plainly, and try yourselves impartially by the laws of heaven, registered in the holy scriptures. And if you would have a just sentence pronounced concerning your state and ways, then ye must in the first place look up to God for light, direction, and assistance; and then ye must excite and awake conscience to do its office, and to speak and judge for God: for though a judge be on the bench, yet if he be deaf, dumb, or asleep, he cannot judge. Conscience then must be roused up, and charged to act faithfully; and you should pray to God for a lively and tender conscience that will give just and impartial judgment. A deaf conscience that hears nothing, a dumb conscience that speaks nothing, a sleepy conscience that feels nothing, is the greatest plague in the world. But O! it is a great mercy to have a waking and tender conscience, that will faithfully do its office in the duty of self-examination, especially before a sacrament.

This duty is absolutely necessary; for without it we cannot know how it is with us, we cannot know our plagues and miseries, our defects and necessities; and till such a time as we know these, we will neither value nor apply the remedy provided for us in the sacrament. Nay, we will be ready to mistake our condition, and think we are in a good state, that we have true grace, when really we have it not. There is much counterfeit grace in the world, and many are deceived therewith; yea, there is no grace but what hath its counterfeit. What did Moses for a time, but the Egyptian sorcerers did the like? Did Moses bring frogs on the land? so did they. And the magicians' blood and frogs seemed as real as those produced by Moses; and yet they were nothing but counterfeits and external appearances. So there is nothing a true Christian hath or can do, but hypocrites may have and do the same as to outward appearances. Therefore, it is both proper and necessary we bring our graces and duties to be weighed in the balance of the sanctuary.

O communicants, would you know how matters are with you now, and how it is like to fare with you for ever? Would you have your hearts affected with your condition, and made acquainted with Jesus Christ? Would you have a visit from Christ at his table? Would you have grace quickened, and your wants supplied? Would you be worthy receivers, and prevent your eating and drinking your own damnation? Then examine yourselves before ye approach. Many a Christian can declare that the time of their searching themselves in their younger years, in order to prepare for the Lord's table, was the very time their hearts were first engaged to Jesus Christ and serious godliness. O wherefore is it that there are so many dead and formal communicants; why so many hard-hearted and impenitent sinners, who could never yet be brought to mourn for their sins, or turn from them to God and holiness? The reason is plain from God's word, Jer. viii. 6; Lam. iii. 40; Psal.

cxix. 59. They are strangers to the duty of self-examination.

If you neglect to examine yourselves, remember you have to do with an all-seeing and heart-searching God, who will not fail to examine and find out every careless and unworthy communicant to his utter shame and confusion. Christ, whose eyes are as a flame of fire, will certainly come in and see the guests, and when he comes, he will look narrowly upon them: and though the house be full of guests, he will spy out "one man that wants a wedding-garment," Matt. xxii. 11. In a great crowd or multitude, one single man might think to skulk and not be found out; but we see that not one man can escape his piercing eyes; far less then can forty, fifty, or an hundred unworthy communicants think to escape in one of our congregations. Again, remember what was the fate of the man that came to the feast without the wedding-garment. In the first place, we see our Lord not only spied and singled him out, but he examined him also. The man had come without examining himself beforehand whether he had this wedding-garment or not; but God smartly examined him. So that we see, those who will not be at the pains and trouble to examine themselves, God will examine them to purpose: yea, it will be such an examination as the chief captain commanded Paul to be examined with, Acts xxii. 24, viz. that he should be "examined by scourging." Every question and interrogatory that God will put to a sinner, or any unworthy communicant, will have a lash or sting along with it. What a scourging question did he put to that man, Matt. xxii. 12, "Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having a wedding-garment?" It was so sharp, it drew blood of his conscience; nay, it stunned and confounded him: it is said "he was speechless." Friend, says he, why? Thou professest thyself to be a friend of Christ, and dost associate thyself with his friends; but in thy heart thou art an enemy to Christ, a traitor that comest to stab him under the fifth rib, "Therefore bind him hand and foot, and take him away," &c. ver. 13. In the meantime, the man is speechless, Christ-condemned, and self-condemned: he had nothing to say against the justice of the sentence. The man that comes without a wedding-garment on his back, shall not go without chains and fetters on his feet, his hands, yea, on his heart, his will, his conscience, and his whole soul. Better for the man to have examined himself, and so to have prevented this terrible examination and sentence.

God's questions to unworthy receivers will be nonplussing and confounding. Consider these stinging interrogatories, Isa. i. 12, "Who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts?" Psal. l. 16, "What hast thou to do to take my covenant in thy mouth?" Jer. vii. 9, 10, "Will ye steal, murder, commit adultery, and walk after other gods, and come and stand before me in this house?" These be scourging examinations, that fetch blood at every stroke; and you may look for it that God will come and examine thee thus, either by an awakened conscience in this life, or at a dying hour, or as soon as thou enterest into eternity: "and who may abide the day of his coming." Now, the way to prevent such an examination is to examine yourselves: for "if we would judge ourselves we should not be judged." David did not fear God's examination, when he had examined himself sincerely beforehand; nay, with a humble confidence he appeals to God to search him, Psal. cxxxix. 23, 24, "Search me, O God, and know my heart, try me," &c. Wouldst thou prevent the terror of God's search, then put searching questions to yourself beforehand, and see how matters are with your soul. It is better to have conscience awakened to search thee now, than to have it awakened in hell, where there is no place for repentance.

This is a duty incumbent, not only on natural and unrenewed men, and upon those who were not at the Lord's table before, but even upon the best of men, and those who have communicated frequently. We can never be too sure about our soul's estate; besides, we daily contract new guilt, are liable to new decays, new wants, new burdens and grievances; and therefore the best have need to examine themselves every time they repair to this holy feast, but much more they who were never there before.

Now, there are several things you ought to inquire into at such a time: 1. The state and condition of your souls. 2. Your sins and shortcomings. 3. Your wants and necessities. 4. Your ends and designs. 5. Your graces and qualifications.

I have discoursed all these points very fully in my Sacramental Catechism, to which the reader is referred. Some few things more I shall add here.

I. OF THE EXAMINATION OF OUR STATE.

Seeing this holy feast belongs only to the children of God, and those that are strangers have no right to it, it highly concerns all that design to approach to the Lord's table to examine what state they are in. As the Lord cried to Adam in the garden, "Adam, where art thou?" so do thou cry to thy soul, O my soul, where art thou? Art thou in the broad way or in the narrow? Whether art thou in Satan's or in Christ's camp? Whether under a covenant of works or a covenant of grace? Under a cloud of wrath or a banner of love? In a special manner, there are two important questions that every communicant should much think upon: Whose am I? and, Whom serve I? Happy is the man that can answer both these questions with Paul, Acts xxvii. 23, "It is God whose I am, and whom I serve." It is not the devil, it is not the world, it is not my lusts: but God, whose I am, and whom I serve. Surely Paul in this condition, though a poor despised prisoner, was happier than Caesar himself, to whose bar he was then going. Alas! it is to be feared there are many communicants, if they would answer the foresaid questions truly, might say, It is not God, but the devil, or the world, or fleshly lusts, whose I am and whom I serve. "O Lord, pity such, and open their eyes to see what woful masters and bad service they are engaged unto, and deliver them speedily from their bondage."

Look then to yourselves, examine your state, and see if you be among those who have a right to this sacred meal. Have you these characters?

I. Are you priests to God? Under the law, it was not lawful for any to eat of the shew-bread but the priests, Mark ii. 26; so, under the gospel, none have a right to eat of this consecrated bread but those who pertain to the spiritual priesthood. Try then if ye be priests to God. 1. Are you set apart and dedicated to God by your own consent and voluntary resignation? 2. Are you related to the great High Priest of the church, Jesus Christ, and do you pertain to his family? 3. Are you consecrated to God, being washed in Christ's blood? Rev. i. 5, 6, "He hath loved us and washed us in his blood, and he hath made us priests unto God." 4. Do you offer up to God the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praises? Heb. xiii. 15. 5. Do you present the sacrifice of Christ's blood and merits, in the hand of faith, to divine justice, whenever you find yourselves accused by the law, or challenged by conscience? Well then, if you have these marks of priests, it is lawful for you to come and eat of this holy shew-bread.

II. Are you members of God's family and household? then have you a right to this precious food: for Christ's flesh and blood in the sacrament is the food that God provides for those of his own household; not for strangers or foreigners, not for dogs or profane persons, Matt. xv. 26, "It is not meet, saith our Lord, to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs." Are you children of the family? then may you eat of the household provision. But ah, may some say, how shall we be numbered among the children? Have ye faith in a Redeemer? then are ye among the children, Gal. iii. 26, "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." Are ye born in his house? Is there a saving change wrought upon you? Have you the natures of children? Are ye friends of Christ, and sincere well-wishers to him, his family, and interest in the world? then you have a right to the children's bread.

III. Observe the characters of those who were admitted to eat of the passover in Ezra's time, Ezra vi. 21, "And the children of Israel who were come again out of captivity, and all such as had separated themselves from the filthiness of the heathen of the land, to seek the Lord God of Israel, did eat." Now, there are three characters of these ancient partakers mentioned:

1. They were such of the Israelites as were come out of captivity; for while they were captives in Babylon, they did not eat the passover. Well, try yourselves if you be among Christ's ransomed captives, delivered from the bondage of Satan, the reigning power of sin, and captivity of your lusts.

2. They were such as had separated themselves from the filthiness of the heathen, viz. swearing, whoring, drunkenness, profanation of the Lord's day, &c.; these things are the filthiness of the heathens. Examine if you be separated from all these abominations, not only from the practice, but even from the love of them.

3. They were such as designed sincerely to seek the Lord God of Israel. Well, can you say it is the great aim of your soul in approaching to the Lord's table, to seek the Lord and Master of the feast; it is not the outward ordinance, but a gracious meeting with the God of ordinances, that your souls thirst for. Then you may come and eat of the gospel-passover.

By these, and such like characters, let communicants examine what state they are in before they venture to this holy table. This is a feast for Christ's friends to eat of, Cant. v. 1. And if enemies thrust themselves in among them, it is at their highest peril. This ordinance supposes you to be within that covenant which it sealeth; for those who are out of the covenant have nothing to do with the seals of it. It supposes you to have something of that spiritual life which it sustains and nourisheth; so that those who are dead in sin have no right to meddle with it. Uncircumcised persons were not to eat of the passover; so neither are unrenewed persons to eat of the Lord's supper. You must be born before you can eat; you must be united to Christ before you can feed on him; you cannot receive juice or sap from the vine except you are a branch in it. It very much concerns you then at such a time to inquire narrowly into the state of your souls; and in order to attain a true discovery thereof, you ought to put plain and particular questions to yourselves, and charge your consciences, as in the presence of God, to give free and ingenuous answers thereto. And, for instance, see what answers you can give to these Questions following:

1. "Have I ever been spiritually enlightened," and got my eyes opened to see the depravation of my nature, and the sinfulness of my heart and life, and that I am all as an unclean thing before God?

2. "Have I been truly convinced and made sensible of the exceeding evil that is in sin?" Is my heart touched with a deep remorse for it, and brought to lothe it, and willingly to forsake every known sin? Was I ever brought the length, even to be willing to be loosed from this body of flesh, that I may be freed from the body of sin.

3. "Have I been brought to see my absolute need of Christ" to save me from sin and wrath, to bring me unto God, and to give me grace and glory? Have I seen such beauty, and tasted such sweetness in Christ, that he is truly precious to me, and altogether lovely in my esteem, so that I would willingly part with all things for him.

4. "Have I a covenant relation to and interest in God as mine?" Have I made choice of him as my God and portion, and have I resigned and given up myself to him? Can I say, I am thine, Lord, and all I have, both body and soul? Are my eyes the Lord's, to behold his wondrous works? Are my ears his, to hear his heavenly word? Are my taste and smell his, to relish his surpassing sweetness in the creatures? Is my tongue his, to proclaim and triumph in his praise? Are my hands his, to work what is good, and to help his people? Are my feet his, to walk in his ways? Is my understanding his, to know his will, and contemplate his perfections? Is my memory his, to treasure up his counsels and promises? Is my conscience his, for a deputy to accuse or excuse under him? Is my will his, to choose or refuse according to his pleasure? Is my grief his, to mourn for what is offensive to him? Is my hatred his, to abhor and flee from what is hateful to him? Are my desires his, to long and pant for his presence? My love his, to embrace him? My delight his, to acquiesce fully and contentedly in him?

5. "Is sin in some measure mortified in me?" Do I find it weaker, or have I more strength to resist it than formerly? is it now my grief and burden to find it moving and stirring in my heart?

6. "Doth the interest of God my Creator and Redeemer prevail in my heart" above the interest of the world, or of the flesh? Do I seek chiefly, and above all things, the kingdom of God and his righteousness? Do I prefer Jerusalem above my chief joy?

Now, if you thus examine yourselves, and commune with your own hearts in secret, you may, by the blessing of God, come to find out the truth concerning your spiritual state and condition.

OBJECT. But may we not mistake in examining our state? Do not we see the most part of men presuming that their state is safe and good, and having little doubt of their right to the children's bread?

Ans. 1. There are many we need make no great question concerning their state; such as the grossly ignorant, who know not the misery of a natural state, nor their need of Christ; and the openly profane, who go in the broad way of swearing, lying, drunkenness, neglect of prayer, &c. He that runs may read their character, that they are Christless and unconverted: whoever they be that are in this state, and go in it, they are unfit for this ordinance, they are not invited guests, they have no part nor lot in this matter. Ignorant persons cannot examine themselves, nor discern the Lord's body; profane persons mock God when they pretend to seal a covenant with him: and if they thrust themselves upon this table, they affront Christ, and seal their own condemnation. We would reckon it a loathsome sight to see some dead corpse, or men full of plague-sores, sit down beside us at our tables: and do you think that the living and holy God can look with pleasure upon dead sinners, or those with the running ulcers of swearing, drunkenness, &c. sitting at his holy table? Let all such stand off; for they will find poison in the bread, and death in the cup, and go away worse than they came. This is not a converting, but a confirming ordinance in its own nature, and therefore supposes that they are converted and in Christ who come to it.

2. There are others who come the length of a form and profession of religion, that yet are in a bad state; and if they would allow themselves the free use of their reason, and compare their case with the word, they might easily perceive the badness of their condition. Upon a small search they might discover, that though they perform some duties, yet it is not for the glory of God, but to be seen of men, or to satisfy a natural conscience; they rest upon their duties, and make a saviour of them; and though they read, hear, or pray, yet they never notice heart-work; they love the world more than God, and mind the things of the flesh more than the things of the spirit; they are careless about secret prayers, and allow themselves in known sin; they suffer pride, covetousness, malice, revenge, and other lusts, to reign in their hearts without resisting them, or mourning for them: and surely these are black marks of a Christless state. And if ye would set up a tribunal in your own breasts, and hear what God's word and your own con-sciences would conclude concerning your condition, ye would find yourselves ranked among the unclean, and such as have no right to the children's bread, while you remain in your present state; but alas, how many such rush upon this solemn ordinance without any heart-search, or acquaintance with themselves! They trust to their outward form, and hence flatter themselves that they are safe enough; and so, like the "foolish virgins," they slumber away their time, still dreaming of heaven and happiness; and nothing that God's word or ministers say will undeceive them, till the "cry at midnight" awakes them: and behold, then, when they open their eyes, they meet with an eternal disappointment! When they thought of nothing but open gates at the first knock, behold, the draw-bridge of mercy is taken up, and the gates of heaven shut in, and they hear nothing but that terrible voice, "depart from me, I know you not." O that he who searcheth Jerusalem with candles, and knows the heart, would undeceive you, and awaken you in time!

3. There are others who are really in a good state, though the evidences of it are not so clear to them: Satan rises many fogs and mists to obscure the sight of grace, and the saving change that the Spirit of God hath wrought in their souls. Besides what I have formerly said, I shall add these few remarks or questions more by which you may discern it:

1. "Have you got new discoveries of things which ye had not before?" Though perhaps ye cannot tell exactly the time, manner, and steps of the change; yet can ye say with the blind man, John ix. 25, "One thing I know, that whereas once I was blind, now I see." Once I saw little evil in sin, but now I see it exceeding vile and damnable: once I thought there was some good thing in me, but now I see my heart is deceitful and desperately wicked, and swarming full of base lusts: once I slighted heart-holiness, but now I see it to be most beautiful and necessary: once I saw little need of Christ, but now I see he is more necessary to my soul than meat and drink to my body: once I saw little beauty in Christ, but now I see him to be the chiefest among ten thousand, nay, among all the thousands in the world." Then to be sure there is a change wrought; though ye were once darkness, yet now ye are light in the Lord.

2. "What are these things you are most taken up and concerned about?" Can you say, once it was my question, "What shall I eat, and what shall I drink, and wherewithal shall I be clothed?" But now my great question is, "What shall I do to be saved?" Once my main care was to secure and increase my temporal enjoyments; but now it is to lay up my treasure in heaven, and clear up the evidences for it: once the world and temporal things were my uptaking business; but now my Saviour, my soul, and eternity, are my chief concerns, and lie nearest to my heart.

3. How stand your hearts towards secret and spiritual duties, and towards secret and spiritual sins? 1. As for the first, do you earnestly desire and study patience under affliction, meekness under injuries, and contentment with your lot and condition? Do you study humility and lowliness of mind, and desire to have pride brought down, that you may be still lower in your own eyes? Are ye delighted with secret mourning for sin? Are ye desirous of intimate converse with God by secret prayer and meditation? Wherever grace is wrought in the heart, it bends towards God, and centers in him. It is the voice and very first cry of the new creature in the soul, Psal. lxxiii. 28, "It is good for me to draw nigh to God." Nearness to God is the mean of its livelihood and subsistence. This is given as the mark of Paul's change, Acts ix. 11, "Behold, he prayeth." The Spirit of grace is never a dumb Spirit, Zeel. xii. 10; Gal. iv. 6. But if thou art a stranger to converse with God in secret duties, it is a sad sign of thy estrangement to a saving change upon thy soul.

4. How stand you affected to secret and spiritual sins? Are you grieved for your pride and ambition, envy, unbelief, atheistical thoughts, backwardness to duty? &c. Do you feel the stirrings of indwelling corruption and heart-lusts, and earnestly striving against them? Doth the eye of God, or the love of Christ, restrain you as much from secret sins, as from open transgressions? Do you abhor the temptations to sin, and start at the first appearance thereof, like Joseph, Gen. xxvi, "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?"

OBJECT. Alas, I am a poor, dark, confused creature, I know not what to make of my case; I would sometimes fain lay claim to some of the foresaid marks, but presently I am beat off; and all is darkened to me: for when I begin to consider narrowly, I cannot say that I have any true love to Christ, or that I ever rightly closed with him by faith; I know a little of a work of grace in my heart; I cannot take up the beauty of Christ and of holiness.

ANS. I pity those poor trembling, and doubting souls, who cannot attain to any light or clearness about their condition; who yet are labouring for it and would give all the world to obtain it: and though, in the mean time, they dare not renounce all hope, yet they can see no solid ground to build upon, and are often tempted to give over all further endeavours.

To such I would say, that you ought to wait on God, and hold on in the way of duty to your lives' end, whatever discouragements you may meet with therein, God in his own time will let you know that your labour is not in vain. In the mean time, for thy comfort, I would ask thee some few questions:

1. Thou sayest, thou hast no love to Christ, nor hast thou closed with him by faith. But is love to Christ that which thou would fainest have of any thing in the world? Is it thy greatest grief, so that sometimes it forceth tears from thine eyes, that thou canst not get thy wretched heart to love him. Then, to be sure, thou art not destitute of love to him. Hast thou not so much love to him as makes every thing that bears his image amiable in thine eyes? You are afraid you love him not; but can you say there is nothing in all the world would please you so much as one ray or love-blink of his countenance? And though he should never own you, yet you resolve to lie all your days at his feet, and look up to him, and to none other, for salvation: then be of good cheer, poor soul, for these are comfortable degrees of faith and love.

2. What is the object in all the world that thy restless heart is most pointing out after? Canst thou say, if thy heart deceive thee not, it is an interest in Christ, communion with God, and love to his ways; and obtaining of these would yield thee more content than all the gold of Ophir? Then, to be sure, there is true grace wrought in thee. There are many true diamonds that are but like sparks in respect of bigger stones, yet these are as true as the other. Every degree of peace is grace; and sincere desires after grace, are certainly true grace.

3. Upon what is it that you spend the strength of your prayers, and what are you most earnest for? Is it, O doubting soul, for the death of sin, the removal of heart-plagues, the curing of heart-wandering, heart-deadness, and backwardness to duty? Again, dost thou spend another great part of thy prayers for the increase and lively exercise of grace, and for the actings of faith and love? Then this is a sure mark of the Spirit's work in thy soul; for, if thou saw not the evil of sin and beauty of grace, thou would not spend the strength of thy prayers for killing sin, and quickening grace in thy soul.

But, lastly, O doubting soul, if thou canst not win to clearness, by pouring on the marks of grace and faith (as indeed sometimes doubting believers cannot, since there is no mark that can be given, but a scrupulous conscience will find a back door), then try another way, endeavour to act faith in a direct manner upon Jesus Christ? for many times a believer will sooner come to a clearness of his interest, by the direct acts of faith, than by the reflex acts. Therefore, if thou canst not see faith in thy soul, then presently flee to Christ, and lay hold upon the offer and promise of life, as if thou hadst never done it before. Run as a malefactor to the city of refuge for protection, as if you had never fled there before: go as a wounded man to the physician for a plaster to thy wounds, as if you had never got one applied before. Go transact and covenant with God in Christ, as if you had never essayed any thing like it before; for whatever you have been, Christ still tenders himself to you to be your Saviour, and you cannot possibly be so willing to accept of him as he is to accept of you. Try this method, and there is good ground to hope, that light will break up, and fears vanish; and so you may with comfort come to this sealing ordinance.

II. OF THE EXAMINATION OF OUR SINS.

Examine yourselves of your sins and shortcomings; take an account of your debts, and see how great they are: put the question to yourselves, which the unjust steward put to his Lord's debtors, "How much owest thou to my Lord?" And see that ye tell the truth, and do not for an "hundred" write down "fifty," as many a false conscience doth: but deal truly and ingeniously, for an all-seeing God is looking on. Do as the Jews, who, before the celebration of the pass-over, searched their houses for leaven very narrowly; they lighted candles, and sought every corner and hole therein; and when they found it, they threw it away with detestation. Some think it is with allusion to this custom, that the Lord is said "to search Jerusalem with candles," Zeph. i. 12. In like manner, you must narrowly search every corner of your hearts for the "leaven of pride, avarice, malice, and hypocrisy," 1 Cor. v. 7, 8. The iniquities of wicked men will find them out, but good men will find out their iniquities. Now if ye will find them out, ye must set them apart, and convene your souls before God and conscience, and compare your hearts and lives with God's word, and the rule of his commandments. Look back upon your actions, recal the passages of your lives, and remember your faults before the Lord. If you would have your repentance full, ye must endeavour to take a full and particular view of your sins, both original and actual, of omission and commission, of youth and riper age, of purpose and of practice, of heart and of life. View your sins both secret and open, against the first and second table; consider how ye have wronged God, your neighbour, and yourselves; how ye have transgressed every commandment, either in thoughts, words, or deeds: think upon the lusts of your hearts, the sins of your tongues, and outbreakings of your lives. Particularly, search out your predominant and beloved sins, and also the heinous circumstances and aggravations of your sins; and forget not to examine yourselves concerning the breach of former vows, and the guilt contracted since the last sacrament. Let no wound or sore be concealed or skinned over, but search them all to the bottom, if you would have them perfectly cured. Let it not satisfy you to ask conscience in an cursory way, concerning the foresaid sins, but wait for an answer, nay, urge it to give it, and put it hard to it.

III.—OF THE EXAMINATION OF OUR WANTS.

Examine your wants and necessities, and come sensible of them to this ordinance, where ye may find all needful supplies treasured up in Christ's fullness, which is here exhibited; search out your defects and needs, and come to Christ with them. Are you polluted, heavy laden, and under bonds and terror? Do you see yourselves blind, naked, lame, sick, or wounded? Come sensible of thy miseries, O sinner, to Christ, who has a broad plaster for every sore. Dost thou find thy graces weak? Doth thy faith shake, thy hope stagger, thy love decline, thy holy desires abate? Dost thou want wisdom, sincerity, self-denial, meekness, humility, or brokenness of heart? Then come sensible of these defects to Christ for new supplies and reinforcements. Do you want a sight of your interest in Christ, a seal of your pardon, clear and unclouded evidences of grace, a view of the King's face, or strength to vanquish your lusts? Nay, are you oppressed with bodily wants and infirmities, crosses and losses, and many outward pressures and afflictions? Then come with a due sense of all these wants and burdens upon your spirits to Jesus Christ, and cast them all upon him. In this ordinance, Christ sets himself upon a throne of grace with a sceptre of mercy in his hand, and waits to hear his people's complaints and petitions. A feasting time is a time of granting requests; see then that you be ready to present your's at this feast? Christ here saith to thee, as the king did to Esther at the banquet of wine, Esther v. "what is thy petition? and what is thy request? and it shall be granted thee." Or, as he said unto the blind men, Mat. xx. 32, "What will ye that I shall do unto you?" Be ready with them to answer, "Lord, that our eyes may be opened;" or, Lord, that our hearts may be softened; Lord, that such a weak grace may be cherished, that such a strong lust may be vanquished, that such a plague may be removed, &c.

IV.—OF THE EXAMINATION OF OUR ENDS.

Examine your ends and designs in approaching to the Lord's table. Christ examines the people's ends in going to hear John, Matt. xi. 7, "What went you out for to see?" Much more ought we to examine our ends in going to the Lord's table. See that it be not to observe the fashion of the country where you live, or to get a name, and be the better thought of by ministers, friends, or neighbours, or to make atonement for your sins, as some ignorant persons among us apprehend, who rest upon the bare ordinance, and outward signs and elements, for pardon and justification, without looking to Christ for it: thus, alas, many content themselves with Elijah's mantle, without asking for the God of Elijah; give them the shell, they ask not for the kernel: let them have their communion (as they call it) though it really be nothing but a bit of bread and a sip of wine, they think all is well, their sins are pardoned, they are sure of heaven, they are ready to die, the devil can have no power over them; and so they use this sacrament as a charm, being ignorant of the true ends and uses of it.

QUEST. What are these ends and designs we ought to have in our approaches to this sacred table?

Ans. It is of great consequence to be well instructed hereof, and to try ourselves diligently concerning them. Examine then,

(1.) If it be your design sincerely to give obedience to our Lord and Saviour's call. Can ye say, that his authority had a powerful influence upon you in this matter and ye dare not slight it, and that ye cannot think of neglecting Christ's dying charge, and the command he hath left behind him to his disciples, to solemnize and celebrate the memorial of his dying love?

(2.) Is it your design to show forth Christ's death? This should be your great business in this ordinance, 1 Cor. xi. 25, 26. You are to show forth and annunciate Christ's death three ways:

1. With respect to yourselves, you are by this sacrament to give a lively representation to your mind of Christ's death, and keep up a fresh remembrance of his sufferings and dying love, and of the great propitiatory sacrifice he offered for you upon the cross, and the great things he hath thereby purchased for you; and hereby you are to raise your faith and hope in a crucified Saviour.

2. With respect to the world, you are hereby to testify your respect to a crucified Christ, and that ye publicly own yourselves to be his disciples; and are not ashamed of a crucified Jesus, or his ignominious death, but glory in it, as the wisdom of God, and power of God; and count it your honour to be his followers. As also, ye declare that ye look to his death and merits as the only hope of your salvation, and reject all other saviours besides him.

3. With respect to God, and that two ways: 1st. Show forth Christ's death to a just and sin-revenging God, in a way of faith and prayer: present and plead this sacrifice as a screen and defence against the sword of justice, the wrath of God, and curse of the law; plead it as the ground of all your hopes and desires. 2d. Show it forth to a good God in a way of thanksgiving and praise. Praise God for such a glorious Redeemer, and such an excellent sacrifice; bless him that sent him, and bless him that came. Thanksgiving to God is a special design of this ordinance, and upon this account it is called the Eucharist, or thanksgiving. Here it is we should celebrate the praises of our Redeemer, who came from a throne to a dunghill, yea, from the height of glory to the depth of misery, to save us from perishing eternally.

(3.) It is your design to renew a seal and covenant with God in Christ, ratify your baptismal vows, and solemnly bind yourselves to be the Lord's people? As believers here come to get God's seals of his covenant, for confirming their right to the benefits of it; so also they are to seal their covenant engagements, to take God for their God, accept of Christ for their prince and Saviour, give up themselves to him, renounce sin and walk in the ways of gospel-obedience. Now, because many profess to covenant with God in this ordinance, who yet deal falsely with him, you ought to be at great pains to try the sincerity of your hearts in this matter. And for trial of it, see if you can say, that your wicked hearts are a greater burden to you than all the crosses and troubles you meet with in the world; and that you are more desirous to be rid of sin and heart-plagues, than of any affliction whatsoever. Or, can you say that you desire heart-holiness, and further degrees of grace, of faith, love, and brokenness of heart for sin, more than any honours, profits, or pleasures, this world can afford? Or can ye say, that the world's best things are in your eyes as dung or nothing, in comparison of Christ and his righteousness, and an interest secured therein? And can ye say that ye are sensible of your own insufficiency and weakness to make or keep any covenant with God; and therefore ye are made to renounce all confidence in yourselves, and to say, "In the Lord only I have righteousness and strength?" Then these are good signs that you are honest and sincere in the making of this bargain, and are likely to be found steadfast in God's covenant.

(4.) Is it your design to draw near to God, and hold intimate communion and fellowship with Christ in this ordinance? And do you earnestly desire that "ye may sup with him and he with you?" This table is instituted for the kindly correspondence of Christ and his people, and their mutual feasting one with another: for, as Christ here sets before you the dainties and comforts of heaven, and invites you to feast thereon; so you are to set your graces and affections before him, and invite him to come into his garden and eat his pleasant fruits. You are to come here, not only to receive the tokens of Christ's love to you, but also to give the expressions of your love to him. Here there is a mutual communication of secrets betwixt Christ and his people.

(5.) Is it your desire to get your manifold wants supplied out of Christ's fulness? Is it your earnest desire that his ordinance may be an effectual mean, through the blessing of God, for the weakening and killing of your sins and lusts, the nourishing and strengthening of your souls, the curing of your diseases and plagues, the increase and exercise of your graces; particularly for strengthening faith, inflaming your love, kindling your desires, quickening your hope, and renewing your repentance and resolutions against sin.

Again, is it your design to get clearer evidences of your interest in Christ, the smiles of his face, and comforts of his Spirit? Would ye have a seal of your pardon, a display of the riches of free grace, a sight of the "Sun of righteousness, the love of God shed abroad in your hearts," and all your fears removed? Would ye have at this feast furniture for your spiritual journey, support under affliction, strength against temptations, and preparation for suffering? Would ye have a pledge and foretaste of heaven, and the eternal communion that is above? Then these are good designs; and if you be sincere in them, you may expect a welcome from the master of the feast.

V.—OF THE EXAMINATION OF OUR GRACES.

A fifth thing you must examine yourselves of, in order to prepare you for this holy table, is your graces and qualifications. Search diligently if you have those sacramental graces requisite in worthy communicants; such as knowledge, faith, repentance, hungry desires, and new obedience.

I. We must examine our knowledge, and see if we have a competent understanding of the principles and grounds of Christianity, and of the nature, signification, and use of the Lord's supper. Without this, we cannot know God nor ourselves; we can neither know God's infinite justice and purity, our own natural corruption and misery, nor Jesus Christ our great help and remedy, the knowledge whereof is absolutely necessary to worthy communicating. In some churches, in ancient times, infants and children were admitted to the Lord's supper, and the Greek and Armenian churches do the same at this day: but we justly dissent from them in this practice, because it is necessary, in order to our being fit and worthy partakers, that we "examine ourselves" and "discern the Lord's body" repentance? Doth it beget in you a vehement hatred and indignation against sin, and a watchfulness to prevent it? Wherever there is true repentance, there will be a hearty aversion to sin. As a burned child will dread the fire; so a Christian, who hath truly repented of sin, is so sensible of the weight of sin, and the wrath of God, that he has resolved never more to touch these burning coals. David, who before his repentance had his conscience so hardened that he could even drink the blood of Uriah; yet, after his repentance, his conscience was so tender that he refused so much as to drink of that water which had been but the occasion of hazarding men's lives.

And, lastly, doth thy repentance work in thee a holy revenge against sin? Dost thou look upon it as the enemy of God, the murderer of Christ, and destroyer of thy soul? and upon that account, that it doth not deserve to live? It was Esau's expression, Gen. xxvii. 41, "The days of mourning for my father are at hand; and then will I slay my brother Jacob." But say thou, O communicant, "The days of mourning for the death of my dear Saviour, and everlasting Father, are come; and now will I slay my most beloved lusts, now will I be revenged on them for seeking to rob me of my spiritual birth-right, and wrong me of my eternal blessing, and which is worse, for actual crucifying of my glorious Redeemer. Shall sin be suffered to live in my soul, that would not suffer my Saviour to live in the world? Away with it, away with it; crucify it, crucify it." By such marks as these, try the sincerity of your repentance.

As for the trial of your love, desires, spiritual appetites, new obedience, and other graces, seeing I have no new thing here to add, I refer you to my Sacramental Catechism.

SOME OBJECTIONS OF DOUBTING CHRISTIANS, RELATIVE TO THE FORMER DOCTRINE, ANSWERED.

OBJECT. I. By what I have heard (may some say) I fear I am not fit nor prepared for this solemn ordinance; and it being a thing so dangerous to come to it unpreparedly, I tremble and fear to go forward to that holy table.

ANS. 1. Did you always keep the fear of God in your souls, preparation-work would be less painful, and an approach to God less frightful than now it is; for then you might go to the Lord's table with a holy fear and reverence, and slavish fear would not so much haunt you. Did you keep more at a distance from sin, and fear to do what God has forbidden, you would not so much fear to do what he hath commanded.

2. Though you be not so prepared for this ordinance as you desire, yet if you sincerely make conscience of preparation-work, and do your utmost to get yourself ready, you ought to go forward in obedience to God's command, "Do this in remembrance of me." I know there are not a few exercised Christians brought to great straits betwixt a sense of their unfitness and the obligation of God's command, so that they know not what they do; their fears and discouragements are so great, they are like to be overwhelmed with them. But let such mind the word of the Lord to the children of Israel, when they were in great perplexity at the Red sea, and their hearts sinking for fear, Exod. xiv. 15, "And the Lord said unto Moses, Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward." Forward, might they say (and the deep sea before us), as good go backward to the Egyptians, or stand still and let them come up and put us to the sword, as go forward into the sea, and be drowned; surely, the deep sea will have no merey on us more than the Egyptians. But, for all this, "speak to the children of Israel," (saith the Lord) "that they go forward." Let them obey my commandment, and trust me with their lives. Here is encouragement to the doubting believer, that in all sincerity makes preparation for this ordinance, though he hath many doubts about his right to it, and great fears about the event of the duty: the Lord bids us speak to such a man, that he go forward: let him obey God's commandment, trust God for his through-bearing and success.

OBJECT. II. But (saith another) none should come to this table, but they who are in a state of grace; and I apprehend I have no grace, I cannot lay claim to any of the marks of grace before-mentioned, and, particularly, I want faith in Jesus Christ; and how shall I go to the Lord's table?

ANS. There may be true grace and true faith in a soul, sincere and acceptable before God, though yet the degrees of it may be so small, and the operation of it so weak, that it can hardly be discerned by us. Now, though you cannot lay claim to the foregoing marks, yet see if you can at least answer to the following questions:—

1. Do you not see yourself undone and lost for ever without Christ, and that none but Christ can save you, and you never resolve to look to any other?

2. Are you not grieved for the sins that have undone you, and would as willingly be free of them, as ever a sick man would be free of his sickness, or a prisoner of his chains?

3. Do ye not conscientiously practise whatever you are convinced to be your duty, and dare not omit it when you know it? Do ye not sincerely aim at prayer, searching the scriptures, mourning, meditations, and other duties?

4. As you dare not omit these duties, can you say also, that you dare not rest in them, nor rely on them, because you see your prayers for pardon have need of pardon, and your tears for sin have need themselves of being washed in the blood of Christ?

5. Do you unfeignedly desire Christ, and hunger and thirst for him and for his righteousness, as that which only can be sufficient to cover the nakedness of your souls? Are you willing to accept of him on any terms, willing that he should sanctify as well as save you, bring you to obedience as well as to glory? Doth your judgment value Christ above all, and doth your will choose him before all things? If you doubt whether you love him, yet tell me whether you would love him if you could? If you doubt whether you have already received him, yet tell me whether you are unfeignedly willing to receive him? Then these are some degrees of grace, some workings of faith, well-pleasing in God's sight; and do you cherish and improve them in the use of God's appointed means; they will increase.

OBJECT. III. But (saith one) we are required to draw near to God with a true heart, in full assurance of faith; and how can I be accepted, who have a heart full of fears and doubts?

ANS. 1. The assurance of faith is indeed to be sought and endeavoured by all in their approaches to God, but yet it is not the attainment of every believer in his approaches to God: for there are some who have come to him with much fear, and yet have gone away with much comfort. Mark v. 32, the woman that had the bloody issue came fearing and trembling, and fell down before Christ; and yet Christ said to her, ver. 34, "Daughter, go in peace;" she came to Christ in fear, and yet went away in peace.

2. The best course we can take, under a burden of fears and perplexities, is to go with them to Jesus Christ for relief. David, when he was overwhelmed therewith, gets to the "Rock that was higher than he," Psal. lxi. 2, and on this rock he lays all his burdens, and founds all his hopes. O believer, your rock Christ is higher than you, higher than all your enemies, higher than all your fears and temptations; he is sufficiently able to overmatch them all. Get yourselves to this strong rock, and shelter your souls in the clefts thereof.

OBJECT. IV. But (saith another) I have little hope of meeting with Christ at his table; and what should such a hopeless creature do there?

ANS. 1. It is indeed the duty of all believers to come to this ordinance with raised hopes and expectations of meeting with Christ; for ordinarily "his mercy is upon us according as we hope in him," Psal. xxxiii. 22. Yet,

2. A believer may sometimes meet with Christ, when he has least hopes to find him. For Mary, when she met with Christ, John xx. 15, and supposed he had been the gardener, and had inquired of him as such for Christ, she had little hope; for, before he answered her, she turned herself from him, and thought it wholly needless to stand talking with him about finding Christ; and this appears by her turning herself to him, as we are told she did, when he spake the word that gave her comfort. Christ called her by her name, Mary, and made himself known to her, just when she had turned from him as hopeless of finding him. It is good then, O discouraged communicant, to be in use of means, searching and trying yourself, and making preparation for this ordinance, however small your hopes may be of success: for a poor soul may sometimes find Christ, when he hath least hopes of doing so. "Or ever I was aware (saith the sponse) my soul made me like the chariots of Amminadab," Cant. vi. 12.

DIRECT. IX.—SET TIME APART FOR DEEP HUMILIATION AND MOURNING FOR YOUR SINS, BEFORE YOU APPROACH TO THE LORD'S TABLE.

HAVING found out your sins by self-examination, as before directed, you ought to be deeply humbled for them, and ingenuously confess them before the Lord in secret; and that you may speed the better in this work, join fasting with your humiliation, for we are commanded to turn to the Lord (Joel ii. 12. "with fasting, with weeping, and with mourning."

Fasting, so far as the state of the body and health will allow, is one of God's appointed means for removing that drowsiness and heaviness, that dullness and deadness of spirit, which we are otherwise liable to; and also for bringing the body more in subjection to the soul, and fitting both for the better performance of holy duties, as meditation, prayer, reading, hearing, examining, judging, and reforming ourselves. It tends to promote spiritual-mindedness, kindle zeal, quicken prayer, and to wean the heart from the world; and the soul being hereby for a time taken off from the thoughts, cares, and pleasures of this life, is the more disposed to be wholly intent and taken up in the work and special duties of the day. Fasting likewise carries in it somewhat of a holy revenge upon the flesh for its former excesses, which in a sincere penitent is acceptable to God, though it cannot make satisfaction to divine justice for the least sin. It also implies a deep sense of our guiltiness and ill-deservings before God, and is a plain acknowledgment of our unworthiness of the least mercy, even of the common necessities of life, and far less of the heavenly manna that God provides for his children in the sacrament. Now it is the humble and self-condemning sinner that God is pleased to lift up and comfort. But it is not enough that the head "be bowed down as a bulrush for a day;" that the outward man be humbled, or the body chastened; this is not the fast which God hath chosen: the soul must be afflicted before the Lord, and the man inwardly troubled and cast down for offending God.

O communicant, believe it, and be firmly persuaded of it, that repentance and humiliation for sin is a most important and necessary work for thee before the sacrament. Antinomians vilify this doctrine of repentance, and say, it is no part of the gospel; that it is a legal duty, and not necessary to the obtaining of pardon. But to show you a little of the excellency and necessity of this duty, consider that our Saviour, the great prophet of the church, doth teach it as one of the first and chief lessons of the gospel. When he sent John Baptist, as the harbinger of the gospel, the first text he preached on was repentance, and his doctrine was, Matt. iii. 2, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." When Christ, the author of the gospel, appeared himself, the first sermon he preached was a sermon on repentance also, Matt. iv. 17, "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Yea, our Saviour tells us, that it was for this very end and purpose he came down from heaven, and was made man, that he might preach repentance unto the world, Luke v. 32, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." And, accordingly, the first and chief thing that Christ commanded his apostles to preach was repentance, Mark vi. 12; Luke xxiv. 47. And in obedience to these orders, the first thing that Peter preached to the Jews was repentance, Acts ii. 38. Nay, further, our Saviour tells us, that repentance is a chief part of his purchase for sinners, and one of the chiefest gifts which he bestows upon them. He not only came from heaven to preach repentance, but also to shed his blood to purchase repentance to us; and therefore he instructs his disciples, Luke xxiv. 47, "to preach repentance to the world in his name," i. e. as his purchase; and his apostles assure us, that he arose and ascended for this very end, that he might bestow the gift of repentance on his people, Acts v. 31. Now certainly, if repentance had not been so excellent a work, and such a necessary gospel-duty, Christ and his apostles had not insisted so much upon it; our Saviour had not begun his public ministry with it; nor had he told us so peremptorily, and so often, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

Tertullian says of himself, that he was born to nothing else but to repentance: a saying well worthy of our most serious observation. Likewise it was the saying of a godly minister, "That if he were to die in the pulpit, he would wish to die preaching repentance; and, if out of the pulpit, he would wish to die practising repentance." This is a duty always in season, and never more seasonable than when we go to seal a covenant with God, or go to receive the seal of God's Spirit in the sacrament. We know hard wax will not receive the impression of the seal, wherefore we must first melt or soften the wax before we apply the seal; so the heart must be first softened and melted by repentance and humiliation for sin, before any impression be made thereon by the heavenly seal of God's Spirit in the sacrament.

What Bathsheba saith, Prov. xxxi. 6, 7, is very applicable here, "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts (or bitter in soul.) Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more." So the wine in the sacrament is not for the secure and impenitent, but for those who by repentance and humiliation for sin are in poverty of spirit, bitterness of soul, and heaviness of heart for grieving and offending God. The Lord is graciously pleased to appoint this wine for them, to refresh and comfort their hearts against the sense of their poverty and misery. "Blessed are they that mourn (at this occasion) for they shall be comforted; their sorrow shall be turned into joy."

But if you come with impenitent, insensible, and hard hearts to the Lord's table, you will kindle the Lord's wrath against you for crucifying his beloved Son. As king Ahasuerus's wrath was kindled against Haman for his bloody plot against his beloved Esther and her people, even while he was at the banquet of wine, and presently gave sentence against him: so may the King of heaven's wrath be kindled against thee, while at this spiritual banquet, and pass sentence on thee presently, and say, "Let Satan enter in with the sop, and seal him under his hardness and impenitency, and carry him on to all ungodliness till he be ripe for hell."

What Christ said of the Pharisees' proselyte, Matt. xxiii. 15, "He was made two-fold more the child of hell than themselves," may well be said of impenitent receivers; by their communicating in this case, they may make themselves two-fold more the children of hell and the devil than they were before: for thereby they fall more under the power of Satan; they increase their hardness, strengthen their lusts; and to all their former sins they add the guilt of profaning God's ordinance, crucifying the Son of God afresh, and trampling his precious blood under foot.

Impenitent partaking is a crime so offensive to a holy God, that it will bring all your other sins fresh into God's remembrance, and excite him to visit you for them, according to that word, Hos. viii. 13, "They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings, and eat it; but the Lord accepteth them not:" that is sad enough, but worse follows: "Now will he remember their iniquity, and visit their sins." Now will he do it, even while they are offering their sacrifice. O impenitent sinners, God remembers your sins at all times, but especially when you come to the sacrament in a hardened case; then will he remember how you have formerly abused his mercies, wounded his Son, grieved his Spirit, misspent your time, neglected his worship, dealt hypocritically with him, been unjust to your neighbours, hated his people, &c. So that he will, at the very time you are receiving, come and visit your sins, smite you with his wrath, and give Satan power over you. O then, were it not far better for you, before you come to the Lord's table, to be remembering your sins, and humbling yourselves for them before the Lord, than to have God remembering them in wrath against you, when you are at the table?

Now for your help in this matter, set time apart before the sacrament, read over our Larger Catechism upon the ten commandments; and as you read, carefully observe and mark the duties you have omitted, and the sins you have committed against every one of the commands; and from this you may form a black catalogue of your sins, which you ought to spread, as Hezekiah did Sennacherib's letter, before the Lord, and likewise before the face of your own consciences. Had we but our eyes enlightened by God's Spirit, to take a view of ourselves and our manifold spots, in the glass of God's holy and extensive law, then would we go humbly to God, with ropes about our necks, sorrow in our hearts, tears in our eyes, and confessions in our mouths, cast ourselves down at the footstool of his mercy, and make full and particular acknowledgments of our guiltiness before him.

And to give some instances: when we view the first commandment, let us be humbled for our sins against it, and confess them: "Ah! have I not been guilty of much heart atheism? Have I not doubted of the being or providence of God? Have I not much ignorance, and many wrong thoughts and misapprehensions of God? Have I not been forgetful of God my maker and preserver? Have I not put the creature, the world, self, and other things, in his room? Have I not ascribed my mercies to others, to fortune, to my own wisdom and industry, rather than to God? Alas, for my self-love, self-seeking, unbelief, distrust, hatred of God, grieving his Spirit, dislike of his image in his ordinances, his children, &c.

2. How have I sinned against the second commandment, by devising or approving other ways of worship than God hath appointed, by not prizing pure ordinances, by making representations of God in my mind, and entertaining wrong conceptions of him?

3. Against the third commandment, by abusing God's name, his scriptures, his ordinances; by irreverent approaches to God, hypocrisy, careless hearing and communicating; by perjury, swearing rashly, breach of oaths and vows; by having a hand in the perjury or false-swearing of others; by wresting the word, misapplying providences, unthankfulness for mercies, insensibleness and incorrigibleness under judgments and afflictions.

4. Against the fourth commandment, by forgetfulness of the Sabbath before it came, not preparing for it, not labouring to prevent what might distract me in the duties of the Sabbath: by profaning the Sabbath when it came, by idleness, needless visits, unsuitable thoughts, words, and actions; by worldly cares and business on the Sabbath; by needless recreations, seeking my own pleasures, not performing, or careless performing of the duties of the Sabbath, both in public and private. Alas, I have been so far from calling the Sabbath a delight, that ofttimes my heart hath said, What a weariness is it? Ah, the strict observation of the Sabbath hath been tedious to me, I have shifted it over, and said, When shall the Sabbath be gone? &c.

5. Against the fifth commandment, by not behaving myself answerably to my natural, ecclesiastical, and political parents; not loving them, praying for them, and covering their infirmities: by not behaving suitably towards my inferiors, and not admonishing and encouraging them in well-doing, not correcting children, or doing it unduly, provoking them to wrath: and also carrying unsuitably towards my equals, envying their gifts, prosperity, or grieving at their advancement.

6. Against the sixth commandment, by sinful anger, hatred, malice, desire of revenge, immoderate use of meat and drink; by quarrelling, fighting, striking, wounding, and doing several things that tend to take away the lives of others; sowing strife and discord among friends, &c. by not being duly concerned for the preservation of the lives of others, whether of their souls or bodies.

7. Against the seventh commandment, by unchaste thoughts, words and actions; by unclean imaginations; obscene speeches, wanton gestures, immodest apparel; not watching over my senses, heart, words, actions; by going into bad company, occasions of uncleanness; by drunkenness, gluttony, and other temptations thereunto.

8. Against the eighth commandment, by stealing, defrauding, oppression, extortion, unfaithfulness in bargains and contracts, idleness, prodigality, inordinate prizing of worldly goods.

9. Against the ninth commandment, by slau-

lift up and comfort. But it is not enough that the head "be bowed down as a bulrush for a day," that the outward man be humbled, or the body chastened; this is not the fast which God hath chosen: the soul must be afflicted before the Lord, and the man inwardly troubled and cast down for offending God.

O communicant, believe it, and be firmly persuaded of it, that repentance and humiliation for sin is a most important and necessary work for thee before the sacrament. Antinomians vilify this doctrine of repentance, and say, it is no part of the gospel; that it is a legal duty, and not necessary to the obtaining of pardon. But to show you a little of the excellency and necessity of this duty, consider that our Saviour, the great prophet of the church, doth teach it as one of the first and chief lessons of the gospel. When he sent John Baptist, as the harbinger of the gospel, the first text he preached on was repentance, and his doctrine was, Matt. iii. 2, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." When Christ, the author of the gospel, appeared himself, the first sermon he preached was a sermon on repentance also, Matt. iv. 17, "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Yea, our Saviour tells us, that it was for this very end and purpose he came down from heaven, and was made man, that he might preach repentance unto the world, Luke v. 32, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." And, accordingly, the first and chief thing that Christ commanded his apostles to preach was repentance, Mark vi. 12; Luke xxiv. 47. And in obedience to these orders, the first thing that Peter preached to the Jews was repentance, Acts ii. 38. Nay, further, our Saviour tells us, that repentance is a chief part of his purchase for sinners, and one of the chiefest gifts which he bestows upon them. He not only came from heaven to preach repentance, but also to shed his blood to purchase repentance to us; and therefore he instructs his disciples, Luke xxiv. 47, "to preach repentance to the world in his name," i. e. as his purchase; and his apostles assure us, that he arose and ascended for this very end, that he might bestow the gift of repentance on his people, Acts v. 31. Now certainly, if repentance had not been so excellent a work, and such a necessary gospel-duty, Christ and his apostles had not insisted so much upon it; our Saviour had not begun his public ministry with it; nor had he told us so peremptorily, and so often, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

Tertullian says of himself, that he was born to nothing else but to repentance: a saying well worthy of our most serious observation. Likewise it was the saying of a godly minister, "That if he were to die in the pulpit, he would wish to die preaching repentance; and, if out of the pulpit, he would wish to die practising repentance." This is a duty always in season, and never more seasonable than when we go to seal a covenant with God, or go to receive the seal of God's Spirit in the sacrament. We know hard wax will not receive the impression of the seal, wherefore we must first melt or soften the wax before we apply the seal; so the heart must be first softened and melted by repentance and humiliation for sin, before any impression be made thereon by the heavenly seal of God's Spirit in the sacrament.

What Bathsheba saith, Prov. xxxi. 6, 7, is very applicable here, "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts (or bitter in soul.) Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more." So the wine in the sacrament is not for the secure and impenitent, but for those who by repentance and humiliation for sin are in poverty of spirit, bitterness of soul, and heaviness of heart for grieving and offending God. The Lord is graciously pleased to appoint this wine for them, to refresh and comfort their hearts against the sense of their poverty and misery. "Blessed are they that mourn (at this occasion) for they shall be comforted; their sorrow shall be turned into joy."

But if you come with impenitent, insensible, and hard hearts to the Lord's table, you will kindle the Lord's wrath against you for crucifying his beloved Son. As king Ahasuerus's wrath was kindled against Haman for his bloody plot against his beloved Esther and her people, even while he was at the banquet of wine, and presently gave sentence against him: so may the King of heaven's wrath be kindled against thee, while at this spiritual banquet, and pass sentence on thee presently, and say, "Let Satan enter in with the sop, and seal him under his hardness and impenitency, and carry him on to all ungodliness till he be ripe for hell."

What Christ said of the Pharisees' proselyte, Matt. xxiii. 15, "He was made two-fold more the child of hell than themselves," may well be said of impenitent receivers; by their communicating in this case, they may make themselves two-fold more the children of hell and the devil than they were before: for thereby they fall more under the power of Satan; they increase their hardness, strengthen their lusts; and to all their former sins they add the guilt of profaning God's ordinance, crucifying the Son of God afresh, and trampling his precious blood under foot.

Impenitent partaking is a crime so offensive to a holy God, that it will bring all your other sins fresh into God's remembrance, and excite him to visit you for them, according to that word, Hos. viii. 13, "They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings, and eat it; but the Lord accepteth them not:" that is sad enough, but worse follows: "Now will he remember their iniquity, and visit their sins." Now will he do it, even while they are offering their sacrifice. O impenitent sinners, God remembers your sins at all times, but especially when you come to the sacrament in a hardened case; then will he remember how you have formerly abused his mercies, wounded his Son, grieved his Spirit, misspent your time, neglected his worship, dealt hypocritically with him, been unjust to your neighbours, hated his people, &c. So that he will, at the very time you are receiving, come and visit your sins, smite you with his wrath, and give Satan power over you. O then, were it not far better for you, before you come to the Lord's table, to be remembering your sins, and humbling yourselves for them before the Lord, than to have God remembering them in wrath against you, when you are at the table?

Now for your help in this matter, set time apart before the sacrament, read over our Larger Catechism upon the ten commandments; and as you read, carefully observe and mark the duties you have omitted, and the sins you have committed against every one of the commands; and from this you may form a black catalogue of your sins, which you ought to spread, as Hezekiah did Sennacherib's letter, before the Lord, and likewise before the face of your own consciences. Had we but our eyes enlightened by God's Spirit, to take a view of ourselves and our manifold spots, in the glass of God's holy and extensive law, then would we go humbly to God, with ropes about our necks, sorrow in our hearts, tears in our eyes, and confessions in our mouths, cast ourselves down at the footstool of his mercy, and make full and particular acknowledgments of our guiltiness before him.

And to give some instances: when we view the first commandment, let us be humbled for our sins against it, and confess them: "Ah! have I not been guilty of much heart atheism? Have I not doubted of the being or providence of God? Have I not much ignorance, and many wrong thoughts and misapprehensions of God? Have I not been forgetful of God my maker and preserver? Have I not put the creature, the world, self, and other things, in his room? Have I not ascribed my mercies to others, to fortune, to my own wisdom and industry, rather than to God? Alas, for my self-love, self-seeking, unbelief, distrust, hatred of God, grieving his Spirit, dislike of his image in his ordinances, his children, &c.

2. How have I sinned against the second commandment, by devising or approving other ways of worship than God hath appointed, by not prizing pure ordinances, by making representations of God in my mind, and entertaining wrong conceptions of him?

3. Against the third commandment, by abusing God's name, his scriptures, his ordinances; by irreverent approaches to God, hypocrisy, careless hearing and communicating; by perjury, swearing rashly, breach of oaths and vows; by having a hand in the perjury or false-swearing of others; by wresting the word, misapplying providences, unthankfulness for mercies, insensibleness and incorrigibleness under judgments and afflictions.

4. Against the fourth commandment, by forgetfulness of the Sabbath before it came, not preparing for it, not labouring to prevent what might distract me in the duties of the Sabbath: by profaning the Sabbath when it came, by idleness, needless visits, unsuitable thoughts, words, and actions; by worldly cares and business on the Sabbath; by needless recreations, seeking my own pleasures, not performing, or careless performing of the duties of the Sabbath, both in public and private. Alas, I have been so far from calling the Sabbath a delight, that oftentimes my heart hath said, What a weariness is it? Ah, the strict observation of the Sabbath hath been tedious to me, I have shifted it over, and said, When shall the Sabbath be gone? &c.

5. Against the fifth commandment, by not behaving myself answerably to my natural, ecclesiastical, and political parents; not loving them, praying for them, and covering their infirmities: by not behaving suitably towards my inferiors, and not admonishing and encouraging them in well-doing, not correcting children, or doing it unduly, provoking them to wrath: and also carrying unsuitably towards my equals, envying their gifts, prosperity, or grieving at their advancement.

6. Against the sixth commandment, by sinful anger, hatred, malice, desire of revenge, immoderate use of meat and drink; by quarrelling, fighting, striking, wounding, and doing several things that tend to take away the lives of others; sowing strife and discord among friends, &c. by not being duly concerned for the preservation of the lives of others, whether of their souls or bodies.

7. Against the seventh commandment, by unchaste thoughts, words and actions; by unclean imaginations; obscene speeches, wanton gestures, immodest apparel; not watching over my senses, heart, words, actions; by going into bad company, occasions of uncleanness; by drunkenness, gluttony, and other temptations thereunto.

8. Against the eighth commandment, by stealing, defrauding, oppression, extortion, unfaithfulness in bargains and contracts, idleness, prodigality, inordinate prizing of worldly goods.

9. Against the ninth commandment, by slandering, backbiting, reviling, lying in jest or earnest, concealing the truth I should have spoken, speaking the truth unseasonably, and to a wrong end, suborning false witnesses, pleading for an evil cause, rash censuring, aggravating smaller faults, countenancing evil reports, extenuating gross sins.

10. Against the tenth commandment, by discontent with my own condition, envying and grieving at my neighbour's good and welfare, impatience under affliction. Alas, for my innumerable breaches of God's holy commandments!

In the next place, take a view of the particular aggravations of your sins, and be deeply humbled for them, and lay them out before God in their blackest and bloodiest colours: "Ah, I have sinned against more light and knowledge than others, against many checks of conscience, warnings, admonitions and reproofs. I have sinned against more mercies and experiences of God's kindness than others. I have had many gracious offers of peace and pardon; nay, God has given me sweet intimations of his love and good-will to my soul; he hath sometimes smiled on me in duty; given me enlargements, breakings and meltings of heart in prayer, hearing and communicating; but I have been most unthankful to him: alas for my ingratitude for mercies! I have sinned against more resolutions, vows, covenants, and engagements, to the contrary, than others have done. Ah, I have sinned with deliberation, and fallen into the same sins over again. I have sinned against my confessions, my lamentations, and prayers. I have sinned against God's rods and chastisements upon myself, and against terrifying instances of God's judgments upon others. I have sinned against the patience and long-suffering of God, that hath waited upon me for many years. Alas, I have sinned against reason, conscience, interest, and a thousand other obligations. I have dishonoured God, hardened the wicked, and opened their mouths against religion. I have gratified Satan, and brought up an ill report on the ways of God by my sins, more than many others.

Moreover, how grievously have I sinned against the gospel, by slighting, not sufficiently esteeming, admiring, and being thankful for, the infinite love of God displayed in man's redemption. By not loving and rejoicing in Jesus Christ and him crucified: by resting on my duties, and not improving Christ, and relying on him in all his offices, not accounting all things loss and dung for him: by not dying daily to sin, nor sorrowing for it; but often making light of that which nothing but the blood of Christ could expiate. Ah, I have not sought the things of Christ as my own, I have not preferred Jerusalem to my chief joy. My heart hath not (like Eli's) trembled for the ark of God, nor hath my soul (like Lot's) been vexed from day to day with the unlawful deeds of those among whom I live. I have not mourned for the afflictions of God's people, for the signs of God's anger, or for the sins of the times. Alas for the infirmities, imperfections, and iniquities of my holy things! Oh, the heart-hardness, formality, earthly-mindedness, deadness, indisposition, wanderings, weariness, unpreparedness, and want of relish that have attended my attendance on holy ordinances, and particularly this of the Lord's supper! I have rested in the mere outside of duties. I have had little appetite after this refreshing ordinance of the Lord's supper. I have not approached to it with such solemn preparation, examination, humiliation, renewing of covenant, as I ought to have done. I have walked unanswered after the communion, and have not minded my resolutions and engagements as becomes a worthy communicant."

Having thus accused yourselves, and confessed your sins before God, as far as you can remember; proceed also to judge and condemn yourselves from them, saying, "O what a wretched rebel against God have I been; yea, even a den of filthiness, a sty of uncleanness, and a sink of misery! I have been a heaven-daring, God-provoking, Christ-crucifying, Spirit-quenching, law-breaking, gospel-despising, and soul-murdering sinner! Lord, can thy arms of mercy open to receive such a monster of wickedness as I have been? Surely I deserve rather to be trampled under the feet of thy justice, than to be embraced in the arms of thy mercy; for, alas, I have trampled under my feet all thy glorious attributes. I have abused thy mercy and patience, and contemned thy wisdom and power. I have despised thy goodness, that hath been unto me like the dropping dew. I have incensed the infinite power of my dread Sovereign against me, who by a word can unhinge the world, and tear up its foundations as easily as he laid them. I have exasperated the justice of that mighty One who by his breath can crumble me to dust, and consume me to powder. Lord, I have sinned against the clearest light and dearest love: nay, I have repeated and reiterated my heinous sins; I have gone from committing sin to confessing sin, and from confessing sin to committing sin again. Ah! I have lived as carelessly and irreligiously, as if there had been no God to punish, nor devil to torment; no sweetness in heaven, nor bitterness in hell. O what indignities and affronts hast thou borne with from me, a poor, undeserving, ill-deserving, yea, hell-deserving wretch! never were the wages more due to the labourer, than damnation is due to me. If every sin brings down a curse, and deserves hell, how many thousand hells, how many millions of curses, do I deserve? O how miserable should I be for ever, if thou, Lord, shouldst deal with me according to my deservings! I have forfeited all interest in thy favour, and all claim to thy mercy: I deserve not to live in thy world, or to breathe in thy air; but to have my name blotted out from under heaven, yea, to have all the curses of thy book, and all the vials of thy wrath poured out on me, even a deluge of fire and brimstone rained upon me without intermission. I deserve to be hung up in chains of everlasting darkness, to be a monument of justice, and a derision of devils for evermore. I cast down my soul, Lord, at thy feet; though thou should take it up and fling it into hell, I behoved to say, 'Thou art righteous: for the hottest place in hell is too good for me.'

"Oh, shall such a wretch as I think of approaching to thy table? What may I expect there but frowns from the Master of the feast? While the Sun of righteousness ariseth with healing in his wings to those that fear thy name, thy wrath may burn against me as fire, and devour me as stubble. The day of feasting and rejoicing, sacrifice and atonement, to thy sincere servants, may be a day of wrath and trouble, darkness and gloominess unto me. While they are saying, 'Come let us go into the house of the Lord, our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Zion, within thy courts, O God:' I may justly be saying, 'The great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand? And when thy children, Lord, shall go with confidence and present themselves before thee, arrayed in the righteousness of thy Son, lifting up their heads with joy, knowing the time of their redemption draws nigh: I may be hiding myself in the dens and rocks of the mountains, saying, 'Fall on me, and hide me from the face of him that sits on the throne.' I may see them taken in and set down at the table above with the King, and myself eternally thrust out: and, while they are feasting and rejoicing at thy table, I may justly be lying under the wrath of the Lamb.

"O Lord, I have made light of the gospel feast, and preferred the things of the world before it; so that thou mayest justly say to me, that I shall never taste of thy supper; or if I go to it, that it shall not be for the better but for the worse; I shall meet with a frown instead of a smile, a curse instead of a welcome, a breach instead of a blessing. Lord, thou mayest instead of bread give me a stone, and for the cup of the New Testament give me a cup of wrath and trembling. Thou mayest justly turn my hard heart into a stone, instead of turning my stony heart into a heart of flesh."

When thou hast in this manner aggravated thy crimes, and condemned thyself, yet do not despair; but as the poor condemned criminal may cry for mercy, so let a poor, humbled, self-condemned sinner cry to a merciful God for pity. Say, "Lord, I am ashamed and confounded at my former madness and folly: I have nothing to plead for myself, except, with the poor publican standing afar off, to smite upon my breast, and lift up mine eyes to heaven, and say, 'God, be merciful to me a sinner.' All my refuge, all my hope is in the free mercy of God through Jesus Christ. Lord, make me a monument of free grace to all the ages of eternity. But alas! I am ashamed to speak of mercy and grace, who have already abused so much thereof, yea, trampled on the blood that should save me. But, Lord, what can I do, or whither shall I go? Should I despair with Cain, or make away myself with Judas? O no: this, Lord, were to affront thy mercy yet more, and utterly to reject the gospel-remedy which thou valuest so highly. This thing I will not do; but seeing I have heard so glorious a report of the mercy of the King of Israel, I will even venture to his throne of grace, where free mercy reigns to pardon abounding sins, and where Jesus Christ sits to save the chief of sinners. Lord Jesus, reach from heaven thy merciful hand to save me a poor sinner, who, like Peter, am ready to sink in the sea of my sins and miseries; that so the blessing of a heavy-laden sinner, that is ready to perish, may come on thy head for ever. 'Lord, save me, or else I perish;' wash away the guilt of my many heinous sins with the merit of that blood which ran down from thy wounds on the cross, that I am to see represented in the sacrament, or I am undone. Lord, I am told of the efficacy of this blood, that it hath a mighty current, and the highest mountains of guilt cannot stop its course. O! let the blessed experiment be tried on me, as it hath been on thousands before me. I am also told that thou hast sought after many sinners while running from thee; nay, followed them to the very gates of hell with a pardon in thy hand; and when Satan has been ready to tumble them in, thou hast caught them and brought them back again. And wilt thou now refuse me, who am seeking after thee? Lord, thou heardst and helped, nay, died for thine enemies before they cried to thee for help: and wilt thou now reject me, who am come to lay down my arms, and cry to thee for mercy? Hast thou not said, that he that confesseth and forsaketh his sins, shall find mercy? Thy word was never yet known to fail. Lord, be it to me according to thy word."

And having betaken thyself to Christ thy Surety's merit, humbly plead it with God for thy pardon and acceptance; say, "Lord, I have indeed broken all thy commands; but hath not my Surety fulfilled them all? I have, alas! affronted thy justice; but hath not my Surety satisfied it?

I have deserved thy wrath, but he hath endured it. The chastisement of my peace was upon him: O let the merit of his righteousness be upon me. Lord, remember not what I have done against thee: but remember what he hath done and suffered for me. Oh! when I consider thy greatness and my own unworthiness, thy purity and my uncleanness, thy glory and my vileness, I am confounded and discouraged to draw near to thy table; but when I consider thy bounty and goodness, my Saviour's merit, and thy mercy and readiness to forgive, I am encouraged to come. And O that I could come with a broken and a contrite heart, which is a pleasant sacrifice to God!"

OBJECT. But (saith some poor discouraged soul) I would willingly set about the work of humiliation, in order to prepare me for the sacrament; but O my hard heart will not break; alas! it is so hardened and bound up, that I cannot get one tear for sin.

ANS. Remember that it is Christ who hath purchased, who hath promised, and who freely bestoweth repentance on poor sinners; therefore go to him and seek it: and that it may be wrought in you, plead for the blessed Spirit, which he hath also promised, to be sent to take off the scales of blindness from your eyes which Satan hath put on, that so you may see sin in its blackness and deformity. Cry with Job, "What I know not, teach thou me. O make me to know my transgression and my sin." God hath set before you several looking-glasses to represent the evil of sin to you; O make use of them. You have the glass of God's holy nature, the glass of his holy law, the glass of the damned's torments, and the glass of Christ's sufferings; look frequently into these. View the infinite purity and spotlessness of God's nature; consider his holy law in its spiritual meaning and large extent; meditate on the eternal shrieks and howlings of damned souls: and, in a special manner, behold Christ's bloody agonies for sin. A right look of him whom ye have pierced will cause you mourn, Zech. xii. 10.

Come then, O hard-hearted sinner, and behold how thy sins pierced Christ's head with thorns, his hands and feet with nails, his side with a spear, and his heart with sorrows: behold how they pressed him down in the garden, till he sweat blood: behold how they bound a heavy cross on his back, till he fainted with the load: behold how they nailed him to the cursed tree, and made God frown upon him, so that he was forced to cry out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" O canst thou look on Golgotha or Gethsemane with dry eyes, or an unconcerned heart? Canst thou see Christ's eyes weep, and his heart melted like wax within him, and yet thy heart continue hard and thine eyes dry? Come, hearken to his dying groans, and look to his bleeding wounds: think you hear him saying to you, "Behold what your sins have done! Is there any sorrow like my sorrow?" O wilt thou not say to my hard heart, "What is this that thou hast done? Is not this the Son of God and the King of glory, that thou hast murdered by thy sins; and wilt thou not be grieved for them? Shall the hard rocks rend, the dead earth shake, the temple's veil rend, the sun veil its bright face, the heavens put on a mourning habit, and the whole creation look sad, when Christ is suffering for thy sins, and thou the guilty criminal, that shouldst have eternally howled in hell's flames, stand only unconcerned?" Be astonished, O heavens, at this! and let thy hard heart blush and be ashamed for it. Ah! shall the history of Joseph in the pit move your heart more than that of Christ upon the cross? Shall the news of the tragical death or sufferings of one of your friends or countrymen among the Turks, move your heart sooner than the death and sufferings of the innocent Son of God? O then, go to God and complain of thy hard heart; take it and lay it before God's promise, Ezek. xxxvi. 26, and plead that he would take it away, according to his word, "Lord, thou enredst all manner of plagues and diseases which were brought to thee while thou wast on earth: and hast not thou the same bowels of mercy now in heaven? Surely thy goodness is still the same, thy hands are not shortened that they cannot save: nay, there are holes now in thy hands to let blessings drop through them the more freely on us. Thou art my only Physician, and to thee I will look for the cure: Lord, nothing will do it but the plaster of thy blood."

Mourning is absolutely necessary for thee, O communicant, if thou wouldst have the wine of consolation in the sacrament. When did Jacob find God in Bethel, but when he wept and made supplication to God? Hos. xii. 4. When did Mary meet with Christ, but when she sought him weeping and sorrowing? John xx. 11. If you cast out a flood of tears in Christ's way, he will not be able for his compassionate heart to pass over it, but will turn in and lodge with you.

OBJECT. Alas! I cannot win to tears for sin. Are tears absolutely necessary?

ANS. They are very desirable where they are; the penitent's tears are the joy of angels and the delight of God, he keeps a bottle for them: but yet all constitutions are not alike moist; a tender heart may be matched with a dry brain that cannot easily command tears; and some perhaps may lay more stress on tears than on the frame of the heart that produces them, not minding that God looks more to the inward frame than to the outward expressions. But the truth is, if thou be one that canst get tears for other things, for worldly losses and crosses, and yet can find none for sin, it is a sign thy heart is not right. How many, alas! can weep abundantly for the loss of a child, yea, for a horse or cow, and yet have not one tear for the loss of their soul, or of Christ's favour or presence!

DIRECT. X.—FLEE TO JESUS CHRIST BY FAITH, AND EMBRACE HIM AS HE IS OFFERED TO YOU IN THE GOSPEL, BEFORE YOU COME TO HIS TABLE.

NONE have a right to Christ's table, but those who come first to him in the way of faith; for it is a feast designed only for believers.

What hath been said above concerning the multitude and heinousness of your sins, for which you ought to be humbled and mourn, may serve to show your great need of Christ to deliver you from them. Think not that your repentance, confessions, or tears for sin, can any way satisfy the justice of God for it, or merit acceptance or pardon for you: this were to put these things in Christ's room, that are only means to lead you to him; and to take up with a righteousness of your own, instead of his, that vicariously can atone the justice of God for sinners. O then, see that ye look beyond all to Christ alone for atonement, righteousness, pardon, and salvation, and count all things but dung and loss in respect of him.

Now, since the gospel offers Christ to all that hear it, and the call and command to receive and embrace Christ as a Saviour is given to all and every one, even to the vilest of sinners; you have a full warrant to lay hold on him for pardon, and flee to him for mercy: and yon heinously sin against God and your own soul, if you neglect to do it. "How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation," and slight so great a Saviour.

I shall therefore make use of some motives to press poor perishing sinners to flee from sin and wrath to Jesus Christ the only Saviour, and to receive and rest upon him for life and salvation; and then come to the sacrament to get their right and title to Christ, and all his purchase, sealed and confirmed.

I. Take a view of the misery of a natural and Christless condition: and O that God would open your eyes to let you see it, and convince you that, while thou art in this state, thou art a rebel to thy God, a prodigal to thy father, a slave to thy lusts, and an alien to the commonwealth of Israel! If thou comest not to Christ with thy burdens, the whole burden of unpardoned sin lies upon thy own back; and this is a burden that will sink thee lower than the grave; nay, it will press thee to the lowest hell, and keep thee eternally sinking there. Consider also how vile and loathesome thou and all thy actions, whether natural, civil, or religious, are in the sight of a holy God: while thou art out of Christ, thy soul is naked, and swarms with the vermin of filthy lusts; and thou hast neither a garment to cover thee, nor a fountain to wash thee: the leprosy of sin spreads over all, so that from the "crown of the head to the sole of the foot, there is nothing but bruises and putrifying sores;" so that there is no mire so unclean, no vomit so loathesome, no carrion so offensive, no pestilence so nauseous, as thou art in thy Christless state in the eyes of a holy God who cannot look upon iniquity but with abhorrence. Again, consider thou art a slave to Satan, the worst of tyrants; he rules and works in your hearts as a workman doth in his shop, Eph. ii. 2. He uses your powers, faculties, senses, and members, according to his pleasure: he says, Go, and you go: do this, and you do it. Your bondage is worse than the Israelites under Pharaoh; for they groaned under theirs, but, alas! you are insensible of yours, neither will you believe it. The devil knows that if you perceived your slavery, you would seek to make your escape from him; therefore, to make sure work, he deals with you as the Philistines did with Samson; puts out your eyes, that you may not see your chains, nor look to Christ for liberty. O that God would open them, and cause you groan under your fetters, and look to Christ for relief!

Moreover, while thou art in thy Christless state, God's wrath is still burning against thee, the flaming sword of justice is always over thy neck, Psal. vii. 11, "God is angry with the wicked every day," every day of the week, and every hour of the day: when thou goest out and comest in, risest up or liest down, God is still angry with thee; yea, "he hath bent his bow, and made ready his arrows," which are steeled with wrath, and headed with vengeance: nay, his bow is drawn, and his arrows are at the flight; and, O Christless soul, thou art the very butt thereof; and if he let them fly, they will pierce thee to the very soul, and who will heal that wound? What a dangerous state is this?

And, further, all the curses of the law are levelled against thee, and a just God is engaged by his oath to ruin thee, if thou abidest in this state, Heb. iii. 18, "To whom sware he, that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not?" Should not the thoughts of this make thee tremble? Were it but the oath of a man, or company of men, to procure thy death, as of those forty men that bound themselves with an oath, they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul, it would bereave thee of thy night's rest and quiet till they were made friends with thee: and will the oath of the great God have no effect upon thee, nor move thee to flee to Christ for protection and reconciliation? Who can help thee or deal for thee, if Christ be neglected? With what face canst thou look to him, or cry for mercy from him, when he comes to judge thee at the last day? If thou remain Christless now, thou wilt be speechless, helpless, and hopeless then. O think, what pale faces, quivering lips, fainting hearts, and trembling consciences, will be among Christless sinners then! How will their heads hang down, and knees knock together, and cry, Alas for the day! they can look no where for comfort; for the judge frowns on them, the saints deride them, their own friends upbraid them, the angels mock them, the devils scoff at them, the heavens thunder against them, the earth flames about them, and hell groans for them, and down they will go roaring and howling for ever.

O Christless soul, how canst thou think to lie in that dark dungeon for ever, where there is nothing but weeping and gnashing of teeth to be heard, and utter darkness to be seen, but never a blink of the light of God's favour to all eternity? How wilt thou live in that pit where there is no water? Not a drop of comfort or refreshment to the thirsty scorched prisoners: no, not so much as one drop to cool their tongue; the torments there are both endless and caseless. O poor Christless soul, thou art, as it were, apprehended by justice for thy debt, and brought the length of this prison door, and there are hundreds of diseases and devils waiting for a warrant to open the door to let you in; and wilt thou not employ a surety nor seek for a ransom, when justice is waiting a while to see if thou wilt do it, and Christ is earnestly offering himself to be thy cautioner, and his blood to ransom thee from this pit? And to be sure no other thing will do it. See Zech. ix. 11.

II. As it is God's command that you should receive and believe on his Son Jesus Christ; so he declares that it is a work above all others most pleasing to him, John vi. 29. It is emphatically called his commandment, 1 John iii. 23, being a command he values more than all other commands in the bible: and so, upon the other hand, there is no sin so provoking to God, as unbelief and rejecting of Christ; yea, he is more offended with it, than with the breaking of all his other commandments; see Heb. x. 28, 29. Put all your other sins in one scale, and unbelief in another, and you will find that unbelief weighs down all the rest; for it is a slighting of the whole work of redemption, which is the master-piece of all God's works, being that which his heart is most set upon, and he hath been at most pains about, 1 John iv. 9. O be persuaded then to do the work that is most acceptable to God, and obey his great command of believing upon the name of his Son. The whole creation obeys his commands; he commands the sun to run its daily course, and it obeys him; he commands the sea to ebb and flow twice a day, and it obeys to a minute? he commands the angels and all the hosts of heaven, and they punctually obey him: and will you only be disobedient to him, and that to his beloved commandment, when yet he hath done more for you than for the whole creation.

III. Consider what an unspeakable mercy and happiness it is to you, to enjoy the free offers of Jesus Christ, and to have God commanding you to receive him. How would the fallen angels value such a mercy, if they had it? They would would not be loth to leave their dungeon and accept of a Saviour, as you are: but their state is eternally hopeless and desperate, there is no remedy for their misery. O do not put yourselves in the same case with them, by slighting the offered remedy. How would damned souls prize such an offer? The least news and remotest hopes of it, would make them leap in their chains, and sing in the flames. O how glad would they be to lift up their flaming hands to seize the cords of love and mercy, if they could be let down to them in that dark dungeon! Why then should ye wilfully put yourselves into the same hopeless condition with them by your unbelief? Nay, your neglecting so many offers will sink you far deeper in that scalding lake of fire and brimstone, and increase your flames to more vehemency than those of others who have not been so privileged. O how will devils, Turks, Jews, and Pagans, upbraid you there, for your inexcusable folly in slighting your mercy, and destroying your souls? Be wise then in time, prize your privilege, and "consider the things that belong to your peace, before they be hid from your eyes."

IV. Consider what an excellent and suitable help Christ is for fallen sinners; he is well furnished and qualified for your case; he hath gold for your poverty, eye-salve for your blindness, balm for your wounds, physic for your diseases, bread for your hunger, white raiment for your nakedness, a fountain for your pollution, and a ransom for your debt and bondage. In a word, he hath a broad plaster for your broad sore, a deep fountain for your deep guilt; he is the chief of Saviours for the chief of sinners. Behold how one deep calls to another, the depths of thy misery for the depths of his mercy. Are your sins and miseries very extensive, then view the large dimensions of his mercy; who can fathom the height, the depth, the breadth, or the length of it? As for its height, it is high as heaven, and surmounts the highest mountains of guilt; it is so deep, that it can bury the greatest of your sins;

it is as broad as the east is distant from the west; and for its length, it is from everlasting to everlasting: so that it fully answers all your wants and miseries. In Christ there is all you need or can desire; there is both food and physic, clothing, strength, and cordials. O sinner, here is blood to justify thee, and water to cleanse thee; here is the water of life, O believer, that will restore thy soul again, renew thy youth as the eagles, cure all thy diseases, and heal all thy pains. In a word, you have in Christ all that can make you good, all that can make you great, and all that can make you happy.

V. Consider how near you are to Christ and mercy. The remedy is prepared, and salvation is brought to your very door: so that you need not say, "Who will ascend to heaven, and bring me down the water of life?" for it is brought to earth to thy hand. You need not say, "Who will roll me away the stone from the well-mouth?" for Christ hath done it for thee; and as it is now a fountain opened and running by your door, O why will ye be so mad as perish for thirst beside this fountain? Or starve for hunger beside a full feast? Or die of your wounds beside a physician? And all for want of heart to accept the offer? O, it would be sad to be so near Christ, and yet eternally miss him: to perish like the thief on the cross with a Saviour at your side; to be within a step of him, and yet never touch him; yea, to sink into hell betwixt the outstretched arms of his mercy, and with the sweet calls sounding in your ears. What a heart-stinging consideration will this be to you in that place of torment for ever! O then, stir up yourselves to take hold of Christ, when he is so near and in your offer: strive earnestly, while there is an ark prepared, and a window open in the side of it, and the hand of mercy put forth to pull in shelterless doves that can find no rest elsewhere: I say, strive to come near by the wings of faith, make your nest (at least) beside the hole's mouth: be not found hovering without, lest the flood wash you from the sides of the ark, and ye perish miserably. If you be so foolish, you will wish eternally that you had never heard of Christ, or that you had been born among the wild Indians or Mahometans, that never heard a sermon, or witnessed a communion.

VI. Consider how importunate Christ is in his offers, and how much he presseth you to receive him. "Wisdom crieth in the streets," Prov. i. 20. Christ makes loud and open proclamation of himself, and oft repeats his calls, Isa. li. 1, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat, yea come," &c. Behold how earnest he is with sinners, that he bids them come to him three times in one verse, "Come, come, come."

What alluring methods hath he taken to gain your hearts! How tenderly and affectionately doth he call and court backward souls! Isa. li. 4, "Hearken unto me, my people, give ear unto me, O my nation." What melting expressions are these? "My people! My nation!"

But if calls do not prevail, he comes himself to seek and to save that which was lost. He came personally in the days of his flesh, and now he comes by his Spirit in his word and ordinances. The three wise men came from the east a long journey to seek Christ; but now Christ hath come from heaven to earth, a long journey; yea, come to every one of your congregations to seek you: and are you not willing to be found of him?

Nay, he is content to follow you when you run away from him, and pursue you with his gracious offers. As the rock followed the Israelites in the wilderness with its running streams of water, so Christ, our spiritual rock, follows you now with the streams of his mercy and blood, to wash and save you. O sinner, if you will not hear the words of his mouth, hearken to the call of his wounds, which are open as so many mouths to plead with you. He hath suffered his blessed side to be opened, that ye might look into his bleeding heart, and see it panting with love, and also hear the sounding of his bowels towards you. Will not this prevail? Then behold him by faith with a heavy cross on his back, weighed down with your sins, and the curses of a broken law following you, and calling after you. Hear him knocking with his nailed hands, at the door of your hearts, saying, Open to me, poor perishing sinner; give me harbour in thy heart, behold what I have suffered from heaven, earth, and hell, for thee; look what justice hath done; look what the devil, the Romans, the Jews, and my own disciples have done. View my head, my side, my hands, and my feet, my wounded body, and my bruised soul. Oh, canst thou find in thy heart to keep Christ at the door, when thus wounded, bleeding, mangled for thee? Wilt thou let him stand all the day long, when he hath put on his dyed garments, and red apparel, to court thy backward heart, and when he is saying, O sinner, if thou wilt not believe, "reach hither thy hand, and feel the print of the nails; yea, thrust it into my pierced side, and feel my warm bleeding heart, and see if I love you not?" Wilt thou deny him access, who has done so much for thee.

Will not this prevail? Then behold him displaying his glorious beauty and excellency before thine eyes in a preached gospel, to win thy heart. Will not ministers' commendations of him move thee. Then hear how he commends himself; "I am the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valley;" "I am the true vine; I am the good Shepherd,"

&c. And will you not believe his own report, who cannot lie? Surely he is in good earnest with you when he takes this course.

Will not this do? Then hearken how mournfully he complains when he wants success, and passionately regrets your folly in rejecting him. He sighs when he mentions it, Psal. lxxxi. 13, "O that my people had hearkened unto me!" He bitterly laments it, Matt. xxiii. 37, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, and ye would not!" He doubles the name to show his tender affection; as David when he regrets his son Absalom, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son!" &c. "How often would I have gathered you under my wings?" How many an affectionate sermon, call, and invitation have I given you, but all to no purpose? Shall I go through a sea of wrath and blood to save you, and will you not accept of me when I have done it? Shall I shed my blood in vain? Shall I bear the wrath of God, the scorn of men, the terror of death, and curse of the law, to no effect? Will you still prefer your sins before me, and hear Satan's knocks sooner than mine?

Hear that compassionate complaint, John v. 40, "Ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." As if he had said, "Why run you so fast from your Saviour? Why come ye not to me, who am come from heaven to seek and to save you? It is not an enemy, but a friend, you run from; the worse turn I would do you is to save your lives: ye will go, without much pressing, to the devil, to get death and eternal damnation: but you will not come to me to get life and eternal salvation. O what an inexpressible madness are you guilty of!"

Behold how he wept for self-destroying Jerusalem rejecting his offers, Luke xix. 41. When he sat down to consider their case, his bowels yearned with pity, his tongue broke forth in lamentation, and his eyes gushed out with tears; so that his weeping even interrupted his voice, and made him utter short and abrupt expressions, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day," &c., where he seems to pause at every other word, and drop first a word and then a tear. What a moving sight was this, to see the Son of God in such a pang of grief, and flood of tears, for lost sinners? Had he been inquired at, as he did Mary, John xx. 15, "Blest Lord, what seekest thou? Why weepest thou? His answer readily would have been, I seek not myself; I weep not for myself; for I shall be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, though sinners be not gathered; but I weep to see sinners so mad as to reject their Saviour and salvation rather than part with their lusts, that have damnation following them at their heels; it is my grief to see them content rather to cast themselves headlong into the devil's arms, than throw themselves into my arms of mercy, or embrace me in the arms of their faith. O! did Christ weep for you, poor sinners; and will you not weep for yourselves? Did his heart melt with pity for you; and will not yours melt with desires towards him?

Can he do more to win your hearts than this? Yea, if this do not, he is pleased to expostulate the matter with you, and lay your danger before you; "Turn ye, turn ye, (saith he) for why will ye die?" Yea, he condescends to reason the matter with you in a familiar way: "Come, says he, let us reason together," Isa. i. 18, "O my people, what have I done unto thee?" Mic. vi. 3, "What iniquity have ye found in me?" What want or unsuitableness have ye seen in me! "Have I been a barren wilderness to you? Are not my ways equal?" Thus he seeks to draw you with the cords of a man, and with the bonds of love, Hos. xi. 4. And if there arise objections in your heart against coming to Christ, and receiving him for your Saviour, see how carefully he lays out himself in his word to answer them all; for he well foresaw every one of them: produce your cause (saith the Lord) bring forth your strong reasons, I am ready to hear and answer all your scruples.

1. O! saith some poor humble soul, I have no right to come to Christ, for I am a great sinner.—O! saith Christ, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."

2. But I am the chief of sinners, my sins are red as crimson.—O saith Christ, "I can make them white as wool." Nay, it is my errand into the world, to save such as thou art, 1 Tim. i. 15.

3. But I am sick and wounded: what hath Christ to do with me?—O! saith Christ, it is my proper employment to be taken up with you; for the "whole need not a physician, but they that are sick," Mat. xi. Am not I the good Samaritan, who am come to pour oil into thy sores, "and tenderly bind up thy wounds?" Psal. cxlvii. 3.

4. But I have no ground to hope, for I am a lost wretch.—O! saith Christ, I came for this very errand, "to seek and to save that which was lost," Luke xix. 10, and many a lost sheep have I sought and found.

5. But I am past cure, for I am quite dead and rotten in the grave of sin.—O! saith Christ, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believes in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live," John xi. 25. And again he saith, Eph. v. 14, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

6. But I am a slave to sin and Satan, and a prisoner to justice.—O! saith Christ, I came to "proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound," Isa.

lxi. 1. Yea, "I have the key of David that opens and none can shut." I have the blood of the covenant, that brings prisoners out of the pit. Turn ye to the strong hold, ye prisoners of hope, Zech. ix. 11, 12.

7. But I have heavy burdens that weigh me down.—O! saith Christ, come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

8. But my hand is withered, I cannot receive Christ or any thing from him.—Then do as the man who had the withered hand, make an attempt upon Christ's call, and he will enable thee to stretch out thy hand.

9. But I am lame, and cannot walk in Christ's ways.—O! saith Christ, I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, Ezek. xxxvi. 6, "Then shall the lame man leap as an hart," Isa. xxxv. 6.

10. But what if Christ withdraw his Spirit and grace from me again?—No, saith Christ, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee, Heb. xiii.

11. But may not I, notwithstanding, leave him, and make apostacy?—No, saith Christ, the covenant runs otherwise, Jer. iii. 19, "Thou shalt call me, My father; and shalt not turn away from me." Christ is the surety for thy perseverance.

12. But I will be overcome by strong temptations.—No, saith Christ, my grace shall be sufficient for thee.

13. But (saith some poor sensible sinner) alas! my case is not yet touched, for it is singular: my sins are heinous and peculiar, they are against light, love, conscience, vows, and a thousand obligations: there is none that knows what a sinner I have been, but God and my own conscience: will Christ ever accept of such a wretch as me? Yes, says the Bible. Art thou worse than a devilish Manasseh, or a persecuting Paul, whom Christ pitied and saved? Art thou worse than Mary Magdalene, who was a most notorious vile wretch? Yet seven devils, an army of lusts, could not keep Christ out of her heart. Nay, though thy heart were as foul and black as hell, and thy life did swarm with the most abominable sins; yet, Christ is both able and willing to save thee, if thou come to him. Are you worse than those in that black catalogue? 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10. Read and see what a black roll is there; and yet the apostle saith to the believing Corinthians, ver. 11, "Such were some of you, yet ye are washed," &c. The blood of Christ is a powerful fountain, and is able to wash away the greatest sins that ever were committed, be they ever so black or bloody: God gave full proof of this, by the first sin we read of that was cleansed by this blood after it was shed, even the murder of the Son of God, Acts ii. 36—38. This was the most prodigious wickedness that ever the sun saw; (yea, the sun fainted at the sight, as afraid to look on it) for suppose a man were able to pull heaven and earth to pieces, destroy the angels, and murder all mankind, he would not contract so monstrous a guilt as those did in crucifying the Son of God, whose person was infinitely superior to the whole creation: yet thousands, that were actors in this black tragedy, were washed by this blood, to give us a convincing experiment of its infinite value and virtue, and that no sin or guilt whatsoever was too strong for it: "The blood of Christ (saith John, 1 John i. 7,) cleanseth us from all sin."

14. But though Christ's blood be sufficient, yet I have no right to it.—Be what you will, you have a full and sufficient warrant from the gospel call to flee to it. See what Christ enjoins his apostles to do, Mark xvi. 15, "Go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," g. d. "Make offer of my blood to all without distinction, even to the worst of sinners, every creature, be they ever so wicked, yea, though they have sinned themselves unto the likeness of beasts and devils; yet, if they be creatures of Adam's race, offer my blood, my mercy, and my merits to them: invite and press them to come unto me, 'and him that cometh I will in no wise cast out.' O sinner! accept of the gospel offer; and whatever you have been, you shall find there is mercy enough in God's bowels to pity you, merit enough in Christ's blood to purchase a pardon for you, and prevalency enough in his intercession to procure and apply it to you.

15. But I have often slighted the gospel offer, and trampled on this precious blood: with what confidence can I lay claim to it?—Since Christ doth not exclude you, you ought not to exclude yourself; but should reckon that you have the greater need to hasten to this blood, the more heinous that your sins be? Yea, you have a peculiar ground to plead upon for pardon on that account. See how David pleads it, Psal. xxv. 11, 'Pardon mine iniquity,' why? 'for it is great.' This would be a strange argument with men, 'pardon my crime, for it is great;' but it is a strong argument with God. 'Lord, it is great,' and so I have the more need of pardon: 'it is great,' and so thou wilt have the greater honour in pardoning me, even as a physician hath in curing a desperate disease. The sinning against Christ's blood, or slighting it, is indeed a very heinous sin; but the more it is so, you have the more need to hasten to this blood, as the only fountain that can wash away the guilt of trampling it, and this, indeed, can do it effectually: nay, though you had actually shed this blood, as the Jews did, yet, if you be humbled for it, you are welcome to come to it for mercy. Observe that commission which Christ gave to his apostles, Luke xxiv. 46, 47, where he orders them to 'preach repentance and remission in his name to all nations, and begin (saith he) at Jerusalem.' O, might they say, why at Jerusalem? To be sure it is not our part to begin there, where they mocked and pierced, and crucified thee the Lord of glory. Nay, says he, begin there, for these miserable wretches have most need of my blood to wash them. If any thing could alienate Christ's heart from sinners, the consideration of their crucifying of him, and using him so despitefully, might have done it: yet, says he, go make offer of my blood and mercy to these my murderers; accordingly, it was done by Peter, Acts ii., and many of them got this blood applied to them.

OBJECT. But as my sins are grievous in their nature, so they are vast in their number: they are even like the sand by the sea-shore, both weighty and without number.

ANS. Remember the merits of Christ's blood is infinite, but the number of thy sins is not so; nay, though they were ten thousand times more than they are, they could not stop the current of this everflowing and overflowing fountain. Though the sands be many and large, yet the sea can overflow them all; so, though thy sins be very numerous and extensive; yet the sea of Christ's blood can cover them all, and hide them from the sight of God, so as they shall never again appear, or rise up against you in judgment.

OBJECT. But my sins are not only grievous in their nature, and vast in their number; but they are of very long continuance: I am an old rotten sinner, long have I been in the grave of sin: surely Christ will never accept of me.

ANS. Your sins may be old, yet they are not so old as Christ's mercies, which are from everlasting. It is not the first old distemper that Christ hath cured; he raised Lazarus with a word, that had been four days in the grave; he stopt a bloody issue with the hem of his garment, that bad run twelve years; he loosened a poor woman, that Satan had bound eighteen years; he cured an impotent man, that had an infirmity thirty-eight years: and, can he not as easily cure all your soul distempers? He received those that came in at the eleventh hour, yea, saved some at the last hour, particularly the thief on the cross, whom the devil thought he was sure of, having drawn him the length of the mouth of hell, just ready to cast him in; yet, even then, upon his looking to Christ, did the arms of mercy catch hold of him.

What more canst thou object, O sinner? Hath not Christ provided answers to all thou canst say, either against thyself or him? Hath he not given unanswerable demonstration of his ability, fullness, fitness, and willingness to be thy Saviour? Hath he not given full proof of his earnest desire to save thee, by the many methods he takes to prevail with sinners to accept of him? Will not all the pains he hath hitherto taken, prevail with thy obstinate heart? What more would you have Christ to do with unwilling sinners? There is yet one step further he makes, and that is a very low one: he even, as it were, turns a humble suppliant to thee, and upon his bare knees beseeches thee to be reconciled to him. Read 2 Cor. v. 20, "We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us; we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God." O wonderful condescension! Behold divine mercy kneeling down to a sinner, in the humblest posture, with wringing hands and watery cheeks, importuning the sinner to receive his Saviour, accept of pardon, save his soul, and be reconciled to God in Christ. Be astonished, O heavens! Shall the Sovereign Creator turn suppliant to the vile traitor, and follow him with his remission? or the loving father to the prodigal child, and follow him with intreaties! And, O sinner! Will thy stubborn heart be able to refuse peace, or slight the blessed peace-maker, Jesus Christ, after all pains? If all his arguments prevail nothing, yet one would think that the humble intreaties of the great God would certainly do it. How can you resist these?

OBJECT. I have no strength to come to Christ, I cannot believe of myself, I have a dead bound up heart, and I cannot help it.

ANS. 1. Canst thou say in good earnest, that thou art willing and desirous to embrace a Saviour, if thou wast able! Alas! it is here that it sticks; whatever you pretend, you are not truly willing. It is our unwillingness that ruins us: it is not so much for want of power (though indeed we want it) as want of will, that sinners want Christ: were you once willing, strength would not be wanting. O to get the will conquered, and made to surrender to Christ! Then the day were one: O for one pull more from the omnipotent grace, to make you "a willing people in the day of his power!"

2. Labour for a deep sense of thy own impotency; take your dead heart and lay it before God, and lie groaning in Christ's way, and plead for pity. It is true God is not bound, in strict justice, to hear an unbeliever's prayer; but if you be earnest with him, you may expect he will do it out of his great goodness and mercy. "He hears the ravens when they cry:" O then, cry to him to your utmost ability, in a deep sense of want; be as earnest seeking faith as your daily bread; cry as fervently for the life of your souls, as ye would do for the life of your bodies, if ready to be executed. If ye would do so, God would not deny you. More particularly, plead these things:

(1.) Take your bible, and kneel down, and cast up that gracious free promise, Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27. Read it, and plead it; put thy finger to it, and put the Maker of it to thy word; lay thy dead heart before it, and look up and cry, "Lord, make good this word to me; is it not a free promise?" There is no condition required of me for getting it fulfilled, but to inquire at thee for doing it, ver. 37. Now, Lord, I am come to inquire and request thee to do it.

(2.) Humbly plead thy own impotency, and the insufficiency of all others to help thee in this state. This was the impotent man's plea with Christ at the pool of Bethesda, John v. 6, 7. It had good success with him, and so may it have with you. Say, Lord, I have been many years with this dead plagued heart beside the open fountain of thy blood, that has saved many in my condition: I am impotent, and unable to move to it of myself, and have none to put me in: I have tried others, but I find it altogether in vain: ordinances cannot do it, sacraments cannot do it, the loudest knocks or call will not do it: thou, Lord, must put to thy helping hand, or it cannot be done, for it is a work peculiar to thy almighty arm. I have been looking to all points for help, but, Lord, there is none in heaven or earth but thee alone: every one of the creatures, means, and ordinances say, It is not in me: every one of the saints and angels say, as the king of Israel did to that poor starving woman, 2 Kings vi. 27, "If the Lord do not help thee, whence shall I help thee?" So if thou, Lord, help me not, I must perish.

(3.) In a deep sense of your own impotency, flee to God's power and plead it. Do you feel the Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir of your own corruptions swelling within you? Say with Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xx. 12, "We have no might against this great company, neither know we what to do, but our eyes are upon thee." If you could win this length, then were there good ground of hope: for when we see that we are wholly helpless and shiftless in ourselves, then God's help is nearest: "When I am weak (saith the apostle, 2 Cor. xii. 10.) then am I strong." Renounce then all help in the creature, and look to the Creator: say, Lord, though it be impossible with man, yet thou hast told me, Mark x. 17, "That with thee all things are possible:" though I may despair of all help in myself and others, yet thou hast forbid me to despair of help in thee, therefore I flee to thee alone. "Lord, give what thou commandest, and then command what thou wilt."

(4.) Plead thy extreme need of Christ, and of faith to give thee an interest in him. The world cannot tell thee, O sinner, how great thy need is: there is not a starving man that needs meat, a wounded man that needs a physician, a shipwrecked man that needs a plank, a dying man with the dive rattling in his throat that needs breath, so much as thou needest Christ. What wilt thou do on a death-bed, or at a tribunal, without an interest in him? And what will become of thee to all eternity? Go to him, then, and seek faith in Christ, as a malefactor going to die would do his life: fall down at his feet and cry, Give me faith and strength to carry me to Christ's blood, or else I die. I may live without friends, wealth, honours, and pleasures; but I cannot live without faith. I am lost, undone, a dead man, and I perish for ever without it. Lord, deny me what thou wilt, but deny me not faith. It had been better for me never to have been born, than to live without Christ and an interest in him: if I win not to the fountain of Christ's blood, I will sink eternally in that scalding lake of fire and brimstone: if I go to Christ's table without faith, I will shed his blood, and eat and drink my own damnation.

(5.) Plead with God how easy it is for him to help thee; cry with the Psalmist, Psal. lxxx. 1, "O thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth:" it will cost thee no more pains to work faith in me, and do all that I desire, than doth the sun to shine forth: yea, thou canst more easily put forth thy power and grace, than the sun can dart out its beams. It is no trouble or loss to the sun to shine forth; so neither will it be to thee to show thy power and mercy; a look or touch from thee would do it; a little thing will save a drowning man; Lord, suffer me not to perish, when it is so easy for thee to prevent it. Were it any loss or trouble for God to help us, we might well doubt of it; but since it is none, we may cry with hope, Lord, grant such an hungry beggar an alms out of the ocean of thy bounty; for thou wilt never miss it. As the sun, the more it shines, displays its glory the more; so thou wilt gain glory by putting forth thy power to help such a helpless creature as I am.

OBJECT. But I have often looked and cried to him for help, but, alas! I am such a grievous sinner, he doth not answer me, unless it be with a frown.

Ans. 1. It may be there is some idol or sin still harboured that thou art not willing to part with. This may be the Achan in the camp, that caused the Lord to hide his face: search for it, and cast out the accursed thing: "Let not thine eye pity it, neither do thou spare it." If thou canst not find it, go humbly to God and cry, "Show me, Lord, wherefore thou contendest with me."

2. It may be thou art not fervent enough; God keeps the door bolted, that you may be provoked to knock the harder, Matt. vii. 7, "Ask.

and it shall be given you: seek, and you shall find: knock, and it shall be opened to you." In which one verse, Christ gives you three calls to fervency and importunity in prayer, each stronger than another: ask, seek, knock. The woman of Canaan readily took up the meaning of Christ's refusing to answer her; she turns the more fervent and importunate, and so gets all her will.

3. Resolve, whatever discouragement you meet with, you will never quit the throne of grace, but you will always lay yourself in Christ's way, and never look to another for help; yea, that you will die waiting on him. Remember the Psalmist's experience, Psal. xl. 1, "I waited patiently for the Lord, and at length he inclined his ear, and heard my cry." There was never any yet that waited on him had cause to be ashamed. You may meet with many discouragements and temptations, and be put to very sad thoughts; but you must be resolute in looking to Christ for help, come what will: and in imitation of the four lepers at the siege of Samaria, reason with yourself, If I live at a distance from Christ, I will infallibly perish, there is no hope for me: if Christ pity me not when I am waiting on him, I shall but perish; but yet there is hope, he will have pity at length: therefore, if I perish, I will perish at Christ's footstool, looking up to him, where never one yet perished, and I hope he will not let me be the first.

4. Make use of arguments in pleading with him.

(1.) Plead the freeness of his mercy. It needs no motive, and expects no worth; but "whosoever will, let him come and take the water of life freely." It runs freely, so that mountains cannot stop the current of it, more than rocks can stop the ebbing and flowing of the sea. Indeed, Lord, if sin and unworthiness could stop mercy, I might despair, for I am as unworthy a creature as ever the sun shined upon; but, blessed be God, grace is free.

(2.) Plead Christ's commission, Isa. lxi. 1. He was sent "to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound." Lord, here is a poor prisoner, a frozen, locked, bound-up heart: here is employment for thee: loose me, knock off my fetters, and "bring my soul out of prison." Thou hast all fullness dwelling in thee, and thou hast it given thee to bestow on such miserable objects as I am; Lord, here is a naked back for thee to cover, and an empty stomach for thee to fill, a wounded soul for thee to cure. "Lord, thou camest to seek and to save that which was lost;" and wilt thou not be found of a lost sinner that is seeking thee.

(3.) Plead the communicativeness of his mercy to others. He had compassion upon men's bodies while he was on earth, even the bodies of wicked men, such as the unthankful lepers; he let none of them go without healing that came to him. Say, Lord, didst thou show so much compassion to diseased bodies, and wilt thou not have some pity on my dying soul, that is far more precious than carcasses of clay? Plead his compassion that he hath showed to the worst of sinners, such as Manasseh, Mary Magdalene, Paul, and those who murdered him. Plead his compassion towards the finally obstinate and impenitent, such as Jerusalem, over which he wept, Luke xix. Lord, did thy heart melt with pity to such, and wilt thou not pity a humbled sinner that confesseth his sin, and would willingly be reconciled to God? Is not mercy the work thou delightest in? Mic. vii. 18.

Lastly, Labour for a sense of the misery of a Christless state, of your great need of Christ, and of the happiness of being found in him. And in a sense thereof, look to Christ, and make a resolution to take hold of him. Stir up yourself to it, and rest your soul on him as you can, and God will help you, and communicate strength. He will not fail to notice and encourage an honest wish, Jer. xxx. 21, "Who is this that engageth his heart to approach to me?" He will pity and help such. Try, O poor soul, if you can get a hold of Christ, especially upon a sacrament occasion, when you are nearer him than at other times; if you cannot apply Christ to yourself, and say, He is mine; yet apply yourself to Christ, and say, I would willingly be thine, yea I am resolved to be thine. Go forth to Christ with all the faith you can win at; say with the poor man, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief." You must not sit still and do nothing, but use all means in your power; for it is in the use of those that God works faith. Hoist up the sails, and wait for the gales.

DIRECT. XI.—COME AND JOIN YOURSELVES UNTO THE LORD IN A PERPETUAL AND PERSONAL COVENANT BEFORE YOU GO TO HIS TABLE.

UNLESS you be within the covenant of grace, you have no right to the seal of the covenant; now if ye would be found within the covenant, you must by faith take hold of the covenant, and heartily go on with the gracious terms and contrivance of it. And this is what we commonly call personal covenanting with God. And the more express and distinct we are in this matter, we will have the more comfort.

As for the nature, necessity, and manner of personal covenanting, I refer the reader to my Sacramental Catechism, where this subject is largely handled.

Personal covenanting is the communicant's best token, and without it you cannot warrantably come to the Lord's table. You will mock God, and deceive your own souls, if you take the great seal of heaven and append it to a blank or a sheet of clean paper: and this you do, when you communicate without previous covenanting with God. O beware of appending heaven's seal to a blank, lest the King of heaven be wroth, and fill up the blank with a curse.

O communicants, come then, take hold of the covenant of grace, and give a hearty and confident consent to its gracious offers and terms. You are miserable while under a covenant of works; be convinced of it, and speedily betake yourselves to the new covenant, and the gracious method of salvation through Jesus Christ and his righteousness. Cordially accept of Jesus Christ in all his offices, and in him make choice of God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as your God and portion: and give up yourselves, soul and body, and all you have, to be the Lord's, to be for him and not for another. And in Christ's strength, engage to live for God, serve him, and walk with him in newness of life. Do all this in the most solemn manner, with sincerity, humility, and self-denial; and if this you be helped to do, God will accept of you at his table, and deal with you as his covenanted people.

OBJECT. But, saith one, I know it is my duty to come and transact with God in this manner, and renew covenant with him, conform to my baptismal vows; and sometimes I think I am willing to do it, but I much suspect my sincerity in this matter: and it is highly dangerous to deal falsely with God in pretending to covenant with him, when the heart is not right with God?

ANS. You have just cause to suspect your own hearts, and therefore should be at all pains to search and try yourselves; and for your help, I shall give some characters of those who aim sincerely to transact and renew covenant with God.

1. They are such who are thoroughly convinced of their misery under the first covenant, as being wholly unable to fulfil its condition, or pay its penalty: and therefore see they cannot abide in this case, without being undone to all eternity.

2. They are heartily grieved for their natural estrangement, and long living at a distance from God; and are made to say, O how long have I dwelt in Meshech, far from the fountain of my happiness!

3. They are troubled for their long slighting of Christ's gracious calls and offers of mercy in the gospel, and for the backwardness of their hearts to leave sin and Satan, and come and enter into covenant with God. O how long have I preferred Satan's drudgery and service, to God's friendship and favour; lived in league with my soul's enemy, and at war with my best friend!

4. They have something of a soul-affecting view of the new covenant, and the new way and method of salvation contained therein. They see there is no righteousness of man or angel that can justify them, none but the righteousness of Christ alone, nothing but an infinite satisfaction can do their turn; and it is their cry, None but Christ.

5. They are fully resolved on a rupture and breach with all the enemies of God, and to break all leagues and covenants with sin, Satan, and the world; and that they will never be slaves to them as formerly: they heartily agree with the Psalmist, Psal. cxix. 115, "Depart from me, ye evil-doers, for I will keep the commandments of my God."

6. They are sensible of, and numbled for, the former treachery and false dealing of their hearts with God. Are there not many who have formerly entered into covenant with God, have sworn allegiance to him as their Sovereign, and that not only at baptism, but have renewed this deed at the Lord's supper? But may not the Lord take up the same complaint against them, as against Israel? Psal. lxxviii. 36, 37, "They lied to him with their tongues; for their hearts were not right with him, neither were they steadfast in his covenant." Well, if you be deeply affected on this account, the Lord will not reject you.

7. They sincerely accept of Christ as their surety and cautioner before God; they esteem him altogether lovely, and infinitely precious. They renounce their own righteousness in justification, and their own strength in sanctification, and look to Christ for both, saying as those, Isa. xlv. 24, "In the Lord have I righteousness and strength." I have not sufficiency of myself, either to make or keep covenant with God, but my confidence is entirely in Christ, my all-sufficient surety.

8. They are content to give themselves to the Lord, and all they are and have. Faith hath two hands; by the one it receives Jesus Christ, and by the other it gives the soul to him. Now if your faith want either of these, it is lame.

9. They feel indwelling sin as a grievous clog; they desire heart-holiness more than any earthly thing, and resolve, through grace, upon more care and watchfulness against sin than formerly.

Now try your sincerity in covenanting with God by these marks, and if you can lay claim to one or more of them, then you are not hypocrites, nor of the number of those who give God the hand without the heart: who pretend to make a covenant with God, and yet keep a secret league with the devil, the world, and the flesh, who profess a great outward respect to God and his ways, and yet keep a secret antipathy to godliness, as, alas, many do, who come to the Lord's table.

And if you would manage this weighty transaction aright, you must be very deliberate in it: take many a view of the nature and frame of the covenant of grace, and consider what God offers and promises therein, and what he doth require of us; and endeavour to get your hearts wrought up to a cheerful compliance therewith. Your souls are at the stake, and a mistake here ruins you eternally; but if once it be well done, it is done for ever. This bargain is not for a short term, but for life, nay, for eternity; and therefore you should count the cost of it, and consider it duly; and be resolved, whatever trouble or persecution shall arise, or whatever temptation you may meet with to leave Christ, to say to them, like Ruth to Naomi, when she was steadfastly resolved to go with her, Ruth i. 16, "Intreat me not to leave Christ; for where he goes, I will follow him, though it were into banishment: where he lodges, I will lodge, though it were in a prison: for neither death nor life shall part Christ and me."

And again, beware of delays of making or entering into covenant with God. It is a work for eternity, and therefore requires present dispatch. The time of youth is a rare season for this work, and ought carefully to be improved, and no time to be lost. And here I shall address myself to the young.

O young people, and you that never communicated before, set about this work of personal covenanting, before you approach to the Lord's table. Do not delay or put off to another year, or till old age or sickness come on: for what do you know but God may be provoked to harden your hearts so in old age (though you should live till that time) that ye shall have no liking to religion and the ways of God? Must it not be highly displeasing to God to reserve for him the refuse and dregs of your strength and time? Will you give your Creator and Redeemer only so much of your time and strength as the devil and the world have left? O, what is this, but to offer the blind and the lame of the flock in sacrifice to God, Mal. i. 7, which is an abomination?

O young folk, can you dispose of yourselves better in the days of your youth, than give up yourselves to the Lord? When you are ready to choose callings and settlements in the world, can ye take a wiser course than first choose a settlement in Christ's family, which would make all other conditions and circumstances of life the more comfortable to you? Now the way to be made a member of this family, is by the covenanting with God: without this, you have no right to the children's bread, nor to the seals of the covenant. It is not enough that you were baptized, and are Christians by your parents' dedication, unless you be Christians by your own free choice and consent. Remember, you are now to enter into the state of adult church membership, and to be admitted to share of the children's privileges sealed to you in baptism; and therefore, now ye must act as rational men and women, and make a choice for yourselves: you ought personally and explicitly to renew your baptismal covenant, and ratify your parents' deed, now when you are of age; otherwise your baptism and parents' dedication will not profit you. I call you to engage to no more here, than what you are already obliged to by your baptism; for it is just the same covenant you are to enter into now, that ye have already consented to by your baptism: only, by your personal resignation, voluntary consent, and taking the second seal of the covenant, you are to bind yourselves the faster to it; the which if you neglect to do, your baptism will be so far from profiting you, that it will be a witness against you, and cry for vengeance on you, and you will be in no better condition than the heathens that never were baptized.

O young communicants, take heed to your first communicating; for very much depends upon it. You are now as it were to lay the foundation-stone of your salvation work, and this ought to be done with much spiritual skill and knowledge, if you would have a sure building. O then dig deep, and found your house, your salvation, your hopes of heaven, upon the rock Christ, by personal covenanting, and express closing with him upon the terms of grace: for if you do it not, but approach to the Lord's table in ignorance, unbelief, or hardness of heart, you may provoke God to smite you with judicial blindness and obduration, and give you up to such heart-hardness and formality in duty, as may cleave to you all your lives long, and so you are ruined for ever. The time of your first communicating is a most critical juncture for your souls: for according to the state, frame, and disposition of people's souls, at their first communicating, so it very often fares with them in some measure at all the rest of the communions they partake of. Many have found this, some to their sweet, others to their sad experience. Some, by their careless approach at first, and neglecting expressly to covenant with God, have drawn down the plagues of heart-hardness and formality upon themselves, and provoked God to leave them to wander in the dark all their days, without any solid assurance, or comfortable view of their interest in Christ and the covenant of grace. But others, by means of their sincere preparation and covenanting with God at this time, have got a seal of their conversion, and a view of their interest in Christ, which have proven very useful and comfortable to them all the rest of their lives, and especially in the time of distress, and when on a death-bed. Then they have remembered, how that at such a time and place they joined themselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant, and then and there God spake with them, intimated their pardon, and owned them as his covenanted children. As their souls were helped to say to the Lord, "Thou art my God:" so God said to them, "I am your salvation." And hereby many have been strengthened, when ready to faint under doubts and discouragements. Therefore, O young communicants, as ye regard the wellbeing of your precious and immortal souls for ever, look well to yourselves at this time; if matters be right with you now, they will never be altogether wrong afterwards. Labour to get some distinct uptakings of the covenant of grace, and of the nature, ends, and uses of this solemn ordinance, which is the compend and seal of it, before your first partaking; pray fervently for knowledge and spiritual illumination; apply to Jesus Christ, your great Prophet, for this, and see to improve the means and helps which he is pleased to afford you for it. Retire for meditation and reading of the bible; read and meditate much of the sufferings of Christ; read our Confession of Faith, Vincent's Catechism, Guthrie's Trial of a Saving Interest in Christ, Doolittle, and other good books on the sacrament, that ye may attain to some right impressions of the covenant, and of the Lord's supper; and particularly, of the obligations you already lie under by the first seal of baptism; and then, under a humble sense of guilt, and with a hopeful view of the gospel offer, go with all seriousness and solemnity and renew those engagements; enter into covenant with God, and next come to his table, to get the transaction sealed and ratified, by getting the other seal of heaven appended to it.

And now, young people, I put it to your choice, as Joshua did to the Israelites, Jos. xxiv. 15, "Choose you this day whom you will serve." Make choice at this time whom you will be saved by, and whom you will obey. Whom will you have for your master, whether Christ or the devil? Both are courting your hearts; which of them will ye yield to? Lay your hands on your hearts, and see whether you will grant Christ's or the devil's desire? Whether shall the devil have you, soul and body, to all eternity, or shall Christ have you? Oh, will any be so foolish as halt betwixt two opinions in this case; any so mad as stand in doubt whether to be saved or damned, whether to live with Christ or the devil for ever? Now Michael and his angels, and the dragon and his angels, are fighting about your hearts; the devil is holding, and a dying Saviour is drawing: O, will you not be on Christ's side, and wish Michael may prevail, that the red dragon's head may be broken, that the devil may get a total defeat, and that Christ may get your hearts for ever? Remember, Christ will have none but willing servants, Psal. cx. 3, none but those who freely offer themselves unto the Lord. Amaziah, the son of Zichri, is recorded with great honour, 2 Chron. xvii. 16, because "he willingly offered himself unto the Lord." O for many Amaziahs, many such free-will offerings, among young communicants. It would be a most pleasant sight to God and ministers, to saints and angels, whose eyes are upon you. The first-fruits under the law were to be offered to the Lord. "The kindness of youth is much remembered by him," Jer. ii. Young folks praying, repenting, and covenanting, are most melodious music in his ears. O, give Christ the first and best of your days, for he well deserves this. Make earnest of covenanting-work in secret, that the communion day may be a day of your espousal to the Lord Jesus, and the marriage-knot may be cast so sure at this table, that death nor hell may never be able to loose it.

Need I use any motives to press you to make this bargain, which is so advantageous for your souls? God invites you to treat with him, nay, he summons you to do it, 2 Chron. xxx. 8, "Yield yourselves to the Lord," strike hands with God, submit to his mercy, accept of the terms of grace. O, that God himself would sound an alarm in your ears, and show you the misery of an unconverted state!

1. While you are in this state, you have no interest in Christ, no share in his blood or purchase; you have neither art nor part in the God of Israel, Eph. ii. 12.

2. You are under a covenant of works, and the power, terror, threatening, and curses of a broken law. The sentence of death is pronounced against you, and you may look for the execution of it every moment.

3. While you are out of the covenant, you have no right to any mercy, and all the mercies you receive are cursed to you, and you know not how soon God may strip you of all you have.

4. Consider what a sad stroke death gives to an uncovenanted soul. It deprives him of all mercies, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, at one blow; and sets him agoing for ever. And whither can you flee in the day of visitation, when nothing but grim horror and despair stare you in the face? When the body is on the brink of the grave, and the soul is on the brink of hell, how will you have confidence to cry to an uncovenanted God, to whom you have been strangers all your days? Must it not be terrible for an uncovenanted soul to think, I am going to appear before that God I do not know, have no interest in, nor acquaintance with? Can I look for friendship from him now, since I never sought after it before? But, on the contrary, how pleasant then will it be for a covenanted soul to look death in the face, who can say, "I know whom I have believed," and I know whither I am going: "The place I know, the way I know," and the God of that land I know? Why should I be backward to go to my covenanted friend, with whom I have oft conversed, been long acquainted, and in whose presence I have placed my happiness?

5. Consider how lamentable your case will be for evermore, if you slight the present opportunity: the treaty will not always last with you, nay, the day is not far off when it shall end, and God shall treat with you no longer. The door will be eternally shut, and God will become inaccessible, inexorable, irreconcilable, for evermore: Christ, the blessed Mediator, will become thy implacable Judge; and how will you look him in the face, when on the throne, whom you so basely slighted at a communion table? What wilt thou do when thou findest thyself shut up under flaming wrath without hope? The remembrance of lost opportunities will be as oil to thy flames. "Time was, when God treated, and would have made a bargain with me, but I would not;" this will be the burden of thy eternal lamentation. O, how will you be able to bear the wrath of an uncovenanted God? Who can dwell with devouring fire? a small shower of fire and brimstone lighting on our heads now, would be very terrible. But O, it will be infinitely more so, when it shall be poured down in whole streams, and that not for a time, but for ever and ever. Will not ten thousand years' suffering do the turn? No, no; it will be eternal. Well, if you be able to dwell with everlasting burnings, you need not treat with God: but O, it is fearful to fall into the hands of the living God, one that lives, and will for ever live, to revenge himself upon you.

Hard must your hearts be, if they be not moved by these threatenings; but yet harder must they be, if they be not melted by God's condescending entreaties. Hear him, Isa. lv. 1—3, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come," &c. "Incline your ear, and come unto me; hear, and your soul shall live, and I will make an everlasting covenant with you." Is God so willing to make a covenant with his creature, a slave, a worm; and are you not willing to cast down the weapons of rebellion, and enter into a league with him? Is it not a bargain most suitable for you, and all your circumstances and necessities? Is it not most glorious and honourable for you to be betrothed to so great a prince? Hos. ii. 19. Is it not rich and advantageous for you, to be infert in so great an inheritance, and to have a sealed right to such blessed privileges as a free pardon, gracious access, fatherly love, covenant provision, covenant protection, and covenant comforts?

OBJECT. Alas, I have made a personal covenant before, but have broke it.

ANS. You have cause to be humbled for it before God; and if you be not, it is a bad sign indeed. All sensible and mourning backsliders are invited to return to him, and renew their covenant, Jer. iii., endeavour to make the bargain surer than you did before.

OBJECT. I am afraid of breaking it over again; and is it not better not to engage?

ANS. 1. It is good to be jealous of yourselves, and afraid of breaking; for the more you distrust your own strength, the stronger you are.

2. If you covenant honestly, you will get covenant-grace and strength which shall be sufficient for you; you will get the dominion of sin broke, and power to wrestle against it: and above all, you will get Christ engaged for you as your surety; and to be sure, though you be weak, he is able enough.

DIRECT. XII.—LABOUR FOR A THOROUGH CLEANSING OF BOTH HEART AND LIFE FROM SIN, AND TURN UNTO THE LORD IN THE WAYS OF NEW OBEDIENCE, BEFORE YOU COME TO THE LORD'S TABLE.

ALL that would attend a holy God, and expect communion with him in this holy ordinance, must see to have pure hearts and clean hands, Psal. xxvi. 3, 4; Jam. iv. 8. What was David's pious resolution, Psal. xxvi. 6, ought to be yours at this occasion, "I will wash my hands in innocency, and so will I compass thine altar, O Lord." He alludes to the ceremony of the priests washing at the brazen laver, before they ministered at the altar; to let us see, that though this ceremony belonged only to the priests, yet the morality belongs to all; and there is a washing which concerns all before they meddle with holy services, and especially such as the sacrament of the Lord's supper. There is a double washing required of all communicants: 1. A washing of yourselves in Christ's blood by the actings of faith. 2. A washing of yourselves by the exercise of true repentance and reformation, which is an effect of the former; by the one, the guilt of sin is taken away, and by the other, the filth of sin is removed.

Now, this cleansing must be both external and internal, more than the outside of the cup and platter must be washed, for God looks principally to the heart. Observe those parts of the sacrifice, that in a special manner behaved to be washed under the law, Lev. i. 9, "But the inwards and his legs shall he wash in water." Now, why should the inwards and legs of the sacrifice be washed above all the rest? Because the entrails contained the excrements of the beast, and the legs and the feet did tread in the mire and puddle, and so those parts were more defiled than any other part of the body. And all this to teach us, that when we draw near to God in solemn worship, we should especially wash where most filth is likely to be contracted.

1. Our inwards, our hearts and consciences, must be washed: O what filth and excrements, even a dunghill of filthy lusts, lie there! Jer. iv. 14, "O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness, how long shall vain thoughts lodge within thee?" O communicants, you must look well to the inwards at this time, and see to get all inward and secret lusts washed out by repentance, and strong resolutions in Christ's strength against them.

2. Our legs and feet must be washed also. The steps of our daily conversation are defiled by walking and treading in foul ways: O, how much pollution do even believers gather by the steps of their daily walk! And hence it is, that he who is already washed, needs daily, and upon every new occasion, to have his feet washed, John xiii. 10. We should then be in earnest, before we come to the Lord's table, to have all the defilement of our outward actions washed away by true repentance and reformation of life. Alas, that we should come to this holy table with such inwards, and with such feet, as many times we have! "Lord, purge us with hyssop, and we shall be whiter than the snow." Our own washing will not do it, if Christ put not to his hand; yet we must be sincerely using the means, and waiting for the help of his Spirit.

If you would be suitably prepared for this solemn ordinance, and have a gracious meeting with Christ at his table, you must not only search out your sins, be deeply humbled for them, make confession of them before the Lord, and by faith lay hold on Christ for pardon, as before directed; but you must also be washed and cleansed from sin, forsake sin in your life, and cast it out of your heart: for if you come to Christ's table with any of his enemies and traitors lodged in your bosoms, with any of your old lusts unmortified, and sins not put away, he will look upon you as his murderers, and smite you with his judgments; yea, you may expect that the wrath of God will come upon you whilst the bread is in your mouths, as it did upon Israel for the same reason, Psal. lxxviii. 30, 31, "They were not estranged from their lusts; but whilst the meat was yet in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel." Perhaps, O sinner, thou mayest not feel this wrath at the time, but it may be inflicted insensibly on thy soul; and every sacrament thou receivest in this condition, thou dost heap and treasure up wrath against the day of wrath; and every time thou bringest a new faggot to the heap, which will make a terrible fire at last, when it is thoroughly kindled against thy soul.

O, then, you who design to approach to the Lord's table, be persuaded to put a bill of divorce into the hands of all your lusts and idols; cast away all your former transgressions, and begin a new life: resolutely turn your backs on sin, Satan, and hell; and come take on with a new master, and engage in God's strength to be good servants and faithful soldiers of Jesus Christ for the time to come. If you do this, God promiseth you mercy and pardon, and that your former sins shall not so much as be mentioned to you, Isa. lv. 7; Ezek. xviii. 21, 22. But, if you do not, severe wrath is threatened, Psal. lxxviii. 21.

The sacrament works and produces effects, according to the state and disposition of the receivers thereof; as the water of jealousy did to the woman under suspicion of uncleanness, Num. v. 27, 28. If the woman was clean, then the water did her no hurt, nay, it did her good, made her conceive and become fruitful: but, if she was defiled and unclean, it did her great mischief; "her belly did swell, her thigh did rot, and she became a curse." It is so in receiving the sacrament: if a man be in a gracious state, and made clean by faith, repentance, and reformation, then the sacrament brings a blessing, it makes a man spiritually healthful and fruitful: but if he be defiled and impenitent, it doth him great mischief; like the water of jealousy, it poisons and rots his soul, and he proves a more rotten and wretched sinner than before. O then, let none venture to harbour sin, and deal falsely with God, when he comes to drink this water of jealousy.

The Pharisees quarrelled with Christ, Matt. xv. 2, "Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread." But on better grounds may we quarrel many communicants: Why do ye transgress the commandment of the Lord? for ye wash neither hands nor heart, when ye eat bread at the Lord's table; nay, ye presume to dip your filthy hands into the dish with a holy Jesus: do you think he will bear with such an affront from vile worms, when it is more easy for him to crush you, than for you to trample a worm under your feet? Remember, he is a "God of purer eyes than that he can behold iniquity."

Would you have God to draw near to you in this holy ordinance, then cleanse your hands and purify your hearts. "Wash ye, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before his eyes, cease to do evil, and learn to do well." And, if ye would be accepted by God, your turning from sin must have these properties:

1. It must be a cordial turning with all the heart and soul. You must not forsake sin with reluctancy, and by constraint (as Phaltiel left Michael), but willingly and readily.

2. You must turn from your sins presently, and without delay. Do not adventure to lie down and sleep with them another night, lest your waking next day be in hell, or under a sentence of final hardness or impenitency: you are not sure the day of grace will last, or the door of mercy stand open till to-morrow.

3. You must turn from sin finally and everlastingly; your quarrel with sin must be irreconcilable; for if now ye declare war against your sins, as the traitors and murderers of your Lord and Master, ye must draw the sword against them, and throw away the scabbard, and vow never to be satisfied till you revenge Christ's death upon them, and get them utterly destroyed. O, never entertain a favourable thought of, nor give a kindly look to the bloody knife that killed your dearest friend. Do not, like many, who only part with their sins about the time of a communion, or when conscience is awakened; but when that is over, they return with the dog to the vomit. Many say to their sins, as Abraham to his servants, "Stay at the foot of the mount till I go up and worship, and I will return to you again." You ought to say so, indeed, to your necessary worldly affairs at this time; but, for your sins, you should pass an act of eternal banishment upon them, and say with Ephraim, "What have I to do any more with idols?"

4. You must turn from sin universally. You must not, like Herod, part with many and reserve some, but readily give up all; with inward heart sins, as well as outward and gross sins; with sins of omission, as well as of commission, with secret sins, as well as open sins. And particularly, turn from your predominant sins, whatever they be; and from those sins that are common in the age and place wherein you live: reserve no sin, nor darling lust, but hew thy beloved Agag in pieces before the Lord; leave no grip of thy heart to the devil, lest he pull thee to hell by it.

Turn from all tongue sins, rotten discourse, and corrupt communication. You would reckon it a sad disease to have your excrements come out at your mouth; and yet, alas! this is the disease of many. O swearer, turn from your swearing: what mean ye to study the language of hell, unless you would have the world believe that you design to travel thither? For those who are to go to a strange country to live, desire to learn something of the language of the country ere they go. What profit or pleasure have you in this sin? Why will you dare heaven and defy God's law, without any temptation? What would you say, if men should baffle or abuse your name, or your father's name, as you do the Lord's name?

OBJECT. O, (say some) it is only the devil's name that we baffle.

ANS. There is nothing pleases the devil more than to have his name so frequently used; for thus you make him a god, whom you worship and pray to, by bidding the devil take this or that.

OBJECT. I do not ban or swear but when I am in passion and provoked to it.

ANS. 1. This is an aggravation of your sin, first to be in passion, and then to swear: do you think that one sin will excuse another? 2. Is it just to flee in the face of your Creator, because you are affronted by your fellow-creature? Will you stab your father because your enemy strikes you? If a man wrong you, will you put forth your anger on God, who never wronged you?

OBJECT. I swear but little oaths, by faith, conscience, &c.

ANS. 1. The devil would have you think these but little sins now: but stay till a death-bed or a judgment-seat, and you will find him alter his note. 2. Do you think it a light matter to make a common baffle of faith, the precious instrument of your justification; or of conscience, that is the deputy of the great God; or of your precious soul, that cost the blood of Christ to redeem it? 3. These are but creatures, and to swear by them is plain idolatry: for it is a giving worship and ascribing divine attributes to the creature.

O cursers and swearers, be persuaded to forsake these sins, and turn to God in Christ for mercy. What will God say to you at the great day, if you do not? You wished for damnation in your ordinary discourse; you are now holden at your word, and damned shall you be. You swore in your ordinary discourse, therefore "God will swear in his wrath, You shall not enter into his rest:" you could not speak without cursing, therefore you shall be banished out of God's presence with a curse: their tongues, that were so liberal of oaths and blasphemies, shall fry in endless and ceaseless flames, without one drop of water to cool them.

Again, O liar, forsake your lying, and come to Christ. Though this sin be common, yet consider it is most abominable in the sight of God: the devil is the patron of this sin, and the father of liars; it was with a lie he ruined all mankind. Ye shall be as gods, said he to our first parents. There is never a lie thou makest, but the devil is at thine ear, and whispers it to thee. Remember what God did to Ananias and Sapphira for lying, Acts v., he struck them dead with a lie in their mouth; and it will be a wonder of his patience, if he do not so to thee. Do you know, O liar, whose children you are? Not God's children, for they are children that will not lie; and therefore you must be Satan's children, for he is a liar from the beginning, and the father of liars. Knowest thou, O liar, whither thou art going? Even to thy father. Should not children be with their father? You cannot look upward, and say, "Our Father which art in heaven;" but thou mayest look downward and say, "Our father which art in hell;" and there it is (if thou repent not) that thy tongue shall be tormented in flames for ever. Tremble at this, O liar, and be assured it is no lie that I tell you: "Turn ye, turn ye; for why will ye die?"

Moreover, O drunkard, turn from your drunkenness, and come to Christ. While you live in this sin, you lie under many woes and curses, Isa. v. 11, 12; xxviii. 2; 1 Cor. vi. 10. God's curses are not light, therefore make not light of them: for if ye do, O drunkard, remember what is abiding you hereafter, even a cup of red vengeance, filled up with the dregs of God's wrath, which shall be poured down your throat for ever; and yet you shall eternally cry out, I thirst, I thirst; and for all the drink you have had on earth, you cannot get there a drop of cold water to cool your tongue.

In the next place, O covetous man, cheater and defrauder, turn from your covetousness, your injustice, and unrighteous gain, and come to Christ. If you do not, you shall pay dear for all your unjust gain in another world; God is the avenger of all such as you defraud, 1 Thess. iv. 6. You think yourself very cunning when you can cheat your neighbour of a little money; but know you not that the devil, in the meantime, is more cunning in cheating you of your precious soul, which is infinitely more valuable?

O Sabbath-breaker, secure and prayerless sinner, turn from your sins unto God and holiness; flee to Christ for shelter from them, and the wrath due to them; righteousness and redemption are only to be found in him. Would you not count him mad, who being condemned to a cruel death for base crimes, and might escape it if he would accept of a pardon ready provided for him, and leave off such vile acts for the future, would yet obstinately refuse to do it? And are not you yet madder that slight your Saviour, and hug your lusts, when your danger is a thousand times greater? What madness is it to dishonour God, and damn your soul, to gratify the devil, or please a vile carcase, that shortly will be so loathsome that men cannot endure it above ground?

O sinner, I beseech you in the name of the great and glorious Jehovah, and in the name of our glorious Redeemer, be reconciled to God, accept of a pardon through Christ's blood, and engage to quit these sins that would destroy you. Will you please God, and show kindness to your poor soul by doing it? However much you have abused God's patience, trampled on his love, slighted his calls, despised his threatenings, and undervalued his promises; yet he is still standing and beseeching you to be reconciled to him. O will not all this goodness melt your heart, and cause you with Ephraim, Jer. xxxi. 18, to bemoan yourself, and cry, "Turn thou me, O Lord, and I shall be turned?" Without this turning, see that you venture not to this sacred ordinance; let none with the running ulcers of sin upon them offer to sit down at this holy table, for God's pure eyes cannot look upon them. And if you would turn aright, see that ye turn believably to God in Christ: for there is no access to the King of heaven, without bringing the Prince of peace, the King's Son, in your arms; no atonement without Christ, no acceptance but in the Beloved.

Lastly, If you would turn to God aright, ye must not only turn from sin, but also turn to the ways of holiness and new obedience. It is not enough to cease to do evil, but you must also learn to do well. Some part with their sins of commission, but continue still in sins of omission; they leave their gross out-breakings, but still neglect commanded duties. But the tree is not only adjudged to the fire that bears evil fruit, but also the tree that bears no fruit: so that the neglect of duty will damn us as surely as the commission of sin. Communicants that God will smile upon, are such as not only forsake all known sin, but sincerely endeavour through grace to yield obedience to the whole revealed will of God, and in Christ's strength set about the performance of every commanded duty.

But as for those communicants that do not study new obedience, and do not make conscience of performing every known duty, God will say to such as he saith to the wicked, Psal. i. 16, 17, "What hast thou to do, that thou shouldst take my covenant (or the seal of my covenant) in thy mouth, seeing thou castest my words behind thee?" They can expect no communion or fellowship with him at his table.

But on the other hand, he makes very gracious and comfortable promises to those that study obedience, Jer. vii. 24, "Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and you shall be my people." As the prophet Isaiah speaks to the Jews of the good things of the land of Canaan, so may we say to you concerning the good things of the sacrament, Isa. i. 16, "If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land." As the land of Canaan produced very precious fruits, so doth the Lord's supper; and these far more excellent than those. It is here that the marrow and fatness of God's house is distributed to his children. Well, if you be willing and obedient, ye shall eat of the good things of the sacrament.

But see that your obedience springs from right principles, from love and gratitude to God, from a true hatred to sin, and high esteem of holiness. It was an excellent saying of one, "Were there neither heaven nor hell, yet sin should be my hell, and holiness my heaven." The spiritually enlightened soul sees an unspeakable deformity in sin, which causeth him to abhor it: he sees such a charming beauty in holiness, that he cannot but love and desire it.

DIRECT. XIII.—MEDITATE MUCH UPON THE DEATH AND SUFFERINGS OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST BEFORE YOU APPROACH TO HIS TABLE.

WOULD you have your hearts put in a suitable communion frame, then read and think much of the sufferings of Christ; and in a special manner, take a close view of them on the Saturday night before the communion. Think on them till your hearts melt, and affections warm; yea, resolve you will not give over till then; and beg God's blessing on your meditations for this end.

Think and wonder at the greatness of the humiliation of the Son of God. Admire the low stoop and condescension of the Son of God, and the King of glory, that he should be content for us to become a creature, and such a mean creature as man; that he, who was equal with God, should become less than God, John xiv. 28; yea, less than angels, Heb. ii. 7; yea, to be depressed below the ordinary condition of man, Psal. xxii. 6, "I am a worm," &c. Think how he denuded himself of all his riches and glory; that though he was the heir of all things, yet, for our sakes, he became so poor that he had not a cradle of his own to lie in when born, a house to lay his head in while he lived, nor a grave to be buried in when he died. He left his throne of state to lodge in the virgin's womb: he is born, not in his mother's house, but in a common inn, and the basest place of the inn, a stable, the inn being probably taken up by persons of richer quality: he is cradled in a manger, having no better place allowed him on earth, though the highest heavens were too mean for him.

Think how he was carried to a wilderness to fast and watch, and live forty days among the wild beasts, haunted and tempted by the devil, and sadly buffeted by his own slaves; and all this for us.

View him going about on foot, hungry, thirsty, and weary, yet always doing good: and the more good he did to souls and bodies, the more was he hunted and persecuted, reproached and blasphemed; and all this for our sakes.

View him entering into the garden of Gethsemane, beginning to fear, turn heavy, and cry out, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." What made him heavy, but the dead weight of our sins, and the curses of the law annexed to them? Behold him complaining to his poor disciples, that could make no help to him; neither they nor the angels in heaven durst touch his load, nor taste his cup: he could have helped them, but they could not help him. Yea, he got not so much as sympathy from them; they fell asleep when he was at the worst, and left him to tread out the wine-press alone, and all for our sakes.

View him in his fearful agony and bloody sweat, falling sometimes on his knees, and sometimes on his face, praying once, praying again, and praying the third time, that the cup might pass from him, till he is overwhelmed and covered with his own blood. Behold the great drops of blood bursting through and standing above his garments, and falling and lying upon the ground round about him; being at this time pressed betwixt the millstone of God's justice and our sins. Behold him sweating without heat, and bleeding without a wound; the fire and the wound were inward, even in his soul. How freely did the fountain of his precious blood open and run to wash us! Every vein and pore pours out a stream, not waiting for the tormentors, and all for our sakes.

Behold him betrayed and sold "for thirty pieces of silver," taken and bound with cords like a thief; yea, bound fast, as Judas bade, and so fast (as some say) that the blood burst out of his tender hands. Can your hearts or eyes hold to see those hands, that made heaven and earth, wrung together and bruised with hard cords: to see him bound that came to set the prisoners free, and loose us who were Satan's bond-slaves? Blessed Jesus, had not the cords of thy own love tied thee faster than the cords of thy enemies, though they had been the strongest cables or iron chains, they could not have held thee: but thou wast a willing prisoner for our sakes.

Behold him struck upon the face, spit upon, buffeted, blindfolded, mocked, and cruelly affronted by rude soldiers, a whole night: though he could have breathed them into hell, yet he meekly holds his peace, and patiently suffers all for our sakes.

Behold his lovely countenance all disfigured by their plucking the hair from his cheeks with pincers, Isa. l. 6. The sweetest face that ever the sun saw was all besmeared with "blood and spitting, yet he hid not his face from shame."

Behold him led up and down from place to place, with a ridiculous garb put upon him, and yet never resists: he is abused and disgraced; a Barabbas, a murderer, the vilest malefactor in all Jerusalem, is preferred before him; and yet he complains not. View him as he was used by his own family, his chosen disciples; one of them betrays him, another of them denies him, and all the rest forsake him, and leave him alone among his bloody enemies' hands.

Behold him that "clothes the lilies of the field," stripped naked: behold him scourged back and side; yea, scourged above measure (Pilate thinking thereby to save his life), till all the pavement of Pilate's judgment-hall about him is bedewed with his precious blood: "Yet he willingly gave his back to the smiters," that we might be freed from the everlasting lashes of God's wrath in hell.

Behold him with a platted crown of thorns upon his head, with the sharp points turned inward, and driven into his head, till they pierced his head and skull in an hundred places: and so he is content to be as the ram caught in the thickets, to be sacrificed in our room. Behold a new shower of blood running down his neck and whole body: Oh! it was my sins that platted the thorns, and they were the reeds that drove them in.

Behold him, after all these sufferings, put to bear his heavy cross, upon his sore and bleeding shoulders; with what patience and humility did he bear the law-cursed tree that was weighed down with our sins, and the law's curses fastened to it? Yea, he bears without complaint till his strength is faint; he is breathless, and ready to faint under the burden, till another must help. It was not the cross that made him faint; he had a greater burden to bear than ten thousand worlds, even the infinite wrath of God due to our sins.

Behold him stretched out naked, and laid upon the ground, that they might take the measure of his body and the holes for the nails; yea, they make them longer than they need, that they might both crucify and rack him at once. Behold the four large nails driven in through the most sinewy and sensible parts of his body, and the cross lift up with the Lord of glory nailed to it: and when it fell into the hole digged for the foot of it, how did the fall rend and tear his whole body! His own weight was his torture; and the longer he lived, his wounds grew the wider. His hands and feet are fixed, he cannot turn any way for ease: the blood streamed down for several hours, till he expired amidst these tortures.

Behold him hanging on a cross betwixt heaven and earth, as if he had been unworthy of a place in either of them: "Betwixt two thieves," as if he had been the greatest malefactor of the three. His sufferings were universal, and extended over all the parts and powers of his soul and body; no part free but his tongue, which was at liberty to pray for his enemies. He suffered in all his senses; his sight was tormented with the scornful gestures of those that passed by, "wagging their heads;" his hearing with taunts and mocks; his smell with the nauseous savour of dead men's skulls; his taste with gall and vinegar; his feeling with the nails and thorns that pierced his head, hands, and feet.

Behold him on the cross, suffering till his strength is dried up like a potsherd; his tongue cleaves to his jaws, till he cries out, I thirst. And no wonder he thirsted; for besides all the loss of his blood, he was scourged with the fire of God's wrath. Yea, "the arrows of the Almighty were within him, the poison whereof did drink up his spirit."

Behold him at the worst, crying out for relief, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" But yet no relief appears, there is none to answer: yea, his own sin, his own heaven, his own Father, his own Godhead, hid their faces and consolations from him. He is left alone in the midst of devils and enemies insulting over him; he falls a sacrifice to incensed justice, for our heinous guilt and provocations.

Behold the Son of righteousness under a fearful eclipse! For a candle to be put out is no great matter, but for the sun to be darkened is marvellous and strange.

In the next place, take a view of his willingness to suffer all these things for us. He quickens Judas to do his work, and he goes out to meet his persecutors, and boldly tells them, that he was the man they sought: he will not suffer Peter or the angels to do any thing for his rescue, because of his desire to drink the cup which the Father had given him, John xviii. 11. And God knows, a full and bitter cup it was, being all mingled with guilt, wrath, and curses, heaped up and running over; a cup, which if men or angels had tasted, they had all staggered and fallen back headlong into hell: yet, how cheerfully did he drink it for us! he was not like the legal sacrifices, dragged to the altar; no, he went willingly to it, and tied himself with the cords of love to the horns of it.

O, what affections should the consideration of these things stir up in the souls of communicants! Are ye going up to mount Calvary, to see Christ crucified; and will not ye think on his sufferings, and be affected with them before you go?

You may here, as in a looking-glass, behold what you deserved at the hands of a just God, if Christ had not interposed for you. You may see the wondrous love of Christ that passeth knowledge, which ought to kindle a flame of love in your hearts. You may see the cursed nature and demerit of sin, that exposed Christ to so much sorrow and suffering. Can you look on him whom you have thus pierced, and not mourn bitterly for sin that did it, and hate it as the most ugly thing in the world? Would not your heart rise against the man, yea, against the knife that killed your father, brother, husband, or friend; and will not your hearts rise against sin, that has killed him that is instead of all relations, and should be far dearer to us than a thousand fathers or brothers? Can we look on Christ's sufferings, and not make solemn vows against sin, and part with lying, swearing, sabbath-breaking, &c. that crucified him? When the king of Moab was pressed hard by Israel, he took his eldest son that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him up for a burnt sacrifice upon the walls, 2 Kings iii. 27, whereupon they raised the siege, and went home. Well, the great God hath taken his only Son, sacrificed him to justice, that we might thereby be persuaded to leave off fighting against heaven.

O let this strange act, which is both an act of justice and goodness, so overawe your hearts with fear, and overcome them with love, that you may leave off to offend God any more.

DIRECT. XIV.—BE FREQUENT AND FERVENT IN PRAYER, BEFORE YOU APPROACH TO THE LORD'S TABLE.

THEY that forget God in their closets and families, are not fit to come and remember him at his table; therefore let no prayerless soul venture thither. You ought to double your prayers and messages to heaven that week, and especially that night before you approach to this ordinance; if ever you pray and wrestle with God, now should be the time of it. As the heathen ship-master said to Jonah, so say I to thee, O communicant, Jonah i. 6, "Arise, O sleeper, and call upon thy God, if so be that God will think upon thee, that thou perish not." O sleep not now, when you are in hazard of eating and drinking eternal damnation; but be praying when others are sleeping. This course will surely redound to thy advantage, and be the means of procuring special blessings to thy soul. When was it that God gave commission to open Paul's eyes, and fill him with the Holy Ghost, but then, when he was earnest in prayer to God, Acts ix. 11—17, "Behold he prayeth." "The Lord hath sent me (said Ananias) that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost." So if you were earnest in prayer before the sacrament, God would notice you as he did Paul, and give charge to this ordinance to be the means of enlightening thy soul, and filling thee with the Holy Ghost. It was at the sacrament of baptism that Christ's prayers opened heaven, and brought down the Holy Ghost upon him: so at the sacrament of the Lord's supper the fervent prayers of a believing communicant will open heaven, and bring down the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit upon him. Your work at this time is very great, and much need have you to look to God in Christ, and plead with him for his special assistance: you have very great encouragement to do it; for God never calls any to do his work, but he helps them in it. It is said, 1 Chron. xv. 26, that "God helped the Levites that bare the ark." One would think, that the work of bearing the ark needed no more help from God than the general concurrence of his providence; and yet God helped them with special assistance. And if he helped the Levites to bear the ark, because it was his work, will he not help us to receive the sacrament, which he hath instituted for displaying his glory, if we sincerely seek his help? You have many errands at this time to the throne of grace, for you have many things to pray for.

1. You ought in general to pray for preparation for this solemn feast: "for the preparation of the heart in man is from the Lord," Prov. xvi. 1. Lay out the case of your heart and soul before the Lord, and say, "Lord, thou callest me to a very solemn ordinance; and who is sufficient for these things? I have neither a meet sacrifice to offer, nor a meet temple to receive thee in. I know not how to pray, or to prepare myself; how to receive Christ, or behave myself at his table. Behold the bridegroom cometh, but I am not ready; I want the wedding-garment: O, what shall I do for clothing to my naked soul? My beloved hath spoken, saying, 'rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away.' 'I have heard his voice; but I am not stirring for it: my heart saith, 'yet a little sleep, yet a little slumber.' Lord, awake my heart, stir up my graces, and prepare me for a meeting with my Saviour. Lord, thou art the giver of grace as well as of glory, thou must give the frame as well as the feast; for without thee we have nothing, we can do nothing; thou preparest a table for me in this wilderness; but shall the time of receiving come before thou comest into my soul to stir up thy graces in me? What commerce can a dead heart have with a living God? Lord, thou knowest my sins, and the unpreparedness of my heart; and if thou wilt mark iniquity, O Lord, who shall stand? My very preparations and best performances carry in them matter of indictment against my soul. But, Lord, though my sins be many and great, yet doth not the blood of Christ cry louder for pardon than my sins do for punishment? O that the cry of that blood may wholly drown the cry of my sins at this time, and answer for the defects of my preparation. O, let not my soul, whose only hope is to be saved by Christ's blood, be sent away from his table with the guilt, instead of the comfort of that blood upon me."

2. And more particularly, you ought to pray for saving knowledge: say, "Lord, I am naturally alienated and estranged from thee, through the ignorance that is in me; O give me understanding, that I may know thee, and the mystery of saving grace. Hast thou not said, that the covenant thou wilt make with thy people is this, "They shall all know thee from the least even to the greatest?" O give me right uptakings of thy covenant, which is well ordered in all things, and sure. Give grace to know the nature, necessity, use, and ends of this ordinance, which is the compend and seal of it, that so I may receive it with understanding, and rightly discern the Lord's body."

3. Pray for holy reverence and humility of spirit. "Lord, affect my heart with awful reverence of the greatness and holiness of thy majesty, to whom I am to make so near an approach, and with whom I am to renew the covenant. O, how durst I, who am sinful dust and ashes, presume to come so near thee, unless thou hadst invited and commanded me? O for deep self-abasement and humility of soul when I go to receive the unspeakable gift of God! O what a wonderful gift is Jesus Christ to such an unworthy and ill-deserving creature as I am! Lord, give me grace whereby I may serve thee acceptably, with reverence and godly fear."

4. Pray for godly sorrow and contrition for sin. "Lord, take away my heart of stone, and give me a heart of flesh, that I may loathe myself in my own sight for all iniquities and abominations. May I abhor them as the scourges, thorns, nails, and spear, that afflicted my Lord and Saviour: and may I be weary and heavy laden with the burden of my sins, so that Christ may give me rest. Lord, help me so to accuse myself, that thou mayest acquit me; so to judge and condemn myself, that thou mayest absolve me; and so to exercise a holy revenge upon myself, that thou mayest spare me. The days of mourning for my Redeemer's death are at hand; O that then I may slay my most beloved lusts, and be revenged on them for it, and for their endeavours to rob me of my spiritual birthright, my eternal blessedness! O that I may come to thy table, and receive a bleeding Saviour with a broken heart."

5. Pray for faith, both for the being and the increase of faith. "Lord, faith is thy own gift, as well as Christ; I believe, Lord, help my unbelief. O for faith's eye to look upon Christ, faith's wings to flee to Christ, faith's arms to embrace Christ, faith's mouth to feed on Christ, faith's hand to apply Christ! When I see the bread and wine on the table, O let me see a bleeding crucified Jesus. Let me not only eat the bread of the Lord, but the bread which is the Lord. May this ordinance be a lively resemblance, remembrance, and application of Christ's sufferings to me; and may I be helped so to put my finger into the print of the nails, and my hand into his side, that I may be persuaded of his suffering and dying for me; and may I "not be faithless but believing," and may say with Thomas, "my Lord and my God;" and with Paul, "He loved me, and gave himself for me;" and with the spouse, "My beloved is mine, and I am his." O that I may so touch him, that I may feel strength, peace, and virtue come from him, and be healed of all my plagues and uncleannesses! Let me so by faith feed on his blessed body, and bathe my soul in his precious blood, that I may be filled with peace and joy in believing; yea, "my soul may magnify the Lord, and my spirit rejoice in God my Saviour."

6. Pray for love to God and Christ. "Lord, circumscribe my heart to love the Lord with all my soul, with all my strength." Lord, shed abroad thy love in my cold and frozen heart, and inflame it with fervent affection and desires towards thee, that I may be a disciple whom Jesus loveth, and that leans on his breast. O that "Christ may dwell in my heart by faith, and that, being rooted and grounded in love, I may be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth and length, the depth and height: and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge." O that the remembrance of Christ's love may transport me with love, captivate my will, and engage all my affections to him. Lord, though I cannot say, I am sick of love to thee, yet I desire to be sick that I cannot love thee more. O for grace that I may be numbered among them that "love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

7. Pray for love to all the people of God. "Lord, make all those lovely in mine eyes, to whom Christ is precious: that I may know I am passed from death to life, because I love the brethren." O for a warm love to all those who are Christ's friends, on whom he hath set his heart, and to whom he hath given his Spirit; that so my heavenly Father may look down upon his children, feasting together in mutual love and delight, in remembrance of that great love which he hath already shown to us, and with joyful expectations of those great things he hath further promised to us. And, Lord, seeing that thou hast so loved me, let me be perfectly reconciled to every man, that I may "love my very enemies, and do good to them that hate me." May every spark of anger, malice, and envy, be utterly extinguished in me.

8. Pray for new obedience. "Lord, since thou givest this heavenly feast only to thy disciples, O make me one of them, and let me attain this mark of a disciple, obedience to my master. Lord, I cannot eat the passover and stay in Egypt still, in the service of Satan, and in bondage to my lusts; O bring my soul out of prison, and let me eat the passover with my loins girt, and ready to march towards the promised land. O help me to wash my hands in innocence, that so I may encompass thy altar. O make me willing and obedient, that I may eat the good of this ordinance. And may the love of Christ restrain me to a course of sincere universal obedience, that I may run in the ways of thy commandments. Seeing Christ offers himself to me, by way of surrender, to receive him as a Saviour, and submit to him as a prince. And, on that solemn feast of dedication, let me come and dedicate myself to thee, set myself apart for thee, that all my days I may live to thy praise."

9. Pray for heart-purity, fixedness and spirituality, that you may be fit to entertain converse with a holy God. "Lord, help me to lay aside and leave behind me all vain, earthly, and unseasonable thoughts and imaginations, that I may attend upon thee without distraction. O let not worldly or wandering thoughts come in, to stir up or disturb the beloved of my soul: let them not come near, or displease him: nor call me away from entertaining and enjoying of him. Lord, bid them begone. Alas! my heart is naturally in great disorder, and wholly indisposed for such solemn and spiritual work; but, O thou who callest me to it, do thou dispose my heart for it."

10. Pray for spiritual hunger and thirst. "Lord, thou art ready to give bread to the hungry, and the water of life to him that is athirst: but both the appetite and the food, the feeling of want and the relief, are from thee. O for enlarged affections and desires after this ordinance answerable to my need of it. Lord, create and stir up in me earnest longings and a spiritual appetite after this heavenly food: that so with desire I may desire to eat this passover. 'As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so let me pant after thee, O God.' Lord, enlarge my heart, and open my mouth wide, that thou mayest fill it."

11. Pray for spiritual thankfulness, and holy joy, in partaking of this feast. "O make me to relish this heavenly food, and receive it with a thankful heart. Let me not sit sad and dejected, as if I liked not the provision, or thought myself not welcome: but take me into the banqueting house, and let my soul be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, that my mouth may praise thee with joyful lips. I am to feed on angels' food, O let me be employed in angels' work,—praise. Let my soul rejoice in Jesus Christ as my portion; and triumph in his mighty acts, in his victories and purchase."

12. Pray for the assistance of God's Spirit in this work. "Lord, cast me not away from thy presence, take not thy Holy Spirit from me; for without thee I have nothing. I can do nothing. Lord, thou hast promised, and declared thyself more willing to give the Spirit to them that ask it, than parents to give bread to their children. Our love to our children is but hatred, our compassion hardness, in comparison of thine to thy children: O do not then deny me when my need is so great. Thou never saidst to any of the seed of Jacob, Seek ye my face in vain. Lord, send thy Holy Spirit to breathe on my dry bones and decayed graces, and to be the harbinger to provide entertainment for thy Son in my soul, that he may find it swept of all sin, and garnished with all the sacramental graces. O for the Spirit of God to adorn my naked soul, and put on me the wedding-garment, viz. the glorious outer garment of the righteousness of thy Son, and the beautiful inner garment of the holiness of thy Spirit, that fine linen of the saints: that all my nakedness may be covered, and my great deformities hid from thine eyes!"

13. Pray for the cure of all thy diseases, at this healing ordinance. "Lord, my plagues are great, my wounds deep and my distempers many: but I have heard of the balsam of the new covenant, my Redeemer's blood, that heals all diseases. "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there not a physician there? O, then let not my pain be perpetual, nor my wounds incurable. Lord, I come to thee to get my dead soul quickened, my strong corruptions subdued, my faint purposes strengthened, and my languishing graces revived. O let the author of spiritual life uphold and preserve life in my soul. Inflammé my coldness with the fire of thy love, soften my hardness with the dew of thy grace, enlighten my blindness with a beam of thy light, and anoint my blind eyes with thy eye-salve. Let thy compassion pity my vileness, let thy mercy pardon my sinfulness, let thy wisdom enlighten my darkness, and let thy strength support my weakness. O will the head let a member perish? Shall a branch wither for want of juice? Thou art the true vine: O communicate sap and influence to my languishing soul. Lord, art thou not as willing to bestow the fruit of thy blood on us, as to shed it for us? Art thou not a ready physician, willing to be employed by diseased souls? Dost thou not bestow thy cures without money, and without price? Lord, here is work for thee, a Job full of boils, a Lazarus over-run with sores, as poor a patient as ever came to the physician's door; yet if I could but touch the border of thy garment, or get but one word from thee, I should be made whole: O say unto me, Be it unto thee even as thou wilt."

14. Pray for a willing and cheerful heart in performing this and all other duties. "O, did my Saviour so cheerfully undertake to suffer for me, and shall I be slothful and careless in approaching to him? Did he go so willingly to the cross to die for me, and shall I be so backward to go to the communion-table to remember his death? Lord, make me run in the ways of thy commandments; and let me pray, hear, and communicate with freedom and enlargement of heart. O draw my heart to thee, and let it be carried on with more unweariedness and cheerfulness in thy service. Send forth the gales of thy Spirit, that may make my soul like the chariots of Amminadab."

15. Pray for nearness and communion with God in his ordinances, and especially at the communion-table. "Lord, what will a communion-feast avail me without communion with Christ in it. I go not there for bread and wine, but to see Jesus. What are the elements to me without Christ's presence? Nothing but this can satisfy me: Lord, what wilt thou give me, if I go from thy table Christless? Shall I go away empty from a treasure, hungry from a feast, dry from a fountain, cold from the sun, comfortless from the comforter? Lord, stand not at a distance behind the wall: show thyself through the lattice of thy ordinance, and let me see the goings of my God and my King in his sanctuary. Lord, do thou not only stand and knock, but do thou also open the door of my heart; vouchsafe to come in and abide with me, yea, sup with me, and let me sup with thee, that I may be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, and drink of the rivers of thy pleasures. And when "the King sitteth at his table, let my spikenard send forth the smell thereof." Descend into my heart by the influences of thy grace, and let me ascend to thee by the breathings of faith, love, and desire. Lord, make this feast a type and earnest of that eternal banquet above; and let me enjoy thy lightsome reviving company in the state of my pilgrimage. O let Christ appear and be known of me in the breaking of bread: O let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth, for his love is better than wine."

Cry importunately to God at this time; say "I will not let thee go till thou bless me: if thy presence go not with me, carry me not up hence. Wilt thou not relieve an importunate beggar, and hear the cry of a needy suppliant? Lord, open rivers in the wilderness, and streams in the desert. Let Jordan, at this season, overflow all its banks, and let all the dry roots of thy people be watered. And O let me come from thy table with my pardon sealed, my corruptions subdued, my graces quickened, my faith strengthened, my resolutions confirmed, my heart enlarged, and my soul refreshed and encouraged to run the ways of thy commandments, and so inseparably united unto thee, that no temptation may be able to dissolve the union." O for the Spirit of grace and supplication at such a time! for it is the praying and wrestling soul that will be the joyful and praising communicant.

DIRECT. XV.—AFTER YOU HAVE DONE YOUR UTMOST FOR PREPARING YOURSELVES FOR THE LORD'S TABLE, SEE THAT YE LAY NO STRESS THEREUPON, BUT WHOLLY DISTRUST YOUR OWN PREPARATIONS.

O COMMUNICANTS, when you have made the greatest preparations possible, by self-examination, repentance, prayer, &c. say, after all, "We are but unprofitable servants." The greatest stress and difficulty of the Christian life lieth in this, to be diligent in duty, and yet wholly denied to our duties. Learn then this great point in Christianity, to distrust all your preparations, and cast yourselves wholly on Christ for assistance, as if you had done nothing at all; saying, it is only "in the Lord that I have righteousness and strength." You ought to do as king Asa did, who, though he had raised a prodigious army of five hundred thousand, all mighty men of valour, to fight against the Ethiopians, yet he cried to the Lord, and trusted in him for help, as if he had been left alone without one man to fight for him: for after all his great preparations, it is recorded of him, 2 Chron. xiv. 8, 11, "And Asa cried to the Lord his God, and said, Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power. Help us, O Lord our God; for we rest on thee, and in thy name go out against this multitude." So let every communicant say, "Lord, all my strength and preparations are nought; I have no power for celebrating this feast. Help me, O Lord my God; for I rest on thee, and in thy name I go to this great and weighty ordinance." The soul is never so well prepared, as when it is most sensible of its own weakness, and relies on the Redeemer's strength: "when I am weak (says the apostle) then am I strong." And hence it is said of the ancient worthies, Heb. xi. "Out of weakness, (i. e. felt and apprehended) they were made strong." The gaudy flower, that stands and grows on its own stalk, doth quickly wither and decay; when the plain ivy that hangs and leans on the house is fresh and green all the year. We ought then to be denied to ourselves, and write after David's copy, who looked to the Lord both for assistance and acceptance in all his duties, Psal. lxxi. 16, "I will go in the strength of the Lord, I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only."

A man may in words disclaim the opinion of merit and worth in his duties and preparations, and yet in his heart and secret practice put some trust in them; for there are practical papists as well as practical atheists. Hence God warns us against this inward trust and secret popery, Deut. ix. 4, "Say not in thine heart, This is for my righteousness." Though with our tongues we do not plead for merit, yet there may be a saying it in the heart; and God doth well understand the language of the heart. Let us therefore look well to our hearts when we have done our utmost in duty, and by way of preparation for this ordinance, that we be wholly denied to all, and cherish the thoughts of our own nothingness, according to Christ's noble rule, Luke xvii. 10, "When ye have done all, say, We are unprofitable servants." David owns he had nothing to plead when he had done all: for says he, "Of thine own, Lord, have we given thee," 1 Chron. xxix. 14. Of this denied temper was Nehemiah also: for when he had done all for God and his temple that he could, he makes free grace his only plea with God, Neh. xiii. 22, "I commanded the Levites to cleanse themselves," &c. "Remember me, O my God, concerning this also; and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy." Whatever good things he had done, yet he depends on none of them, but pleads, "Spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy." Hence also Paul wholly disclaimed his own righteousness, and that not only while he was a Pharisee, but even when he was a Christian and renewed man; "I account all things but loss for Christ." O this is a noble attainment, but not easily come at. Mr. Fox used to say, "he was more afraid of his grace, than of his sins," because he found himself in such danger by them to be puffed up, and tempted to self-confidence. Let us then be denied to our own attainments in preparation for this solemn ordinance, if we would be accepted of God: for that man comes to God most worthy, that comes most sensible of his own unworthiness. So much for the first head of the directions how to prepare for a communion Sabbath before it come. I proceed now to the second head, to give directions how to spend it when it comes.

CHAP. II.

CONTAINING DIRECTIONS FOR THE RIGHT SPENDING A COMMUNION SABBATH WHEN IT IS COME.

I. SEE that you rise sooner this morning than ordinary, seeing you have extraordinary work in hand. And while you are rising and putting on your clothes, let your minds be filled with suitable meditations and ejaculations.

Think what a privilege it is that "your eyes see such days of the Son of man, which many prophets and kings desired to see, and might not." O that I may be thankful, and may not abuse my mercy! This is a great day; O that it may be a good day to my soul, even a day in God's courts, and in God's presence, that will be better and sweeter to me than a thousand.

Again, think this may be the last communion day that ever I may see on earth: this may be the last time that I shall "drink of the fruit of the vine at a communion table." It may be the last offer that I shall get of the water of life; O that I may improve it well! Perhaps several who saw the last communion where I am going, and also drank with me of the sacramental cup, have now a cup of the red wine of God's vengeance put into their hands, and are eternally sinking or swimming in the brimless and bottomless ocean of God's wrath; God keep me from unworthy communicating this day, lest that be my lot before the next sacrament. But on the other hand, it may be there are some who sat with me at the last communion table, that are now sitting at the higher table, and are drinking it new with Christ in his Father's kingdom: what a sweet song are they presently singing! "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father, to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen." O that I may this day get a foretaste of that celestial feast and heavenly joy, and such a seal of Christ's love, as may fill my soul with hope to be a communicant at the upper table, if God shall call me hence before the next communion! "Lord, let me have one good day in all my life-time: show me a token for good before I die."

II. Retire presently, O communicant, for prayer and meditation, in order to excite and quicken grace in thy soul; and in a special manner, see to get faith enlivened, and love inflamed. And for this end, take a new view of Christ's sufferings, and his unparalleled love manifested therein: "Behold the Lamb of God that takes away the sins of the world." If you have a clear discovery of his love and sufferings at the table, be taking frequent views of him beforehand.

Consider how free and undeserved Christ's love was. Behold the Son of God entreated by no man, but hated by all men; yet in his love and pity entreats for man, yea, suffers and dies for him, even then when he was a sinner and an enemy to him. Behold him suffering for sin, that never sinned: yea, behold him made "sin for thee, who had no sin: that thou, who hadst no righteousness, might be made the righteousness of God in him." View his love with wonder, that made him take on the heavy burden of your iniquities, and bear it till he swate, bled, groaned, and cried under the weight. Behold him struggling, praying, and falling to the ground, till he is all covered with his own blood: fix the eye of faith upon him, till thine eye affect thine heart. Take a view of his tears and bloody sweat, his pierced hands and wounded feet, his scourged back and open side, his streaming heart and yearning bowels to poor sinners: this is he, O sinner! that would rather die than thou shouldst die, who chose thy life before his own, and now pleads his blood before his Father.

Behold and wonder at his love, that made him tread the wine-press alone for us, and drink the cup of the red wine of the wrath of God; a cup whereinto all our vile and deadly sins were grated, a cup that no angel durst taste; yea, the tasting of it made Christ's heart to melt like wax in the midst of his bowels, Psal. xxii. 14, which was a greater matter than if the whole world had melted to nothing: yet he drank it off, with the bitterest dregs of it, and left not so much as one drop of it for us. Behold him taking his most precious heart's blood, to quench hell's flames that were ready to break out on us! Was there ever love like this?

This love is unsearchably great: you may sooner find out the height of heaven, the breadth of the earth, or the depth of the sea, than measure Christ's love; for it passeth knowledge, Eph. iii. It is an unfathomable ocean, that hath neither bank nor bottom. O whither did his love carry him? Even from heaven to earth, from the throne to the manger, from the manger to the cross, from the cross to the grave; yea, from the glory of heaven to the torments of hell, and all this for poor creatures, that were despicable as worms, defiled as lepers, deformed as monsters, black as Ethiopians, yea, as black and ugly as hell could make us. Worse are we than devils, if we are not affected with this love, that made the glorious Son of God leave the heaven of his Father's presence, and wade through hell for dregs of the creation. Did Christ see any thing in us to make him love us? No, he saw much to loathe us, but nothing to love us: yet the time when we were most loathesome was Christ's time of love, Ezek. xvi. We were lying polluted in our blood, and all spread over with running ulcers and putrifying sores, when Christ loved us. Our souls were as unlovely as Lazarus's body, whose sores the dogs licked; or Job's body, when he was full of boils, and sat in the ashes, and scraped himself with a potsherd: yet all this could not cool his affection to us. The instances of Christ's love are inexpressible, both in their nature and number. Wonder at his condescendence, in becoming not only a creature, but such a mean creature as man, for us; yea, not only a man, but in taking on him the form of a servant for us, and being willing not only to lie in a manger, but in a cold grave for us. Wonder that the glorious Redeemer of Israel should be content to be born as a beggar, live as a servant, and die as a slave for us. Wonder that he, who is infinitely pure, should be willing, not only to be numbered among sinners, and to bear our sins, but also to be made sin, and likewise a curse for us. Was it not for you and your advantage he did all this? and will you not admire and love him? He was content to endure the poverty of the world, that you might enjoy the riches of heaven: he lived in the form of a servant, that you might have the adoption of sons: he humbled himself to live with men, that he might exalt you to live with God: he bowed his soul to death, that he might raise you to eternal life: he was shut up forty days with the devil, that you might not be shut up with him for ever: he was hungry, that you might be fed: he was numbered among transgressors, that you might have a room among the blessed. O believer, he wept, that you might rejoice: sorrow oppressed his heart, that everlasting joy might be on your head: he was scourged and wounded, that you by his stripes might be healed of sin's wounds: he was crowned with thorns, that you might be crowned with glory: he was slandered and condemned before men, that you might be justified and acquitted before God: he bore the curse, that you might inherit the blessing: he drank the bitter and poisonous cup of God's wrath, that you might drink the pure river of life: he was deserted of God, that you might not be forsaken by him eternally: he bore the burden of sin and wrath, that you might be freed from that burden: he hung upon our cross, to advance us to sit upon his throne: he cried out in sorrow upon a cross, that we might shout joyfully in singing God's praise for ever: he thirsted on the cross, that we might not thirst eternally with Dives for a drop of cold water to cool our tongue: he struggled in a bloody agony, that we might not struggle among devils in hell's furnace for ever. O what shall we say of this love! "Lord Jesus, thy pity was infinite, thy love hath overflowed all banks, and thy compassion knew no bounds: thou stoodst before the mouth of hell that I deserved, and stoppedst the flaming furnace of divine vengeance that was breaking out against me: when I was, like Isaac, bound to the altar, ready to be sacrificed to justice, thou offeredst thyself, like the ram caught in the thicket, to be sacrificed in my room: when my sins had raised a terrible tempest, which threatened to drown me eternally, thou wast content to be thrown overboard, like Jonah, to appease the storm: when the sword of justice was furbished, and ready to be sheathed into my bowels, thou interposedst betwixt me and it, and receivedst the blow into thy heart: when I was shipwrecked and perishing, thou castedst thyself in as a plank of mercy to save my life. Can I think on this, and my heart not burn? Can I speak of it, and not seek, with Joseph, a secret place to weep in?"

View the surpassing nature of Christ's love. No love like to it; yea, Christ's love to us transcends his love to all other things: he loved us more than angels, for he would not put on their nature: he loved us more than heaven, for he left that to come and save us: he loved us more than riches and honour, for he chose poverty, and became of no reputation, to redeem us: he loved us more than the comforts of life, for he parted with these, and became a man of sorrows for our sake: he loved us more than his blood, for he willingly parted with that for us: he loved us more than his soul or body, for he gave both these to be an offering for our sins: he was more concerned for us than for himself; he rejoiced more in our welfare than in his own; he wept and prayed more for us than for himself; and in the time of his greatest strait, when heaven, earth, and hell, were all at once rushing upon him, we have his prayer, John xvii. Yet it is all spent for us, except one verse or two for himself. Again, Christ loved us more than his life; and "all that a man hath will he give for his life;" yet Christ willingly parted with that for our sake: but is there nothing that is better than life? Yes; David tells us of one thing that is better, Psal. lxiii. 3, "Thy loving-kindness is better than life." The saints and martyrs that parted with all other things, would by no means part with that, they would rather part with a thousand lives than quit with that; yet Christ, who had infinitely more of it than ever any saint attained to, for our sakes parted with it, and had the light of God's countenance totally eclipsed from him on the cross, so that he cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

II. If you would have the sacramental graces quickened, particularly faith, take a view of Christ in all his sweet offices and relations: "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth," Isa. xlv. 22. O communicant, endeavour upon the morning of a communion Sabbath to give a believing look to our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in all his blessed offices and relations; and this will strengthen and quicken faith, and help thee to act it the more distinctly at a communion table.

1. Look to Christ, as a bankrupt debtor to his surety, and say, "Lord, I owe many thousand more than I can pay, but thou hast a sufficient ransom to pay all my debt: I flee to thee as my Surety: Lord, undertake for me, and satisfy thy Father's justice, that I be not seized on, and dragged to hell's prison for ever."

2. Look to him as an able Physician to cure thy wounds: say, "Lord, here lies a Job full of boils, a Lazarus full of sores at thy gate; here a paralytic hand, here a blind eye, here a hard heart, here a plague, and there a wound, that have scorned all other physicians, and despised all other remedies; let me this day get the balm of Gilead, even the sovereign plaster of thy blood, to my various maladies; one touch of the hem of thy garment, and I shall be whole."

3. Look to him as a ransom of captives, and say, "Lord, it was thy errand to proclaim liberty to the captives: I look to thee this day to knock off my fetters, loose all my bonds, and bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name."

4. Look to him as a mediator and peacemaker to remove all enmity and quarrels betwixt God and thy soul, and say, "Lord, stand betwixt me and the flaming sword, let thy atoning blood this day quench the fire of thy Father's anger, and bring the news of peace to my soul."

5. Look to him as an advocate to plead for thy guilty soul: say, "Lord, my crimes are great, and my cause is bad: but never any cause miscarried that thou took in hand: be thou mine advocate, and let every one of thy wounds this day be as so many open mouths to plead for me; let thy blood speak, that speaketh better things than the blood of Abel."

6. Look to him as thy refuge-city and hiding-place, and say, "Lord, I flee to thee for my life: for the avenger of blood, the law and justice of God, are at my heels pursuing me; and if they find me afar off from thee, I am slain without mercy: the clefts of the rock are my only hiding-place: Lord, be a safeguard to me. A heathen could say, when a bird scared by a hawk flew into his bosom: I will not give thee up to thine enemy, seeing thou earnest to me for sanctuary: and surely thou wilt not deliver my soul, when I flee to thee for shelter."

7. Look to Christ as the ark that can only save thee from being drowned by the flood of God's wrath: say, "Lord, there is no ark to save me but thou alone: I am shipwrecked in Adam, and there is no plank but Christ to bring me to shore: I clasp to thee by the hand of faith; Lord, save me else I perish."

8. Look to him as a reliever of burdened souls: say, "Lord, here is a heavy laden sinner coming to thee this day for rest: O sin is heavier than a millstone, it is weighed down with the law's curses; and, O how many of these millstones are on my back! Lord, I come this day to roll them upon thee, who art the sure foundation that God has laid in Zion, able to bear me and all I can lay upon it: angels cannot free me of my burden, for the burden of one sin has sunk many thousands of them to the bottomless pit; the saints cannot do it, they have burden enough of their own; nay, the whole creation cannot bear my burden, for it is already groaning under the weight of me and it: but, Lord, thou art the mighty one on whom sinners' help is laid, and hast promised rest to such as come to thee. Lord, let all my burdens fall off this day, that I may be at freedom to run the ways of thy commandments."

9. Look to him as a rich and bountiful helper of the needy: say, "Lord, pity a needy beggar this day, that is going to the feast-house to wait for a crumb; thou hast supplied many: and I have heard a good report of thy bounty: never came there a poorer wretch to thy door than I: is there not a penny of grace left to help me, not a crumb to keep in my life? Lord, let me not go from thy treasure-house without an alms, there is bread enough in thy house and to spare, let me not go without a crumb."

10. Look to him as a prophet and teacher, that can open thine eyes, and give thee gracious discoveries of his truths and ways: say, "Lord, I have heard much of thee by the hearing of the ear, but little have mine eyes seen of thee: I have been long in Christ's school, but little proficiency have I made: Lord, come this day and teach me to profit; let my eyes be opened, that in this ordinance I may see the heinous nature of sin, the severity of divine justice, the greatness of divine love, the beauty of Christ, the preciousness of souls, the excellency of the remedy provided for sinners," &c.

11. Look to him as thy head and husband, with whom you are this day to seal a marriage-covenant: say, "Lord, though I be a most deformed, black, and unworthy bride, and have nothing but poverty, debt, and danger to recommend me to thee; yet since thou, who art the chief among ten thousands, art content to match with me, O give me a heart to consent willingly to the bargain, and say, My beloved is mine, and I am his. Lord, help me cheerfully to say Amen to the covenant, and all the articles of it, that I was reviewing and renewing yesternight: O let the marriage knot this day be east, that sin or Satan, death or hell, may never be able to loose again: let him this day kiss me with the kisses of his mouth: O for sweet communion and fellowship with him at his own table: Lord, show me a token for good, set me a seal upon thine arm; manifest thyself to me as thou dost not to the world."

III. Labour, O communicant, to get thy soul put in a right and suitable frame for approaching God's holy table, and entertaining thy Saviour there: now the cry is making, "the bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet him;" prepare the palace of your hearts for him; cleanse, sweep, and wash them; get them adorned and perfumed with the graces of the Spirit. Is Christ gone to prepare a place for you, and will you not prepare a place for him? Set up a throne for Christ, go forth to meet him with acclamations and praise, receive him gladly, set the crown on his head, and swear allegiance to him, and say, as the men of Israel said to Gideon, Judg. vii. 22, "Rule thou over us, for thou hast delivered us out of the hand of Midian." O but Christ hath delivered us out of the hand of Satan, a far worse oppressor than Midian. Let us welcome him, and compass him about with songs of deliverance. O communicants, deal not with Christ, as his countrymen the Jews did, John i. 11, "He came unto his own, but his own received him not." When he came into the world, there was no room allowed for him any where but in the manger, and thither was he thrust. O deal not so with your Saviour; think not a full stall good enough for Christ, but make clean your hearts, and give him the best room, yea, the upper room there; O send the key of your hearts this morning to Christ, saying, "Lord, take thy choice where to lie:" alas, I may say with the centurion, "I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof." My soul is a ruinous, smoky, and defiled cottage, thou hast not a fit place with me to lay my head; but, O thou that didst not disdain to lie in a manger among beasts, and to be entertained in the house of Simon the leper, come into my soul, repair the house, and prepare an upper room for thyself, that I may eat the passover with thee. Lord, speak the word and thy servant's heart shall be healed, cleansed, and made holy, soft, and pliable, fit for thy use and service. Lord, none can mend my heart but thou who madest it; I put it into thy hands: Lord, make it as thou wouldst have it.

QUEST. What is that frame and disposition of soul that we should come with to the communion-table?

ANS. Take these directions concerning it.

I. Come to it with a holy awe and reverence of God. Were you going to a prince's table, you would go to it with some awe and concern; and will you have none when you go to the table of the great Jehovah, who is your judge, searches the heart, and observes all your actions? He is a God that is very jealous of his honour, and will not be mocked; you ought to come to this table with a holy dread and reverence, adoring the holiness and justice of God manifested in the sufferings of Christ. How vehemently did he hate sin, that he would not pity or spare his dear Son when he cried to him; but seeing he had undertaken to pay our debt, and drink our cup, the least farthing or drop he would not abate him? Though the sinner be spared, yet sin must be punished to the uttermost; our cautioner paid dearly for it. We ought to adore his justice, saying with the men of Bethshemesh, 1 Sam. vi. 20, "Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?" There is no standing but at Christ's back, our blessed cautioner, "in whom God is well pleased."

II. Come with holy fear and jealousy over yourselves, lest you be found unwelcome guests, and draw down the guilt of unworthy communicating upon yourselves; cry, "Lord, keep me from wounding Christ and my own soul this day; let me not betray the Son of God with a kiss;" "deliver me from blood-guiltiness, and from drinking damnation." O what if I want the wedding-garment, "when the king comes in to view the guests?"

III. Come with brokenness of heart for sin, the cause of Christ's sufferings. Look on your pride, passion, hypocrisy, covetousness, malice, lying, swearing, &c. as Christ's only tormentors: behold how they pressed him down in the garden, till he swate blood; see them binding the cross on Christ's back; see them nailing his hands, piercing his temples, and grieving his heart; see them buffeting and spitting on him; see them making him groan, weep, and roar out his complaint, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" It was on us this tragedy should have been acted, on us these vials of wrath should have been poured, "for he was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities," Isa. liii. 5. O shall we see Christ's heart-streaming blood, and our eyes not drop tears? Shall we see him stretched out and nailed for us, and our hearts not bleed? O it was my sins that made these nails, they drove them in, they thrust in the spear, yea, they killed the Lord of life; and shall I not mourn? Did you see a malefactor, that had committed twenty murders, used like Christ, your hearts would be concerned: and will you not be affected to behold the innocent Lamb of God so abused by your sins? "Look on him you have pierced, and mourn." This passover must be eaten with bitter herbs. Sow in tears, if you would reap in joy. A weeping communicant is a very pleasing sight to both God and man: a broken-hearted weeping sinner will suit well with a bruised and bleeding Saviour.

IV. Come with burning love and affection to Christ. This is a feast only for the friends and lovers of Christ, Cant. v. 1. Without love ye have nothing to do here. O believer, is thy heart cold when Christ's love is warm? Will you not recompense love with love? Can you behold Christ on a cross, dying with love in his heart, and smiles in his looks; can you see his bleeding arms open to embrace you, the spear reaching his heart, and his affections streaming out to you in blood, and that when you were enemies to him, and haters of him, and not be ravished with his love? Can you behold his wounds, or put your finger into the print of the nails, and not be sick of love, and cry out with Thomas, "My Lord, and my God?" Can you view him that is the chief among ten thousand, yea, among an hundred thousand, and among all the thousands in heaven and earth, and your hearts not love him? Turn over all things both in heaven and earth, you can find none like him, so excellent in himself, and so well adapted to your conditions and circumstances. Paul was a learned man, and knew many things; a travelled man, and had seen and heard many things: yet when he casts up his counts of all he had ever seen, heard, or known, he says, "I count all but dung and loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ," Phil. iii. 8, 9.

V. Come with much hunger and thirst to this full feast. See that your appetites be not glutted with the world, for the "full soul loathes the honey comb:" it is only the thirsty that are welcome, Rev. xxii. 17, "Christ fills the hungry with good things." When the desire opens the heart widest, then he opens his hand largest to fill it, Psal. lxxxix. 10. O then, cry, "Give me Christ, and deny me what thou wilt; a crumb of mercy from thy table, or else I am gone for ever." Endeavour to say, as Isa. xxvi, "The desire of my soul is unto thee, and to the remembrance of thy name. O that I knew where to find him? When wilt thou come unto me?" O for further tokens of his love, and clear evidences of my interest in him! O for the smiles of his face, and the voice of joy and gladness! There are many heavenly dainties here; here are all the fruits of the tree of life, the comforts of the Spirit, the influences of his grace, the bread and waters of life; therefore come with enlarged appetites. The spouse cries, Cant. ii. 4, "stay me with flagons;" as if she had said, "my thirst is so great, it is not a drop or a little cup that will quench it, I would have whole flagons." Fear not to wrong your neighbours, for there is a river to every one of you. Observe how earnest Christ was to feast with us, Luke xxii. 15, "With desire, says he, have I desired to eat this supper with you," though he had no need either of you or it: and will not you, whose needs are so great, say, "with desire have I desired to eat this supper with Christ before I die; it may be my last communion, O let me have something to carry my expence through the wilderness; let me have something to comfort and support me, when I go through the valley and shadow of death?"

VI. Come with humility and self-denial, content to be nothing, that Christ may be all; and willing to submit to any thing for a blink of his countenance. Be sensible of your ill-deservings, and acknowledge a crumb will be a great mercy. Be content, with the prodigal and woman of Canaan, to be taken into Christ's family, though it were in the meanest station and employment: let me be the meanest of Christ's servants, though I be never so ill used, or ill respected, I will be thankful, if I be within Christ's doors, have a relation to his family, and can call him Master. Again, come self-deniedly, renouncing all confidence in yourself, your preparations, humiliations, or performances: these may be good graces, and good duties; but they will be ill Christs, and ill Saviours. Freely own that it is not your own righteousness that saves you, not your own strength that quickens you; but only Christ's righteousness, and Christ's strength. Say, "Blessed Jesus, I fly to thee alone; I have no hope in myself, nor in any thing besides thee; all my confidence is in the freeness of thy love, the mercy of thy bowels, the merit of thy death, the worth of thy blood, the sufficiency of thy righteousness, and power of thy intercession."

VII. Come with charity and love to all men, even to your very enemies. Banish all malice and envy, pray for your enemies, forgive them, wish well and do good both to their souls and bodies, according to Christ's example on the cross: but especially, bring with you love and affection to God's people, delight in their fellowship above all others, for they are the excellent ones of the earth.

VIII. Come with honest designs to seal a marriage-covenant with Christ. Consent frankly to Christ to be your Prince and Saviour; do not think of halving it with Christ, but be willing to take him entirely upon his own terms. Be content not only to be saved by him, but to serve him, live for him, fight for him, and cleave to him, all the days of your life; resolving that all the pleasures of sin, temptations of Satan, and allurements of the world, nay, the hopes of enjoying ten thousand worlds, shall never prevail with you to part with Christ. Come resigning yourselves, your hearts, and all you have to Christ: say, "Lord, though I had ten thousand hearts, and every one of them ten thousand times better than they are, they should be all thine." Come with strong vows and purposes against sin, that murdered your Saviour; resolve never to harbour it, or make peace with it; but that you will fight against it to your last breath, and revenge the death of Christ on it.

IX. Come with thankfulness and praise to God for redeeming love, and providing such a Saviour for you. Let the high praises of God be in your mouths; send up whole volleys of praise to your Redeemer, for undertaking your deliverance. Invite the angels, and all the creation, to assist you in this work. Stir up your souls, and all that is within you, to bless his holy name: your souls (like Mary) "should magnify the Lord, and your spirits rejoice in God your Saviour;" your hearts should ascend, like Manoah's angel, in the smoke of thanksgiving and praise. Say, "Lord, what shall I render to thee for all that thou hast done and suffered for me? Lord, what am I, that thou shouldst part with thy glory, yea, with thy blood, and with thy life for such a wretch as me? I am ashamed that I can love and praise thee no more: O! my heart is cold, my tongue is slow: let heaven and earth, angels and men, join and extol his free grace and wondrous love: let all the world ring with his praise."

X. Come with hope and expectation, depending on God's promises and Christ's merits. You ought greedily to look to Christ, expecting something from him, as the poor cripple did from Peter and John, Acts iii. 4, 5. Peter said "Look on us: and he gave heed to them, expecting to receive something from them." We ordinarily receive little, because we expect little; "God's mercy is upon us, according as we hope in him," Psal. xxxiii. O raise your desires and expectations; for you come to a merciful and liberal God, that will not let the expectation of his poor creatures perish, Psal. ix. 18, "The needy shall not always be forgotten; the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever."

OBJECT. Alas! I am a poor, weak, heartless creature: I have little ground to hope.

ANS. You have God's call and promise to encourage you. Groan under your deadness, and use the means; aim honestly at your duty, and look to God for accomplishing his promise. Do as the Israelites did in the wilderness, Num. xxi. 16—18. God had called them to the place where he promised them water, which was very much valued in that dry desert: well, did they sit still idly, waiting till the water should spring? No, the nobles put to their staves, and digged in expectation of God's fulfilling his promise, and sung, "Spring up, O well," &c. Make an honest attempt, look up with hope, and cry for the springing of the well. Come, bring all your empty vessels to the fountain, in expectation of a fill: do as the poor widow, 2 Kings iv., "bring not a few:" for I am sure the vessels will fail before the oil fail. Plead with God for the accomplishing of his word: say, "Lord, though we cannot say, Pour water on us, for we are thirsty, yet we can plead, Pour floods on us, for we are dry ground: Lord, make us as hungry as we are empty, and thirsty as we are dry: Lord, if thou deal with us according to our sense of need, we will get little; but, Lord, we plead thou wilt deal with us according to our real need, and thy royal bounty, and then we will be right enough."

O poor soul! Art thou longing for the springing of the well, saying, "O that I knew in what part of this valley of Baca the well would spring, what ordinance, what duty, would be the mean: there I would wait and lie, there I would dig and cry: one gush of these living streams would satisfy my longing soul?" Poor soul, thou shalt not die for want; you have the word of a king for it, Isa. xli. 17, 18, "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry-land springs of water."

IV. After you have this morning meditated, dealt with your hearts, wrestled with God, read his word, and performed family worship, with faith and fervency suitable to this solemn occasion, you ought timeously to repair to the church before the solemn worship begin. And let your hearts be breathing forth many heavenly ejaculations by the way; such as that, Psal. xliii. 3, 4, "Send forth thy light and thy truth: let them lead me, and bring me to thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles. Then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy." O, it were a pleasant frame this morning, to be going with joy to draw water out of the wells of salvation! Let us be very thankful, that the waters of life flow so pleasantly and plentifully to us, betwixt the banks of gospel ordinances; bless God, that has not made the barren wilderness our dwelling: but let us think, as we go, that as God rained down manna from heaven on his people, so he rained down fire and brimstone on Sodom and Gemorrah. This serves to teach us to rejoice so in the mercies which God rains down upon us in the sacrament, as to fear his judgments in case they be abused.

Again, think, "I am now upon my way to mount Calvary: Lord, forbid that Christ's traitors be my attendants: let all my lusts and idols be forever banished from me: may they never find lodging in my soul any more: Lord, help me to go this day, with such a melted heart and weeping eyes, as the holy Virgin, Mary Magdalene, and the other tender-hearted women of Jerusalem had, when they went to mount Calvary, to behold Christ crucified. Am not I going up to see the same crucifixion represented before my eyes?"

As it was a part of your secret work this morning, to plead earnestly with God to direct his messengers to speak suitably to your case, so you ought by the way to be sending up ejaculations for this end, and frequently to be crying, "Awake, O north-wind, and come thou south, blow," &c. The minister's words will be but as wind, and a beating of the air (unless the wind of the Spirit blow), "O Spirit of God, come, influence my heart this day, I dare not go to the table without thy presence:" "Lord, stand not this day behind the wall;" for there cannot be a sadder sight in the world, than a poor hard-hearted communicant, with God's back turned on him. "If thy presence go not with me, carry me not up hence." O Lord, it is time for thee to work; I never stood more in need of thy presence than at this time: it is my errand to meet with thee at thy table: Lord, send me not away with a sore heart. A communion-day, without communion with Christ, will never satisfy my soul."

Plead with God, O young communicant, that this may be the day of your acquaintance with Christ, even the day of your espousals, and a day to be had in everlasting remembrance. And indeed, if you enter this day into the bond of the covenant, it will be a very memorable day. God will bless the memory of this day, for he will gain a son; Jesus Christ will write this day in his calendar, for he will gain a brother; the Holy Ghost will rejoice, for he will gain a temple; angels and saints will be glad, for they will gain a fellow-servant; and you, especially, may rejoice with exceeding great joy, for you will gain an eternal inheritance.

DIRECTIONS CONCERNING OUR CARRIAGE WHEN THE TIME OF RECEIVING THE SACRAMENT APPROACHES.

I. When the time is come, or near, that you are to go to this holy table; consider that this is the most solemn and august ordinance under heaven, and requires the most profound awe and reverence from you. The place is holy, the table is holy, the bread and cup are holy; and "God is terrible from his holy places." Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? Your danger is great, if you make a rash approach, and seek him not after the due order. The least wrong look or wrong touch at this time is criminal, and may cost you your eternal salvation. It may provoke the Lord to make a fearful and visible breach among you, as he did upon Uzzah and the men of Bethshemesh; for the nearer to God's altar you come, the fire of his jealousy burns the more vehemently. Labour then to go to his table with holy fear and trembling; for as communion-love is the sweetest, so communion-wrath is the sorest. Heavy judgments, both spiritual, temporal, and eternal, hang over the unworthy communicant's head. If you would prevent these, adventure to this table with holy fear and dread: for if the woman with the bloody issue feared so much to touch the "hem of Christ's garment," Mark v., how much more ought you to fear to touch the symbols of his body and blood, to put your hand into his wounds, and feel the print of the nails? If such a holy man as John the Baptist thought himself unworthy to bear Christ's shoes, how much more are vile sinners like you unworthy to touch and feed upon his broken body and shed blood? Let your souls then be humbled as the dust when you approach, in a deep sense of your great unworthiness, former guilt, and breach of former vows made at this table; for to such humble souls God has promised to look in mercy, Isa. lxvi. 2.

II. When you are going to the table, labour to stir up your souls, and all your faculties and affections; excite all your graces and desires to attend Christ. O see that your souls be lively and your hearts fixed, when you are about to draw near and seal a marriage-covenant with Christ. You have great need to look to your hearts and frames at this time. A dead heart or an ill frame now, is very unsuitable; it is like the dead fly in the box of ointment, it will be fair to spoil your communicating. For God's sake look to it.

OBJECT. I. Oh! says one, my heart is in a lifeless and stupid frame, even at a dead stand, and thinks neither of good nor ill: what shall I do with it?

ANS. 1. Dispatch presently a swift messenger to heaven, an earnest ejaculation and prayer, to call for the help of God's Spirit, as Cant. iv. 16. Entreat him to breathe upon your dry bones with a fresh gale, and take a coal from his own altar to inflame your affections.

2. Call on your hearts to awake to a lively frame. It is a mistake of Christians to think they are only to call upon God, you must also call upon yourselves, and rouse up yourselves, as Psal. lviii. 8, "Awake up my glory," &c. Stir up yourselves and all that is within you, according to Psal. ciii. 1. Speak to your hearts, and expostulate with them: say, "O my drowsy blockish heart, art thou not ashamed to think so coldly of thy bleeding Saviour?" Is his heart so warm, and thine so cold? Doth a dead head become the service of a living God?

OBJECT. II. Oh! saith another, my heart is a roving, wandering heart, I cannot get it stayed one moment upon one subject; it presently gets away, and hunts after vanities. O what shall I do with the levity and excursions of my heart?

ANS. 1. Labour now to overawe your heart with the deep apprehension of God's presence and all-seeing eye: God noticeth you now more than ever.

2. Chide and check your heart for its vain excursions: say, "Did I come here to think of any thing but of Christ and heaven? Is this a place for thinking on worldly toys? Is this the way to show forth my Saviour's death, which is my business here? What! cannot I watch with Christ one hour now? How then will I behold and contemplate him for ever?"

OBJECT. III. Though I am come this length in obedience to a dying Saviour's command, I yet fear to go forward, for I doubt my right. I cannot say I am in covenant with God, or that I have faith, and an interest in Christ, or that his body was broken for me.

ANS. O discouraged soul, though you have not the faith of assurance, yet see if you can get the faith of adherence. Though you cannot say that ever you took hold of Christ or the covenant before, yet try if you can get a hold of Christ now; you are much nearer to him now than at other times. Make an endeavour, stir up your souls, and go to Christ with all the faith you can win at, saying with that poor man, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief." If you cannot apply Christ to yourselves, will you apply yourselves to Christ. If you cannot say Christ is your Saviour and hiding-place, will you run like a malefactor to him for refuge, and try if he will now shelter you in his wounds, when they are so wide opened in the sacrament. He noticeth any poor sinner that is engaging his heart to approach unto God.

Again, though you cannot say that Christ is yours, and you are in covenant with him; yet are you not willing to be his, and give up yourself to him? The covenant indeed is mutual, Cant. ii. 16, "My beloved is mine, and I am his." But if you cannot lay claim to one part of it, try if you can lay hold of another. Is it your language, Though I cannot say he is mine, yet I am resolved to be his, and to give up myself to him? That is well said, poor soul: for you must first consent to be his, before you know that he is yours; you must be resolute in your covenanting with Christ; when you are driven from one horn of the altar, hold fast by another. Flee now to Christ, saying, "Lord, though I cannot say thou art mine; yet I can say, Lord, I am content and resolved to be thine, wholly thine, only thine, and everlastingly thine." David could not always say, God is mine; but when he cannot say that, he cries, "I am thine, Lord, save thou me," Psal. exix. 94. Here one that belongs to thee, and has surrendered himself to thee: "Lord, suffer not one of thine to perish."

OBJECT. IV. Alas! I cannot say to God, I am thine: I fear he will not accept of me, or own me for his.

ANS. Though you cannot say, I am thine by God's acceptance; yet, can you not say, "Lord, I am thine by my own resignation, I devote and give up myself wholly unto thee, I will not be the devil's, the world's, or lust's; I will not be my own, but I will be thine: I am thine, save thou me." Go to him with that plea the Campani came to the Romans with, after they had refused to help them as neighbours and allies against the Grecians, who were distressing them sore, and that because the Romans and the Grecians were in friendship together at that time, the Campani went and gave up their whole country in vassalage to the Romans, saying, "If you will not help us as our allies, help us as your vassals and subjects, as we are content to be; we are sure you will not let your tributaries perish." And indeed this argument prevailed with them, and so will it with God, if you go to him with an importunate faith, and fasten yourself upon him. Plead, "Lord, if thou wilt not love me as a friend, yet pity me as thy poor subject: I resolve to be thine, and if I perish, one must perish that desires to be thine. Lord, whether thou accept of me or not, I give up myself to thy use and service." Art thou come this length, poor soul? Fear not, thou shalt not perish, Christ is as willing to be thine as thou art to be his: come forward, and take the seal of the covenant, and make a new surrender of yourself to Christ, and it may be he will be made "known to you in the breaking of bread."

III. When this holy feast comes to be celebrated, see that your souls be rightly employed, and your graces suitably exercised: study to have your meditations and ejaculations suitable to what you see or hear.

When you are coming to this holy table, and perhaps may be put to stand a little by it, by reason of the throng before you get access, think on what Moses said to the Israelites while standing at the Red sea, Exod. xiv. 13, "Stand still," saith he, "and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will show to you to-day." In like manner you are standing by the Red sea of the blood of Christ: stand still and wonder at the glorious salvation he is showing to you this day.

Or you may think with yourself, that you hear Christ, the Captain of your salvation, now crying as did Jehu, 2 Kings ix. 32, "Who is on my side? Who?" Well, if you will now appear or declare for Christ, then you must throw your lusts, like Jezebel, out of the window, to be dashed in pieces.

When you see the communicants set about Christ's table, you may think on that word, Psal. cxxviii. 3, where God promiseth to the righteous man, "That his wife should be as a fruitful vine by the sides of a house, and his children as olive plants round about his table." Behold his promise made out to Christ, God's righteous servant; the church, Christ's spouse, is a fruitful vine, and hath born him many children: would to God these may be Christ's children by adoption, as well as they are the church's by profession! May it be said of them, that this and that man was born of her! O how pleasant a sight is it to see Christ's children set as olive plants round about his table, and to see Christ himself setting them there! Surely, if he set them, he will serve them also, they shall not have ground to go away with any complaint of him: for Christ is no niggard to his children; he is neither hard-hearted nor hard-handed; if his children seek bread, he will not give them a stone.

When you are allowed to come forward to the Lord's table, think with yourself that you hear Christ or his ministers saying to you, as the angels did to the women at the sepulchre, Matt. xxviii. 5, 6, "We know whom ye seek, ye seek Jesus which was crucified; come, see the place where the Lord lay;" come, see the promise; come, see the elements wherein the Lord lieth.

And in the meanwhile, take care to entertain very high and exalted thoughts of Christ, and very low and humble thoughts of yourself. Say, or think, "Lord, I am not worthy to approach so near thee, far less that thou shouldst come under my roof. I am not worthy to eat the crumbs that fall from my own, much less those that fall from thy table. O, I am unworthy to be allowed to creep as a dog under the table, far less to sit as one of Christ's invited guests at the table. I deserve not room to stand amongst thy servants, far less to sit down with thy children. I deserve not to have daily bread conferred on me, and shall I be allowed to eat of the bread of life? I am unworthy to lift up my eyes to heaven, and shall I get manna from heaven? I am not worthy to eat the bread of men, and shall I be admitted to eat the bread of angels? Shall I entertain him whom they adore: nay, sit down with him at whose feet they fall? Shall I, who am unworthy to tread thy ground, be allowed to tread thy courts? Shall I, that am unworthy to breathe in thy air, have thy Spirit to breathe into my heart, or have leave to breathe out my desires unto thee?"

O how great is the condescending goodness of our heavenly Father to his prodigal children! These are wonders of mercy, as well as miracles of compassion!

SOME DIRECTIONS FOR COMMUNICANTS WHEN AT THE LORD'S TABLE.

I would have you at this time to mind that word of Solomon, Prov. xxiii. 1, "When thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what is before thee." O communicant, consider diligently the sacramental elements, and what is represented and exhibited by them. Consider the sacramental promises, and what blessings are contained in them. Consider the sacramental actions, and the gracious acts which the soul should put forth with them. It should be a busy time, and well improv'd; for though it be short, yet you have many things to do in it, which may generally be comprehended under these two heads:

1. Remember the suitable subjects which are to be considered and meditated on at the table.

2. Observe and exert the special graces which are to be employed and exercised there.

As to the first of these heads, I shall mention some suitable subjects of your meditation and contemplation at this time; as, 1. Christ's death and passion. 2. The bitterness and variety of his sufferings. 3. Christ's willingness to undergo these sufferings for us. 4. The blessed effects and benefits of his sufferings. 5. Christ's free love, as the impulsive cause of all he did and suffered. 6. The evil of sin, which brought on his sufferings. 7. God's holiness and justice manifested in them. 8. The communion-feast above, represented by this lower table.

I. Remember and meditate upon the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ. David hath a psalm which he calls a psalm of remembrance, Psal. xxxviii. Here the Son of David hath a sacrament, which may well be called a sacrament of remembrance; for the great end of it is to be a memorial of Christ its author and founder: for he said, when he instituted it, "This do in remembrance of me;" and we find those words used twice over, both at the delivering of the bread and of the wine, 1 Cor. xi. 24, 25. As if he had said, Whatever you mind, see that you forget not your suffering Redeemer. Some of Christ's works are narrated only by one evangelist, as his turning the water into wine, and some others; some of his works are recorded by two evangelists, as the history of Christ's birth by Matthew and Luke; some things are recorded by three of them, as the institution of the sacrament of the supper: but as for Christ's death and passion, it is recorded by them all four. And this is done no doubt to teach us, that though all Christ's works and actions are seriously to be remembered and thought upon, yet none so especially as his death and sufferings. And when should this be thought upon, if not at the sacrament, whose institution was purposely for the remembrance thereof? O communicant, will ye not think of this subject when you have Christ crucified evidently set forth before your eyes, in the bread broken and the wine poured out? O was his blessed body broken with torments, and his precious blood shed for the remission of my sin: and will I not think upon him? Dear Saviour, thou biddest me remember thee: O how should I ever forget thee at any time, and far less now when I sit at thy table! If I forget thee, O Redeemer, let my right hand forget its cunning, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth. O that I could ever go out of myself to remember thee, and never think on thee without an extacy of wonder!

II. Think upon the bitterness of Christ's passion, and the variety of his sufferings, and revolve in thy thoughts the several steps and degrees thereof. And particularly take a view of your Redeemer's agony in the garden of Gethsemane, walk into that garden and behold him falling to the ground under the weight of your sins, wrestling as in an agony, and sweating great drops of blood, and these bursting through all his garments. O see how he lay, and how he bedewed and stained the flowers of the garden round about him with his blood. Never any in the world was known to sweat in such a manner before, and never any since that time. In a natural way of speaking, the coldness of the night, his lying on the cold ground, and the exceeding greatness of Christ's fear at that time, should have drawn all his blood inward from the outward parts of the body. O but this sweat was preternatural! He sweats without fire, and bleeds without a wound. There was no heat, no fire without him that made him sweat at that time; no, the fire was within him, even the fire of God's wrath kindled in his soul; this made the blood about his heart to boil and burst through his veins, flesh, skin, clothes, and all together. There was no wound outward as yet given him, no sword, no spear, no weapon as yet had touch'd him, and yet he bleeds: O the wound was inward in his soul; deep and fearful was the gash which the sword of justice made at this time in his soul: the breach was wide as the sea, and accordingly a whole sea of wrath brake in with violence upon his soul. He falls first upon his knees, and then upon the ground; he lies under the pressure till he is overwhelmed with his Father's wrath and his own blood. Deep called unto deep, till all these dreadful waves and billows passed over him. He cried to his Father, he complained to his disciples, he sought their sympathy and prayers; but no relief had he from that source; he must tread the wine press alone.

Next, O communicants, follow your Redeemer after he was apprehended, by your meditations, and trace his steps through the streets of Jerusalem: think what he underwent when he was hurried from one tribunal to another. Go into the high priest's palace and to Pilate's judgment-hall, and observe what unparalleled affronts and indignities he suffered there, and none to take his part; he was reproached, despised, and abandoned by all men, as if he had been the worst of men, and unworthy to breathe in the world. He was put in competition with a vile murderer for his life, and yet the murderer is preferred before him. Yea, his own chosen disciples, who had been eye-witnesses of his miracles, and ear-witnesses of his oracles, they turn their backs on him with the rest; one of them betrays him, another denies him, and all the rest forsake him. Behold how unworthily men buffet him, blindfold him, and spit on that beautiful face which angels behold with wonder. Behold how he was scourged, dragged up and down, affronted and mocked a whole night on your account, as if he had been the derision of wicked men and devils. Now the devil thought, if Christ was to be the elect's surety, and was to pluck them out of his claws, he should pay well for them ere he got them; and therefore many a wound and buffet he got: but content is our Redeemer to take all, to get his elect free and safe.

In the next place, Behold how the heavy tree of the cross was laid and fastened on the sore and bleeding shoulders of our Saviour, and he obliged to carry it to the place of execution. Follow him in your thoughts, and see him wrestling under the weight, when going up mount Calvary: he carries it, till he can carry it no further, he is spent and founders under the load, yet desires no relief. Ascend mount Calvary, and there see the cross laid down upon the ground, and Christ, the blessed victim, laid down upon the cross, which was a rack as well as a death; see how he is racked and nailed to it by the bloody executioners. And then behold the cursed tree lifted up with the Lord of glory fastened to it, and fixed on the top of glory Calvary, as a sacrifice to justice for an elect world. Behold him ranked among malefactors, and hanging betwixt two thieves. Behold his hands and feet pierced and rent with nails, his glorious head covered with a crown of thorns, and his tender side run through with a spear. See how the thorns pierce his holy head; see how his precious blood trickles down from his many wounds; see how his royal visage turns pale; see how his head bows, and lies a dying on his bleeding breast. Is not this an affecting sight?

Again, Consider the prodigious outward darkness that was on Christ during his passion on the cross for several hours together, to show the horrible inward darkness that was on his soul while the wrath of God acted against him as being the sacrifice for the world's sins. We read, that while Abraham was offering his sacrifice, Gen. xv. 12, the sun was going down, and an horror of great darkness fell upon him. So fared it with Christ while he offered himself a sacrifice for us. Now the Lord revealed his wrath from heaven against the unrighteousness of the world, which was at this time laid on Christ. Our Redeemer lay under this darkness, to show that we should have suffered the horror of darkness for ever, even that blackness of darkness, which the apostle Jude speaks of. But glory to God, the blackness of darkness caused by God's wrath for sin, was now laid on our Surety. Strange! God causeth his sun to shine upon the just and unjust, but on our Redeemer now it must not shine, as if, of all the unjust ones in the world, he were the most unjust, having the whole injustice of the elect laid to his charge. O spotless Lamb of God! Innocent Redeemer of mankind! Most pure and just One, that never offended against the law! And must thou be dealt with as the most unjust person that ever breathed in the world, because of the injustice of others? Now all the powers of earth and hell were let loose against our Redeemer: all these lions, bulls, dogs, and unicorns, were set upon him to tear him. And was it not enough that earth and hell were against him, but must heaven set itself against him too, and declare its indignation by that visible sign of the horrible continued darkness. O, that was heavier and sharper to our Redeemer than all the rest of his sufferings: under the rest he was silent, but now he cannot hold his peace; and therefore sends forth that formidable loud cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" During the continuance of these three dark hours was Christ drinking the bitter cup; and now he comes to the bottom and bitterest dregs of it. Now were the envenomed arrows of the Almighty piercing him in the most sensible part; and therefore he must cry. O how justly then might he have cried out with Job, and with better ground too than he did, Job xix. 21, "Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O ye my friends; for the hand of God hath touched me!" How truly might the husband now have taken up the spouse's lamentation, Lam. i. 22, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce wrath!" Do but imagine what excessive pain and excessive torment he underwent both in soul and body, when he made this fearful outcry: and canst thou, O communicant, see such a tragedy acted on the bleeding Jesus with dry eyes? This sacrament is, as it were, a visible sermon on our Saviour's passion; in it we behold the whole tragedy that was acted on the cross. Here we view the whole circumstances of the barbarous malice of the Jews and Romans, against the innocent Son of God. And we should endeavour to be always as much affected therewith, as if we had seen the same acted with our bodily eyes.

Moreover, Think now upon Christ's cry upon the cross, when he said, "I thirst, I thirst." No wonder he cried so, when there was a furnace of wrath kindled in his soul, a fire that dried up his strength and moisture like a potsherd, and made his tongue cleave to his jaws. A strange complaint! I thirst: the Creator is thirsting, and there is no creature to give refreshment. Strange! Might not one have cried, "O where were all the wells in Jerusalem at this time? Where all the fountains, rivers, and lakes in the world? Where all the vines of that fruitful land, when my Lord and Saviour could not get a drink? Shame upon you all, that would let glorious King Jesus be burnt up with thirst." O, but they might have answered, "We dare not own nor relieve him at this time: God hath laid an arrest on us, and we dare not break it to serve our Master." How strange to hear the fountains and vines say, We will give Pilate and Herod, and all the enemies of Christ drink; but we will give Christ himself none, though he die for thirst! O is there no liquor for precious Christ in all the earth, but bitter gall and vinegar to increase his thirst and torment: not a cup of cold water for the Lord of glory, not a drop to cool his scorched tongue; but he must die crying out, I thirst? But O, if my Saviour had not thirsted on the cross, I had thirsted with Dives in hell; nay, all the elect had lain there in that lake of fire, and cried for ever, I thirst, I thirst.

And further, consider the extent and universality of his sufferings. He suffered in both natures. His Godhead indeed could not suffer grief, but it suffered an eclipse, and lay under a veil for thirty-three years, except one hour it broke out and shone on mount Tabor. He suffered in all his offices; for they mocked and ridiculed him as a prophet, despised and insulted him as a priest, abused and slighted him as a king, putting a mock sceptre in his hand, and arraying him with an old purple robe, mock habiliments of majesty. He suffered in all the powers and faculties of his soul, and in all the senses and members of his body: his head, heart, hands, back, sides, and feet, were all mangled and pierced, and no part of him free but his tongue, to pray for his enemies. He suffered in his outward goods; for what he had of this kind were his garments, and these were taken from him. Moreover, he was wounded in his name and reputation; for he suffered as a blasphemer against God, as a traitor against the Roman emperor, and as an enemy to Moses's law, though he was entirely innocent as to all the three. He suffered from all hands; from heaven, from earth, from hell; from Herod, from Pilate, from the high priest; from the Romans, from the Jews, from the soldiers; from the clergy; from the lawyers; from rulers, from commons; from friends, from foes; from disciples, from strangers: all were against him: but which was worst of all, God was against him too. For he being substitute in room of sinners, God acted as an inexorable judge toward him; he smote him with the sword of justice, frowned on him in a terrible manner, and withdrew from him all the sensible feelings of his loving-kindness, and restrained the influence of those beams which might any way refresh his troubled soul in the hour of his greatest need. So that there was never any sorrow like our Redeemer's sorrow.

Hence it was that he "offered up his supplications with such strong crying and tears," Heb. v. 7. Hearken, O communicant, how Christ wept and sobbed in the garden, and how loud he cried on the cross, Father, Father: mercy, mercy: my God, my God. But what a fray think you was there in heaven at this time!—Why? The Son of God weeping! The Creator of the earth crying and sobbing on the earth! Never was there such a commotion in heaven or earth, either before, or ever shall be after. What a stir was there among the angels, when their Lord was weeping, crying, and sobbing? How amazed were they, and intent upon the issue! Strange! might they say, "he that takes up the isles as a little thing," crying so hideously at this time! He that can bear up heaven and earth with a finger, weeping! What can be the matter? Surely there was more than the tree on Christ's back, more than the thorns in his temples, or the nails in his hands and feet. O, there were the curses of God's law on the tree that Christ bore, which were heavier than ten thousand mountains of iron! The poison of God's wrath went in with the thorns and the iron nails, and entered into his very soul.

Christ's martyrs and sufferers have rejoiced in their sufferings, and sung praises under their tortures; and yet Christ, who is the author of their strength and comfort, doth himself complain and weep! O but all the martyrs' sufferings were nothing compared to those of Christ! They had God's presence with them in their trials; but Christ had God angry and withdrawn from him: nay, the Lord did run upon him as a giant, and made him the butt of his envenomed arrows. Hence it was, that our Lord, at the sight of his wrath, began to fear and be sore amazed, Mark xiv. 33. The word in the original language is ekthambeisthai, i. e., to be astonished with terror. To see millions of men despairing, is not so much as to see Christ beginning to fear. And, O it was not a small fear that was on our Redeemer; no, it was a great fear and amazement. Never was any man so afraid of the torments of hell, as Christ, standing in our room, was of his Father's wrath; because never man knew the power of that wrath so well as he. O what anguish was there at Christ's heart, that made it to bleed without any outward violence, and that blood to burst through both flesh, skin, and garments at once! The perfect knowledge which Christ had of things aggravated his sufferings: he did not shut his eyes when he drank the cup; no, he perfectly saw how dreggish and bitter it was, and yet he ventured on it. Many men fear not hell, because they foresee it not; if they did see that pit open for them before they came at it, it might perhaps cause them to tremble at their sins, and many wicked men might run mad at the horror of it: but Christ clearly foresaw all he met with, which was far greater and worse than the torments of any damned soul; and this made him to be amazed with fear.

Finally, consider how our Redeemer at last bowed his head, and gave up the ghost! Strange sight! to see the Lord of life death's prisoner! To see the princely head of Jesus falling down upon his breast! To see the Lord of life wanting life; to see these eyes, that were oft lifted up to heaven in prayer, now waxed dim and fixed that they cannot move! To see that mouth, that spake as never man spake, now silent and not able to speak a word! An affecting sight! The world never saw the like! To see the fair corpse of glorious Jesus rolled in linen, and laid in a silent grave! To see him lying there dead, that raised Lazarus from the grave, to see him wanting life, that gave life to men and angels; and all for thy sake, O believing communicant!

And then, how moving were the circumstances of his passion! Remember how shamefully the Lord of glory was put to death, how he was stript and hung naked before all Israel, and before the sun. And where was it? Even at Jerusalem, which he had honoured with his presence, taught with his preachings, astonished with his miracles, and bewailed with his tears. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem (said he), how oft would I have gathered you, but you would not! O if thou hadst known in this thy day!" &c.—What place in Jerusalem was it? Without the gates of Calvary, among the stinking bones of vile malefactors.—When was it? At the passover, a time of great concourse of all the Jews and proselytes: a time when they should receive the figure, they reject the substance; when they should kill and eat the sacramental lamb in faith and thankfulness, they kill the immaculate Lamb of God, our true passover, in cruelty and contempt.—With whom? Even in midst of two thieves, as if he had been the captain of thieves. How great was the disgrace and contempt that was poured on the glorious Redeemer of Israel! Behold, he who thought it no robbery to be equal with God, is himself made equal with robbers and malefactors! Jeremiah laments it, in Israel's case, as a piece of the most reproachful treatment, that princes were hung up by their hands, Lam. v. 12. O, thus was the Prince of the kings of the earth treated for our sakes; and shall we not be deeply affected with it?

III. Another suitable subject of meditation at the Lord's table is, the willingness of our Redeemer to undergo all these sufferings for us. He was no-wise importuned or compelled, but most freely undertook to pay the elect's debt, Psal. xl. 7, 8, Then said I, Lo, I come, I delight to do thy will." As if he had said, "Father, I see no other is able to pay the debt of these poor bankrupts. The Levitical priests, for all the beasts they have killed, and all the sacrifices they have offered these many hundreds of years, they have not been able to pay so much as one farthing of the elect's debt to this day; it is all entirely owing still." "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not;" I see these will not do; but I know what will: then said he, "Lo, I come;" I will be surety, and I will do the work effectually; but I must leave the glory of heaven for a time. Then farewell, Father, for thirty-three years; farewell, all my angels, and all my saints, till I come back again; I must go and relieve these perishing souls, and I will do it to purpose." The Lord saith to us, by that wise man Solomon, "Be not surety for any man:" but, saith Christ, though I give that advice to others, yet I will not take it to myself; I will be surety for many men, yea, for strangers, though my very garments should be taken away for it: my heart bleeds for them; I cannot see them thrown into an eternal prison, when I am able to pay their debt; I will go and pay it for them. Well, when the time came to pay the debt, did he begin to rue the bargain? When he found the debt great, and the payment heavy, did he shun his creditors, as many men do? No; he is as willing to pay the elect's debt, as God to exact it. "With desire," says he, "have I desired to eat this passover;" because now the term of payment, which I long looked for, is come. One might have thought, for as frank as he is in undertaking, yet stay till he once taste the bitter cup he is to drink, he will perhaps change his mind, and begin to shrink from it. No, no, the taste he had got of the cup's brim made him thirst the more earnestly for the very dregs of it, that he might get his poor elect put altogether beyond the danger of it, Luke xii. 50, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished?" It is a terrible black cloud that hangs over my peoples' heads; I long for its breaking upon me their Surety, that I may get them safe, and out of all hazard. And when Peter drew a sword to defend his Master, and prevent his suffering: "hold thy hand (saith he to Peter), no swords; the cup that my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"

It is a bitter cup indeed. I find it from the large draught I have taken of it just now in the garden; but though it be bitter, yet it is just: I have undertaken it as the elect's Surety; and, Peter, will you hinder a man to pay his debt? What then would become of all my elect's souls, and of your soul among the rest? If this cup be death to me, it would be eternal damnation to you. I have legions of angels ready to rescue me, if I needed them; they are all looking on, and waiting my orders: but keep your posts, ye angels; come none of you to my assistance: let no man draw a sword, and let none of my disciples offer to interpose; for I am resolved to pay their debt, I will lay down my life for my sheep. Let Jonah then be cast into the sea, and ye shall be all safe." O, what a willing sacrifice was our Redeemer! He is content to swim in a sea of wrath for us the space of thirty-three years; and never desired deliverance till the sea is perfectly calm, and his elect out of hazard of being swallowed up.

Consider how he quickened the traitor Judas, and bade him make dispatch, when he was going about his bloody work. He sung a hymn when he was going to the garden to be apprehended. He cast himself in the persecutors' way, goes forth to meet them, and boldly presents himself to them; and, as if they were too slow in apprehending him, he quickens them to it, by telling them twice over, he was the man they sought. And then remember how willing he was to let malefactors' hands be laid on his innocent hands; hands that never did evil, hands that never stole any thing, that never shed blood; nay, hands that healed diseases, cured the lame, fed the hungry, and loosed our fetters. But what need was there for binding so willing a prisoner? He was to make no struggle, no resistance, but was like a lamb led to the slaughter, without opening his mouth. O but he is willing to be bound for our sakes! Father, says he, bind me and loose them; let me be the ram caught in the thicket, slay me and save them. All their ills, all their debts, all their deserts be upon me; as Paul said to Philemon concerning Onesimus, Phile. 18, "If they have wronged thee, or owe thee ought, put that on my account;" charge it on me, take payment and satisfaction from me.

Again, when he was before the high-priest accused, and witnesses against him, he would not say a word in his own defence; though they could prove nothing, yet he desired not to be released. Though he was entirely innocent of crime or fault before the world, yet he knew he was guilty by imputation and voluntary substitution, and therefore he holds his peace. Seeing he was liable before God as a surety, he would not hinder the payment, but willingly submits to the hardest conditions of our relief. Though wicked Pilate was convinced of his innocence, and sought to save his life, yet he sought it not himself: hence we read how Pilate scourged Christ very sore with sharp platted cords, and then brought him forth to the people, to see if their hearts would relent, when they saw him all bleeding, saying, Behold the man: surely, thinks Pilate, when they see his furrowed back and bloody shoulders, they will be ready to say, Poor man, thou art ill enough handled already for any ill thou hast done. But O, he knew no better: justice was not satisfied, and these hell-hounds were not satisfied, they must have his life, his heart's blood, or nothing. And your loving Saviour, O believer, says Amen to it, you shall have it, I will die, I will be a sacrifice for sin, I will satisfy my Father's justice to the uttermost, I will have my beloved bride out of danger; I will not leave one farthing of the debt for my people to pay.

Next, observe how willingly he took the heavy cross upon his bleeding shoulders to carry it to the place of execution, though his strength was very much spent already with watching, wrestling, buffeting, scourging, and loss of blood. O what a sight do you think was our Lord Jesus going forth out of the gates of Jerusalem with his heavy cross and your sins on his back, and like to fall under the burden as he went! How weak was he in body, and weary in soul, ere he got to the top of mount Calvary! And what saw he before him as he was climbing that mount? Nothing but a cursed death, and a black cloud of God's wrath. Yea, he had a load of wrath already on his back, that was far heavier than the cross he was bearing: O, it was no wonder that he staggered, foundered, or fell under his burden; so that Simon the Cyrenian was compelled by his enemies to carry the light end of the tree behind him, lest he had died before he came to the top of the mount. But our loving Jesus, though he was spent and weary in his body, yet forward and willing was he in his mind to go and be made a sacrifice for us: and therefore up the mount will he go, though he sees justice, devils, and wicked men at the top of it, waiting to fasten on him when he comes; but seeing there was no other way to deliver his lost sheep, he will go and meet them. Well, O communicant, observe and take notice of your Saviour's steps, as he went up the mount, with the burden you laid upon his back, follow him all the way with an eye of faith: though it was cursedly heavy, yet how patiently doth he bear it. He complains not, he opens not his mouth: he will not bid you or any of the elect lend him a lift: for he knows you are not able to bear the least grain-weight of his burden; it would break your backs, and crush you to hell for ever: he will bear it all alone; only he will have you to notice him with the eye of faith, and to remember him with love and gratitude.

IV. Let the blessed effects and benefits of Christ's sufferings be the subject of your thoughts at this time. Hereby justice is satisfied, and believers are redeemed. The fire of divine anger is quenched, the mouth of hell stopt, the ocean of wrath dried up, the raging sea quelled, the roaring lion vanquished; the old serpent is unstinged, and his venomous head bruised; the law is disarmed of its thunders and curses, and its loud clamours against us silenced; our debts are paid, and discharge obtained; an angry God becomes a reconciled Father, and both grace and glory are purchased. Hereby our putrifying sores are cleansed, our deadly plagues cured, God's beautiful image restored, slaves of Satan become sons of God, heirs of hell become heirs of heaven, rebels against heaven become favourites of God, and traitors get access to his throne. Hereby the gates of paradise are opened, the flaming sword removed, glorious mansions prepared, and the crown of life purchased for believers. It was not for nought that our Redeemer groaned and wept, swate and struggled, bled and died. These great deliverances and mercies were deadly hard to bring forth. They put our Redeemer to cry out, to the amazement of angels, and horror of men, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" But now it is finished, his agony is over, the deliverance is wrought, the redemption is purchased: justice now saith, "It is enough, I am fully satisfied with the Surety's payment, I demand no more;" the sacrifice is of a sweet-smelling savour to me, and it perfumes all the elect's persons and performances. Nay, so efficacious and acceptable were these sufferings, that the virtue of them reaches back to the beginning of the world, and extends forward to the end of it. God was so well pleased with them, that he accepted of them as a ransom for elect souls four thousand years before he endured them. The Surety's payment was so acceptable, that he took many thousands to heaven before the debt was paid, upon Christ's parole that he shall pay; for all the saints under the Old Testament went to heaven this way: "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased;" thus God declared from heaven again and again, q. d. "Many a time have the elect grieved me; many a provocation have their sins given me; yea, have their duties given me: but I am well pleased with my Son, their Surety hath satisfied me for them all."

V. You ought to meditate on the impulsive cause of Christ's suffering on his part. His free love was the only motive; it was this that caused him to take upon him the heavy burden of our sins, that would have sunk us into the bottomless pit. As often as we come to the Lord's table to partake of these elements, we should do it in remembrance of Christ's unspeakable and incomprehensible love to us: we should never perform this holy duty without admiration and astonishment at the thoughts of our Saviour's infinite love and undeserved compassion toward us, in that he laid down his life to save ours who had rebelled against him. Our Redeemer well knoweth the evil nature and disposition of man, that he is apt to forget his best friends, and to turn unthankful for the greatest benefits ever he received; and therefore he consults our eternal good, by enjoining us to solemnize this ordinance in remembrance of that immense love he expressed towards us in his death and sufferings. Besides what I have formerly said of your meditating on and admiring the love of Christ before your coming to his table, I exhort you, now you are at the table, to fall a wondering at it afresh, for this is most proper work for you at such a time.

"O the love of Christ that passeth knowledge!" Where shall I begin my thoughts on this subject? and when begun, how shall I make an end? Thy love, Lord, is ancient; thou lovedst us first, and that when there was no eye to pity: thou tookest not on thee "the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham;" they are bound with chains of darkness whilst thou art drawing us with cords of love. Yea, thou lovedst us when enemies. To have spared our lives had been unexpected, undeserved mercy; for "who finds his enemy, and lets him go well away?" But, Lord, thou hast found me in mine enmity, and hast pitied me; yea, when my hand was lifted up against thee, thine arms have been open to embrace me. Nay, thou hast opened thy very heart to lodge thy professed enemies who have trode thee under foot. Thy bowels yearned towards them who raked in them with their bloody hands. Thy heart burned with affection towards them that cruelly pierced it. "Herein Christ hath commended his love to us, that while we were sinners, Christ died for us." O astonishing love! that the general should die for the soldier, the physician for the patient, the master for the servant, the shepherd for the sheep, the innocent for the guilty, the just for the unjust, the prince for the rebel, the Lord of glory for the children of disobedience! He that was without all sin, for him that was without all righteousness; yea, the Creator for the creature, God for man, the righteous Judge for the condemned malefactor! O love without a parallel! For the Judge to put himself in the malefactor's clothes and room, and suffer death for him! For the blessed Son of God to interpose his own innocent breast to receive these mortal wounds due to us! Behold God all-sufficient exposed to hunger and thirst, grief and weariness, reproach and indignities of all sorts! Behold the world's Saviour wounded, mangled, and killed by ungrateful man whom he came to save! Glorious Saviour, what love was this, that thou shouldst become "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief;" that from the womb to the tomb, from the cradle to the cross, thy whole life should be a continued martyrdom! That thou shouldst be content to be born among beasts, live among murderers, and die among thieves; and all to obtain a place among the blessed for us! O the unfathomable love of Jesus! His name is love, his nature is love, his words were love, and his actions were love. He preached love, he practised love, he lived in love, he was sick of love, nay, he died for love." The apostle might well call it a known unknown love, Eph. iii. 19; we may feel it, but O we cannot fathom it. Jacob showed great love to Rachel, in his enduring the heat by day and the frosts by night for her: but our lovely Bridegroom showed far greater love to his spouse in undergoing the cursed, painful, and shameful death of the cross for her. It is reported of the pelican, that when her young ones are stung with some poisonous serpent, she beats her breast with her beak, till the warm blood gusheth out, which they suck and recover: we are all stung mortally by the old serpent the devil; but behold the love of our heavenly Pelican, he let out his heart's blood to recover us.

O communicant, remember his love, seeing he requires it at this time, "Do this in remembrance of me." O remember Christ, for he did not forget you. He minded you at his last supper, he made his testament and put you in it, and left every believer a good legacy. At his death he minded you more than he minded himself. In his last prayer he put up many a petition for you, but few for himself. In the garden, on the cross, and in the grave, his poor lost sheep were still in his mind; he minded you both day and night; many a night's sleep took Christ's sleep from him, thinking on them, and pleading for them. O that was a remarkable night's sleep that Christ wanted, when he swate blood in the garden for you; that was a night never to be forgotten; think on it now. When wanted you a night's sleep for Christ, thinking on his love, wondering at his sufferings, and pleading for an interest therein? O seek to make it up now, and say, "O the breadth and length, O the height and depth of the love of Christ! Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him? What is he, that thou shouldst magnify him, and set thy heart upon him?" Strange! that thou shouldst set thine heart upon wretches, so as to give the glorious Son of thy love to suffer all the curses of the law, and vials of thy wrath; to make us, who are children of wrath, yea, heirs of the curse, and fire-brands of hell, to become children of God, heirs of the blessing, and of eternal life! Surely, while you are thus musing on the love of God, your hearts, like David's, should wax hot within you, and the fire should burn; nay, the flame of love to God should break out in the most lively and active manner; now your "spikenard should send forth the smell thereof;" now the sweet odour of your graces should fill all the house.

VI. The evil of sin, which was the procuring cause of Christ's suffering, should also be the subject of your thoughts at the Lord's table. He had no sin of his own, but our sins were laid upon him; and divine justice finding them there, took vengeance on our Surety to the uttermost. O Lord, our sins were the principal actors of that woeful tragedy; they were the traitors which by the hands of Judas delivered him up to be crucified: Pilate, the Jews, the Romans, were but the executioners of our sins. Our sins, with clamours more importunate than all the Jewish rabble, cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him." What foolish inconsistent creatures are we, that bewail the event, but redress not the cause! Alas! we naturally have as great enmity against his image, as they had against his person: they grieved him in his body, we in his spirit: they opened his wounds, we made them bleed afresh. Neither had they got the least power to touch him, if it had not been for our sins that made him obnoxious to wrath. O, who was it that armed the Jews and Romans against him? Who put the sword in justice's hands? Who forced these groans and bloody sweats from my Redeemer? Ah, who but I? My sins, my pride, my unbelief, my atheism, my covetousness, my malice, my lying, cheating, swearing, Sabbath-breaking, &c. These raised the storm of wrath against my Surety. Blame not Judas, Herod or Pilate, the Jews or Romans, so much as my sins: nay, I am the Judas that betrayed him, the Herod that mocked him, the Pilate that condemned him, the executioner that drove in the nails, the soldier that pierced him.

O my soul, behold thy Saviour now hanging on the cross for thy sins, and yet saying, Weep not for me that endure this torture, but weep for yourself that causeth it; behold the cruelty of thy sins. Look through the gaping wounds into my heart, pierced first by love, next by sorrows, and then by a spear for you. Be persuaded what an evil and bitter thing sin is to me; see how it rakes unto my side, and tears my very heart; canst thou love or harbour that which used me thus? You say you are my friends; and will you not take my part against this deadly enemy? Have not all these wounds mouths enough to persuade you to hate sin? O will you hug my enemy, tear open my wounds, and crucify me afresh? O communicants, let your hearts answer, "No, Lord, I will never requite thy kindness so, I will never account that light which made my Saviour's soul heavy unto death; that shall not be sweet to me that was so bitter to him; that shall never be my joy, that made Christ a man of sorrows. O shall not these sins be forsaken of me, that made him be forsaken of God? Shall ever they be suffered to live in me, that would not suffer Christ to live in the world?"

O what stupid creatures are we, if we do not now stand astonished at the heinousness and hideousness of our sins, for which no atonement could be made but by the bitter passion and agonies of the Son of God! Shall we not say, Surely there must be more in sin than men commonly reckon? It could be no small matter for which the beloved Son of God endured such horrible and dreadful torments. O heavy dead weight of my sins, that pressed down my strong Redeemer to the ground; yea, pressed him down, who upheld the whole fabric of the creation by the word of his power, Heb. i. 3; and without the least pain, could have borne millions of worlds more! O bitter and cursed sin, thou shalt be crucified this day that crucified my innocent Saviour! Couldst thou ever have been guilty of a more horrid deed than murdering of the Lord of glory? I will not rest this day till I have revenged my Saviour's blood upon thee: say now of sin, as the church said of the daughter of Babylon, that enemy and persecutor of Christ mystically, Psal. cxxxvii. 8, 9, "O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed, happy shall he be that rewardeth thee as thou hast served Christ: happy shall he be that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones."

VII. Think on the holiness and justice of God manifested against sin, and adore the same at this time. You have other mirrors and bright looking-glasses in scripture for representing the same to you, such as the casting down the angels from heaven, the drowning the old world, the burning of Sodom, the rejection of the Jews! But none of them so clearly show forth sin's evil, and God's spotless holiness, and inexorable justice against sin, as do the death and sufferings of our Redeemer. Come near, and hearken to the raging billows of God's indignation dashing against the Rock of our salvation, and behold God's implacable hatred against sin. Many a sore storm and hurricane of wrath did he endure to keep the sea of divine wrath from overflowing you. Our Rock groaned, trembled, and swate blood; he cried, prayed, and entreated: yet divine justice would not hear, nor abate him one stripe: "awake, O sword of the Lord," cut him off; let him die, saith justice, seeing he stands surety for man's sins. O here is a greater evidence of the inexorableness of justice, and God's implacable wrath against sin, than if he had hurled all the rocks of the creation into the midst of the sea, or the whole world, full of men and angels, into hell. O you that make light of sin, go to the rock in Horeb, go to Gethsemane, go to mount Calvary, go to a communion table, and see what Christ endured for our sins, hear his heavy groans, and behold the blood standing above his garments. O communicant, tremble at sin, and come under the shadow of this rock, run into the clefts of it; and though you hear the roarings and dashings of this terrible sea upon your rock, yet you are safe here, a drop shall not reach you.

Finally, you ought at this time to have some thoughts of the "marriage-supper of the Lamb" above, whereof this table is an emblem and representation. Here in the wilderness we get a foretaste of the good things of the promised land, to sharpen our appetites after the Canaan above, where these first fruits grow and are fully ripe. O what a glorious and well furnished table will that be, where the church of the first-born will be all gathered in one general assembly, and sit down together with Christ? O where are the looks and longings we should have after that heavenly feast! Awake, my soul, from this dark, deceitful, and vexing world. O be not in love with thy disease, thy fetters, and calamities: join not with those that take up their rest on this side Jordan, on this side heaven, and who say, It is good for us to be here; but with these heavenly pilgrims, who say, Arise, let us depart, this is not our rest, for it is polluted. Lament your distance from God: woe is me that I sojourn in Meshech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar; that I remain in this sinful polluting place among a strange people, and am so long kept from my Father's house above. "O that I had wings like a dove! Then would I fly away, and be at rest: lo, then I would wander far off, and remain in the wilderness," that I might be free from sin's snares and temptations, and might have free access to enjoy God. "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death, which so often troubles, disturbs, entangles, and hinders me from my duty?"

So much for the subjects we ought to meditate on at the Lord's table, I come in the next place,

Secondly, To speak of those graces which are to be employed and exercised at the Lord's table; such as faith, repentance, love, spiritual appetite, and thankfulness. Now is the time, O communicant, that all your graces should be stirred up to the greatest liveliness: and therefore do all you can to excite them to it: chide with them when languishing or dull, and say, "What! can ye not watch with my dearest Saviour one hour?"

I. In the first place: the grace of faith should be most active, for it is most necessary at this time. Faith may say to thee, O communicant, at this table, as Christ said to his disciples, "Without me ye can do nothing." Faith is the eye that sees Christ, the hand that receives him, the mouth that feeds upon him. Let faith's eyes be now opened to see the great sight of Christ crucified on the cross. Do now as Moses, when he saw the bush burning, Exod. iii. 3, "I'll turn aside and see this great sight:" surely you cannot see a greater. Behold the rock of our salvation smitten, to let the water of life come forth to us: come and see him smitten by the rod of Moses, i. e., by the rod of the law, whose minister Moses was; with all the curses and maledictions of the law denounced against us, Gal. iii. 13. Yea, come see him smitten by many hands, by the rod of Moses, by the rod of justice, by the rod of devils, by the rod of the Jews, by the rod of the Romans, by the rod of your sins: come, see him smitten in his head with thorns, in his hands with nails, in his side with a spear, in his heart with sorrows, yea, in his whole soul with the wrath of an angry God. O deep, deep was our rock smitten, before the water of life could come forth to heal us; according to Isa. liii. 5, 8, "He was wounded for our transgression, bruised for our iniquities:—for the transgression of my people was he stricken, and by his stripes we are healed."

Now let faith look sharply out for Christ at the table. Rest not in the bread and wine, but look beyond these; go a little further, and see if you can espy Christ himself. Let the language of your heart at this time be, "Saw ye him whom my soul loved?" Say now to the Lord as the Greeks to Philip, "Sir, we would see Jesus;" Lord, I would now desire to see Jesus Christ: neither the word nor prayers, ministers nor elements, will content me without a sight of Christ. Mind what Isaac told his father on mount Moriah: "father, behold here is the wood and the fire; but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?" So do thou look up at the table to thy heavenly Father, and say, "Father, behold, here is the minister, here is the word, here is the bread and wine; but where is the body and blood of my Saviour? where is the lamb for a sacrifice? Father, where is the Lamb of God that takes away the sins of the world?" Alas, all is nothing to me if he be away. Let faith look up and say to Christ, "Make haste, my beloved, be thou like a roe or a young hart on the mountains of spices. Make no tarrying, O my God; O when wilt thou come to me?"

When Mary came to the sepulchre, looked in, and saw the linen but not the Lord, she presently falls a weeping: O, said she, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him:" my Lord is taken away, and I know not where to find him. When our tender-hearted Saviour heard such a moving and mournful complaint, he hastened to her, and gave her a gracious meeting. So, when thou seest the linen and the elements, but not the Lord Jesus, then be not satisfied, but dart up thy complaints to heaven. "Lord, I came not to see the linen, I came not for the bread and wine, but I came to see Jesus; O Lord, what shall I do? They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where to find him. Ah, what is the word to me without Christ, but as a conduit without water? What are the elements to me but as a cup without wine? O Lord, what wilt thou give me, if I go from thy table Christless?" O, if there were such sights, such breathings coming from thy heart, thou mightest be confident Christ would hear them, and make haste to meet with thee and bless thee.

Awake faith, O communicant, at this time; behold Christ, apply his benefits. Here a believer may find enough in the wounds and blood of Christ, by which he may resolve all his doubts, scatter his fears, supply all his spiritual wants, and find a remedy against all his soul-distempers, by a believing application thereof to himself. When thou putteth forth the hand of thy body, see that thou also put forth the hand of thy faith, to receive the body and blood of Christ. Do like Joseph of Arimathea; come to Christ crucified, take him down from the cross, and lay him in the new tomb of thy heart. Now give a hearty, full, and unfeigned consent to Christ on the gospel terms; receive him as thy Saviour, submit to him as thy prince, and swear allegiance to him as thy undoubted Sovereign. And remember, faith, if true, must have two hands, one to receive Christ, and another to give the soul to Christ; see that both hands be now employed both to take and give.

And, especially, make use of faith's mouth to suck honey from the rock, derive supplies from Christ to thy soul's necessities. Observe what God directed Moses, Exod. xvii. 6, "Behold I will stand before thee upon the rock in Horeb, and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink." Would you have drink and supplies from Christ for your spiritual refreshment, then smite the rock, act faith on Christ. At the table, it would be a man's wisdom, which was Moses' error, to smite this rock oftener than once, Num. xx. 11, "With his rod he smote the rock twice, and the waters came out abundantly." So do you smite the rock twice, again and again; put forth many acts of faith at this time.

II. The grace of repentance and godly sorrow for sin, should be exercised at this time. O communicant, canst thou now look on him whom thou hast pierced by thy sins, and not mourn and be in bitterness for them? Canst thou see the Son of God hanging naked and bleeding on a tree, upon the top of mount Calvary, as a sacrifice for thy sins, and not to be grieved for the cause? O take a fixed look of him now, and let your eye affect your heart. Behold these hands that swayed the sceptre of heaven, now nailed to the tree of reproach: behold these feet that trampled on all the powers of hell, and made his enemies his footstool, now nailed to the footstool of the cross. O did the earth tremble and shake, the rocks rend, the graves open, and heavens turn dark at this sight; and will not our rocky hearts rend, and our dead souls be affected with this sight? Surely the hardest heart among us may now melt, and the dryest eyes now drop a tear. O, shall the Son of God so sweat and bleed for us, and we not weep for ourselves? Shall we see our sins pierce his head with thorns, his hands with nails, and his side with a spear, and yet look on this with unpierced hearts? O, our sins did envenom these thorns, these nails, and that spear. We, and none but we, were the evil beasts that devoured this Joseph; we the bloody executioners that tormented the glorious Redeemer; and shall not our hearts bleed therefore?

O communicant, so behold Christ in the sacrament, as the Virgin Mary his mother beheld him on the cross: "woman," says Christ, "behold thy son." And how did she behold him; Simeon tells her, Luke ii. 35, "That a sword should pierce through her soul." Now was the time that the sword did pierce through her soul, when she beheld him pierced on the cross: that sight was like a sword through her heart: so, when you see Christ pierced in the sacrament, it should be like a sword or dagger in your hearts. Observe what David said, when he saw the people slaughtered by the angel's sword, 2 Sam. xxiv. 7, "Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly; but as for these sheep, what have they done?" So say you at this time, "Lord, I have sinned, I have done wickedly; but as for this innocent spotless Lamb, what hath he done?" It is I that have sinned, but it is thou, O Lord Jesus, that hast suffered. It was my cursed lusts, my unbelief, my pride, my malice, my covetousness, &c. These were the Judases that betrayed thee, these the Jews that put thee to death; I have eaten the sour grapes, but thy teeth were set on edge. O what a sweet temper were it to behold Christ with a weeping eye and a melting heart! O, shall we not so much as shed tears for these sins, for which we see Christ shedding his blood?

It was laid to the charge of these unkind husbands, Mal. ii. 13, that by their unkindnesses they caused their wives, when they should have been cheerful in God's service, to "cover the altar of the Lord with tears, with weeping, and with crying out; insomuch that he regarded not the offering any more, nor received it with good-will at their hands." But how happy were it for us, if we could be so affected with our unkindness to Christ our husband, that we could cover the Lord's table with our tears, with weeping and crying out! Then surely, in this case, the Lord would regard our service the more, and receive our communicating with good-will at our hands. Ah, rocky hearts! harder than the nether-millstone, that cannot dissolve into tears at the sight of so sad a spectacle as the sight of Christ hanging crucified on the cross for our sins. O, shall we see Christ's precious blood spilt on the earth, running on the ground, and the ground drinking it up, and our hearts not rend therefore? O let us call for tears, for mourning hearts, and say, "O that mine head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep for a slain Lord!" Smite, Lord; thou canst bring water out of the rocks, and turn the flint into a standing pool. O that my flinty heart may be touched by the Spirit of God, that the waters may gush out abundantly! O, when will my heart melt, if not now? Surely, now, "deep calleth unto deep;" deep sufferings in Christ for deep sorrow in me. David's kindness made even a Saul lift up his voice and weep; and will not Christ's kindness, which is infinitely greater, make me drop some silent tears? Was my Saviour's body broken to let his blood out; and shall not my heart be broken to let it in? May I now receive a bleeding Saviour with a broken heart!

III. Love is a grace most necessary at this feast, Christ's infinite love should now have a return of love from you: surely now, when you are musing on Christ's love, your heart, like David's, should burn. O believer, Christ died of love to you! and will you not be so much as sick of love to him? It would be a sweet and comfortable sickness to you to be sick of love to him, who died of love to you. You are now come to the fountain of love, you are now at Christ's pierced side, O look in and see his bleeding heart: see how it beats and pants with love, and see how love flows out in streams of blood, to cleanse you from your sins. And will not this lovely sight melt your affections, and warm your cold heart to love him? O behold princely Jesus, the world's Saviour, our lovely Bridegroom, mounted on a bloody cross on the top of mount Calvary, for all nations to see him and flock to him: O what an engaging sight is this! Since that mount was first created, it never produced such a tree, or such precious fruit as the Lord of glory hanging on the tree of the cross planted there. This tree of life made mount Calvary a lovely paradise that day, notwithstanding all the malefactors' bones which lay scattered upon it.

Now, communicants, can you look upon such a sight, and not have your hearts inflamed with love? Surely a crucified Jesus left upon the cross, with his arms stretched out to embrace lost sinners, is the most drawing and attractive sight in the world; for he saith himself, John xii. 32, "If I be lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men unto me," i. e., all sorts of men, both Jew and Gentile. A crucified Jesus is a loadstone of strange virtue, and hath drawn some thousands of iron hearts to him at one sermon. Now he is lifted on high, upon the pole of the cross, and of the sacrament, that you may look to him. Yea, his face and eyes are towards you; O look communicants; and his voice is, "Behold me, behold me; Look unto me and he ye saved, all ye ends of the earth." Poor sinners of Scotland, of Britain, one of the far-off islands and outmost end of the earth; I have turned my back on the Jews, for they will not be drawn to me; and my face towards you, that you may see me and flock to me.

O will not your hearts be moved and drawn by this lovely sight of a crucified Redeemer, dying with love in his heart, and smiles in his looks towards you? He was most lovely when he was on the cross; and now he is most lovely when he is on the throne. O behold king Jesus with the crown of thorns, wherewith his enemies crowned him, in the day he was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief for you; doth not that sight affect your hearts with grief, and make you sad? Then come, behold king Solomon with the crown of glory, wherewith his Father crowned him, when he finished his work, and sat down on the right hand of his majesty on high. Now he is clothed with light and shines brighter than the sun: O will not your hearts love him, whom all the angels and saints in heaven adore, and are ravished with his beauty? His high honour and exaltation above doth not in the least alter his affections, or make him forget his people; no, he loves all believers as dearly as ever. How oft doth he call them in the song, "My sister, my spouse!" The nearest affinity in the world is spouse, and the dearest consanguinity is sister, to show that Christ's affection is like that of the nearest relations; and shall not Christ's great love be answered with love again? O never give Christ cause to complain of you, as Paul of the Corinthians, "The more I love you the less I am beloved," 2 Cor. xii. 15.

O then awake and excite your love now to Christ, and say, "Lord, thou art infinitely lovely, though my heart loves thee not as it ought to do: lovely and amiable art thou in all the steps of thy humiliation: lovely in thy birth, lovely in thy life, lovely in thy death: lovely with the crown of thorns on thy head, and lovely with the cross on thy back; lovely in the garden, and lovely on mount Calvary: lovely with the nails in thy hands, and lovely when the spear was thrust in thy side. And lovely art thou now with the crown of glory on thy head; nay, thou art altogether lovely." O for more love to my lovely Saviour! The apostle, when ravished with the love of Christ, cries out, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus, let him be Anathema Maranatha." O what a cold unnatural heart must that be, that hath no love to this lovely One! O communicant, love him now, when you have seen such an engaging sight of his love: love him dearly, love him entirely, love him above all, love him more than all. And if you love him, then keep his commandments, delight to please him, love his ordinances, love his Spirit, love his commandments, love his people, and love his very cross for his sake.

IV. At this time you ought to awake and excite your spiritual appetite after Christ and the benefits of his death. You are come to a full feast, an inexhaustible treasure, and the Master of it allows you to partake thereof to the full. There is nothing wanting, then, but a lively feeling of wants, and spiritual hunger; had you this, all would be well; for Christ fills the hungry with good things. If there be any poor drooping communicants at the table, who are discouraged under a sense of their poverty and emptiness, I may say to them, as Jacob to his drooping sons in a time of great scarcity of food, Gen. xlii. 12, "Why do you look upon one another?" Ye are poor melancholy creatures, all involved in the same calamity and distress; ye may well look to one another, but one of you cannot help another. Well I have good news to tell you, as Jacob told his sons: "Behold I have heard there is corn in Egypt," there is bread enough in your Father's house, sufficiency of grace in Christ Jesus for all your wants. O drooping communicant, take heart, and hasten to your brother Joseph; your elder brother Christ is Lord of the country, and hath the command of all the store-houses in the land; he will fill your sacks as much as one can carry. Are thy wants many? He has infinite wealth. Hast thou no money to buy, no worth to purchase? Good news! He sells "without money and without price: whosoever will, may come and drink of the water of life freely." Poor soul, camest thou hither for bread? Thy gracious Saviour will not give thee a stone. He took notice of thy serious preparation for the feast; and do you think he will frustrate thine expectation at it? Can you give any instances, that ever he sent any hungry soul empty away? No; this would be contrary to his faithful promise. I may say to thee, as the disciples said to the blind man, "Be of good cheer, he calleth for thee;" and if he call for thee, he will not send thee empty away. Come away then, hungry soul, to a full Redeemer, and get all your wants supplied, your desires satisfied. What would you have? "What is thy petition, and what is thy request?" Would you have riches, honours, profits, pleasures? You have them all here. Would you have all your five senses satisfied at once? Come, partake of the feast your Redeemer hath provided for you. Would you have your sense of seeing satisfied? Then, saith he, look unto me, behold me, your dying yet ever-living Saviour. Would you have your sense of hearing satisfied? Then, saith he, "Incline your ear and hearken to me;" hear the sweet charming voice of your Saviour on the cross, saying, "It is finished." Would you have your sense of tasting satisfied? Then, saith he, "O taste and see that God is good." Would you have the sense of touching satisfied? O then, says he, "Reach hither thy finger, and feel the print of the nails; reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into thy side." Would you have the sense of smelling satisfied? Then come to him, "Whose garments smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia; and whose name is like ointment poured forth." O what a matchless person is this, that can so richly supply all your needs! I tell you again, if you go away without supply, it will be for want of a lively sense of your needs, and of panting desires after Christ and his fulness.

Awake, holy desires and thirstings of soul, and say, Lord, "Let not the needy be forgotten, nor the expectation of the poor perish for ever." Let not a thirsty soul perish at the wells of salvation. O happy were I, if at this time I could get a sealed pardon of my sins! "O blessed is he whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sin is covered!" Lord, whatever thou deny me in the world, do not deny me this choice blessing. O for a token for good at this time of Christ's own hand! May I receive a plentiful effusion of the graces of his Spirit into my heart. O that my lusts and corruptions may be mortified and subdued! May I be enabled to do all my duties better than I have done. May I be more watchful over my heart, my tongue, and all my ways, than ever I have been. O that my soul may depart much bettered, much revived, comforted, and strengthened, from this holy ordinance!

V. Awake your thankfulness to God at this time for redeeming love; join with the psalmist, and say, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name. Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift; what shall I render unto the Lord for all his gifts and benefits unto me? Let me speak of the glorious honour of his Majesty, and declare his wondrous works." You should now be in Mary's frame, to sing and say, as in Luke i. 47, "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit doth rejoice in God my Saviour." and in Zechariah's frame, to say with him, Luke i. 60, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people." The ancients called the Lord's supper still the Eucharist, i. e., the thanksgiving, because the great design of it is to keep up the thankful remembrance of God's redeeming love; and believers in partaking of it should, with their whole souls, give thanks unto God for his unspeakable gift, and sing glory to God in the highest. And for our example therein, our Redeemer both began this institution with the giving of thanks and singing hymns of praise. The Jews at their passover sang the cxiii. Psalm, with the five following psalms, which they called the great Hallelujah. A Christian should in every thing and at all times give thanks; but at the sacrament the great Hallelujah must be sung. If ever the heart be tuned for the work of praise, it should be now; for greater matter for it you cannot have on this side of heaven, than at this occasion. The great exhortation the ancients gave at the communion-table was, Up with your hearts, communicants; elevate them to God in thankfulness and praise. Invite the angels and the whole creation to help you to bless God for Jesus Christ the mercy of mercies.

SOME FURTHER MEDITATIONS ON THE SACRAMENTAL ELEMENTS, ACTIONS, AND WORDS.

Besides what I have said, the sacramental elements, actions, and words may afford suitable subject of meditation to communicants while they sit at the Lord's table, and may be improved for the quickening and upstirring of the sacramental graces above mentioned. And here I shall give some few instances for the assistance and direction of weaker Christians.

When you see the elements of bread and wine set upon the table, think on Christ's goodness and condescension in appointing these outward signs to confirm your faith, and excite your affections: they are not costly things, Christ would not be burdensome to his people with any of his ordinances. Think how fitly they represent the body and blood of our Redeemer. Bread, ere it be fit to nourish us, must be first sown and die in the earth; then it must be threshed, grinded in the mill, baken in the oven, broken and eaten: so Christ, that he might be a fit Saviour to us, was content to die, and be bruised for our sins, and scorched in the oven of his Father's wrath. Bread is the most necessary thing in the world; it strengthens man's heart; it is the staff that upholds his life: so Christ is the mercy of mercies, the most useful and necessary blessing to our starving souls. Wine, ere it be fit for our use, must be squeezed out of the grape, and this must be trodden and bruised in the wine press: so Christ was crushed in the wine-press of his Father's wrath, till the blest juice of his body, his precious blood, gushed out in abundance for the redemption of our souls. No liquor so fit as wine for cheering the fainting spirits, Psal. civ. 15, so there is nothing can refresh the drooping soul so much as the blood of Christ.

Though bread and wine be common things of themselves, yet they are highly valuable in respect of their significancy and ends. A little wax, though in itself of small value, yet when affixed to a charter, it serves to confirm our right and title to a great inheritance: so these elements, when consecrated and given to us by Christ's ambassadors, are to us a seal of God's covenant, and confirm our title to all Christ's purchase.

When we see the minister take the bread, think how God did choose and take Christ from among men to be our Mediator, and a sacrifice for our sins.

When the minister sets apart, blesses, and consecrates the bread, think how God set apart and sent his Son, sanctified and furnished with all gifts and graces needful to his mediatory office.

When you see the consecrated bread and wine exposed to open view, think how God in his infinite mercy "hath set forth Jesus Christ as a propitiation through faith in his blood," Rom. iii. 25. Behold how "evidently Christ crucified is set forth before your eyes." Behold the Lamb opening the seals, the seal of God's covenant, the seal of God's treasures, the seal of the fountain of life, and the seal of heaven's gates; all which were shut before, till Christ came to open them. Suppose now you hear that voice, Rev. vi., "Come and see." Open the eyes of faith, and see a great sight. What is to be seen here. You may, O communicant, see here the heinous nature of sin, the severity of divine justice, the misery of the damned, the deservings of unbelievers: you may see the devil conquered, justice satisfied, a flame of love kindled in Christ's heart that many waters could not quench: you may see the clefts of the rock opened, and a sanctuary found out: you may see the preciousness of souls, the price of pardon, and the worth of heaven. Christ's body and blood, which were given for them, show that they are things of no small value.

When you see the elements, you have cause to bless God, and rejoice at the sight of this precious sign and seal of God's covenant of grace and salvation. We should rejoice to see the rainbow in the cloud, a sign of God's covenant and promise to secure the world against a destroying deluge: much more should we joy to see the sign of God's confirming his covenant with believers, securing them against the overflowing of God's wrath. If it still rained, and never a rainbow appeared, we might have reason to fear: so if we never saw this ordinance and seal of God's covenant, we might suspect danger: but, O believer, you see God is faithful and willing to keep covenant; there is the rainbow appearing; a pleasant sight to a guilty sinner.

When you see the minister lay his hand on the bread, lift up your soul and pray, "That God may lay his hand on your diseased soul, that all your distempers may depart from you: Lord, lay hold on my soul, as the angel did upon Lot; save me from the flames of wrath, cause me to escape out of Sodom into the mount of God and clefts of the rock, that I perish not."

When you see the bread broken, think on the breaking and tormenting of Christ's body, and the bruising of his soul for our sins. He suffered a double death, one in his soul, and another in his body; he suffered from men and devils: but all that was nothing to what he suffered from his Father; for when men were wounding his body, the Father's hand bruised his soul, made a thousand wounds therein, and poured in a whole ocean of wrath upon him: he brake him with breach upon breach, and overwhelmed him with one wave of vengeance upon the back of another, till all his billows went over him. This was a sad time to our Saviour: yet all these floods could not drown his love to us, nor make him quit the hold he had taken of us, but come of him what will, his poor people must not perish, his love to them flamed highest when his sufferings were greatest.

You should at this time desire to be in the same frame as if you had been at Golgotha standing at the foot of the cross, and had seen the blood trickling down, and heard all the dying groans of the Lamb of God. O shall we see the blessed Son of God, the brightness of his Father's glory, with his eyes dim, his cheeks wan, his face pale, his head bowing, his heart fainting, his side bleeding, his wounds open to shelter us, and his love streaming forth in blood to us; I say, shall we see all this, and our affections not raised, our love not kindled, and our hearts not concerned? O what a monstrous thing will it be to see our affections and graces at the lowest ebb, when there is a high stream-tide of the love and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ flowing towards us!

Take a view of Jesus on the cross breathing forth love to us when he was breathing forth his last: let us look straightly and stedfastly to him as he did to us. Many write that he was crucified with his face towards the west: the Jews did it out of despite, as reckoning him unworthy to look on the temple and holy city that stood on the east of mount Calvary; but he had a gracious meaning and design to us thereby, and now was that word remarkably fulfilled, Psal. lxvi. 7, "His eyes behold the nations:" for now his eyes looked to us Gentiles, when he was upon the cross; and O it was an eye of love and pity he cast then upon us: and shall not this encourage us to lift up an eye of faith to him upon the cross for healing and salvation? Especially seeing he calls us to do it, Isa. xlv. 22, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth." And it is to be observed, that Christ in this call hath a special eye to us in Scotland, who were then Gentiles, and are likewise among the ends of the earth. O shall we, in this land and corner of the world, have such a loving invitation to look to a crucified Saviour for mercy, and will we neglect it? Behold his arms stretched out to embrace you, and will you not desire to flee into them? Behold him bowing his head on the cross to take a view of your wounds, and whisper comfort into your ears: behold him opening a window in his side to take you into his heart, and pouring out blood thence to redeem you, and water to cleanse you, a fountain both for your justification and sanctification.

Again, when you see the bread broken, look to Christ's wounds as an open city of refuge for thy soul that is pursued by justice to take sanctuary in: his wounds are laid open, that you may see into his bleeding heart, and see his yearning bowels of mercy, and hear them sounding towards you, an object of pity, and spectacle of misery. Poor shelterless soul, quit all other shelters, and flee to the clefts of the rock here opened, saying, "This is my rest, and here I will stay."

Pray at this time, "Lord, may my hard heart be broken and melted, that I may in some measure be conformed to my broken Saviour:" or, "Lord, break the united forces of my sins, and scatter them by thy mighty arm."

When you see the minister offering the bread to the communicants, and hear him saying, "Take ye, eat ye," &c., think how freely God offers his Son, and Christ offers himself to be ours: think how you see him at the head of the table, making offer of himself to you, saying, "Take me, and the whole purchase of my blood; take my sealed testament, and all the legacies in it; take a sealed pardon of all your sins, and a sealed right to eternal life."

When you receive the bread into your hand, see that you stretch forth the hand of faith to receive and embrace Christ crucified, as your bleeding High-priest, to make atonement for you; say with your heart, "Content, Lord, even so I take thee, and seal a covenant with thee, I elasp about thee as mine; I believe, Lord, help my unbelief." If Christ be not received by faith in this ordinance, there is nothing done but what is ill. O will you come to this table and receive the bread of the Lord, and not receive the bread, the Lord? O it will be sad, it will be bitter at death, or judgment; when you come to die, you will cry, "Lord, receive my soul:" well, may not Christ answer you, "I will just receive your soul as you received my body in the sacrament when you were entreated, and that was not at all?" O then consider what Christ has done for you, and the absolute necessity you stand in of him, and receive him into your souls. O will you not accept of a bruised Lord, a bruised friend, when he is knocking, with the cross on his back, the nails in his hands, and spear in his side! Can you find in your hearts to hold him at the door in this posture? Will you not open your hearts to him who opened his side to you?

When you are making use of this bread, praise and magnify God for providing this heavenly manna to keep your soul from perishing: bless him for this feast, and feed on it that you may live: apply Christ and his benefits for the nourishing your souls, and strengthening your graces: bless him for this noble contrivance and undertaking. Rejoice in Christ, that hath found out a way, by his death, to reconcile an angry God to you, and procure you access to his table, that you may feast with him. With what joy and thankfulness did the Israelites go forth to gather manna; that bread which God sent them from heaven: but O, here is a better manna come from heaven: will ye not be thankful for it, and run with desire to get it? The Israelites' manna could not give life to the dead; but here is manna that can both restore and preserve life; yea, give everlasting life to both soul and body. The Israelites' manna fell not on the Sabbath, and they might not go to gather it that day: but blessed be God, this manna falls every day, and double on the Sabbath, and welcome are ye to gather it this day; for Christ now rains it in greater plenty, and calls you to be more diligent on it than on other days. His table is well furnished with manna this day: O feed and refresh your souls well before you leave it, and strive to preserve the relish of it when you are gone. Cry now with these, John vi. 34, "Lord, evermore give us this bread." This bread both satisfies the soul and creates an appetite; O for a perpetual hunger for it! It is the same bread the glorified saints feed on for evermore: in heaven they never loathe this manna, nor weary of it, as the Israelites did of theirs. It is but a small crumb, O communicants, you get of it here, to that eternal feast provided above.

Again, bread in scripture is called the staff of bread. O this is the true staff of bread; here is bread, if eaten by faith, that will prove a staff to support you, a staff to defend you, a staff to beat your enemies, and put all your lusts to flight: this is a staff that will enable you to run in God's way, "and fight the armies of the aliens." That is a strange dream that one of the Midianitish host had when Gideon was coming upon them, Judg. vii. 13, "Behold, a cake of barley bread came tumbling into the host of Midian, and smote a tent," &c. Strange! a piece of bread overturned a tent. Lo, that dream is interpreted in this sacrament: here a piece of bread, O communicant, if eaten by faith, that will tumble into the host of Satan, and thy lusts, these Midianites, which have long vexed you with their wiles, strike down their tents, and put them all to flight. Surely, a view here, by faith, of Christ's body pierced and nailed by sin, will turn a believer's heart against sin, as the most hateful thing in the world: let sin flatter as it will, he will never forget what it hath done to his dear Saviour. This is both quickening and killing bread; for as it is life to your souls, so it is poison to your lusts.

When you see the wine poured out, think how freely and willingly Christ suffered for you. He poured out his blood as freely as the wine is poured out to you; yea, it is said, Isa. liii. 12, "He poured out his soul unto death," as freely as we pour water out of a vessel. He had freely emptied his veins in the garden, and on the cross; every pore became an eye to weep blood for your sakes: he is wounded over all, that his blood may run the more plentifully and freely; and when he hath no more blood to pour out, he next pours out his soul for you: and would you have any more from your loving Saviour? O did he pour out his soul unto death, and will you not pour out your souls into his bosom?

Again, when you see it, by faith, behold the wells of salvation now opened, the stone rolled away, and the fountain of the water of life running freely, and following poor sinners. O run not away from it, but turn to it; drink, and live for evermore. O shall the fountain of life be opened, and the mouths of your souls fast shut! Can you see Christ's blood running, and not desire to be bathed with it? Hast thou blind eyes or lame feet, weak hands or feeble knees, a cold or hard heart, a feared or doubting soul? Here a cure for all thy diseases. Thou art now at the side of the pool, just at the healing waters, one step will bring you to them: look to Christ for strength, stir up your souls, step in, drink, bathe, and be made whole for ever.

When you drink the cup, remember the precious blood of Christ; eye it by faith, plead it with God, and apply it to your souls: thirstily drink it by the mouth of faith: say, "I am an unrighteous creature, but here is justifying blood; my heart is polluted, but here is sanctifying blood; my soul is wounded, but here is healing blood; my lusts are strong and lively, but here is mortifying blood; my heart is very dead, but here is quickening blood; it is very hard, but here is softening blood. O shall not a drop of this blood light on my hard heart? O let me not miss a cure, when the balm of Gilead is among my hands! This blood healed thousands, and shall my plagues continue? Lord, may that innocent blood, that dropped from thy hands and thy side, wash away all the spots and stains of my guilty soul."

As you find the wine warm on your cold stomach, so let the love and blood of Christ warm your cold heart and affections with vehement love and desire to him. Shall Christ's heart be hot as fire to you, and will yours be cold as ice to him? Can you feel his warm and bleeding heart, and not cry out with Thomas, "My Lord and my God?" How shall I express my love to my loving and lovely Jesus, who loved me and gave himself for me? How dearly, Lord, hast thou purchased my love, unworthy as it is? What hath the world or sin to do with that which Christ hath bought so dear? O for a heart ready to burst with love to him that is only worthy to be the object of it! O for a live coal from God's altar to kindle the flame, that many waters might not quench! Worse am I than a beast, if I be not ravished with Christ's matchless love.

When you see the elements divided and distributed among the communicants, believe it, that Christ is really, though invisible, dealing forth the effects and benefits of his death and sufferings to the worthy receivers.

When you see both the bread and the wine given, think that God is offering and giving Christ, and all Christ unto us; and we must be willing to take Christ and all that is in him, all his benefits, all his offices, all his laws, and all his cross he thinks fit to lay on us.

When the bread and wine are offered to you, and you hear Christ saying, Take, eat, drink; O then cast open all the doors and gates of your soul, that "the King of glory may enter in:" say, "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; wherefore standest thou without? As I receive the bread of the Lord into my mouth, let me receive the bread, the Lord, into my soul. Lord, it was my errand to receive thee into my heart, let me not go without thee." Stir up faith mightily, to receive Christ and all his benefits. Stretch out faith's arms as far and as wide as you may, to welcome, embrace, and clasp about your Saviour, and say, "My beloved is mine, and I am his." Now may the marriage be sealed and ratified, and the knot cast which shall never be loosed again: and happy, happy for ever is my choice, rich is my portion, my soul is made up to all eternity.

When you are eating and drinking the bread and wine, let your soul be busy making close and particular application by faith of Christ and all his benefits, according to your various necessities. And consider, that as by eating and drinking, your food incorporates with your bodies, and turns one with you; so Christ by faith is mystically united to you, and you are made one with Christ: as the broken bread enters into your body, and becomes yours by feeding upon it; so you are to believe, that as truly Christ's broken body, and the purchase of his blood, are applied to you for curing and saving your soul, and that all his merits and graces are yours by faith; "This is my body that was broken for you." Again, as eating and drinking of proper food is very pleasant to our bodies, so we ought to take great satisfaction and complacency in partaking of Christ and his benefits. Let us satiate ourselves, in tasting of his goodness, and feasting on his heavenly dainties. And as by our earthly food our bodies are strengthened for labour, so by this spiritual food our souls and our graces are nourished and strengthened for the duties of religion.

Again, you are to look upon these sacramental actions, as a mutual giving and taking sasive and infestment betwixt Christ and your souls. Hereby you get infestment of a crucified Christ, his great purchase and glorious inheritance; and hereby Christ takes infestment of your soul and body, to be his children, his heirs, his servants and soldiers, to obey him and fight for him while you live. You are hereby consecrated to be temples for his service and residence; beware of defiling the temple of the Lord, suffer not a herd of swinish lusts to enter therein, lest God abhor you and cast you off for ever.

When you hear these words of the institution, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood: this do in remembrance of me:" consider why it is called a Testament; it is because in his ordinance we have Christ's testament and latter will sealed, wherein he leaves many a rich legacy to his poor friends: and here he gives a sealed copy of his testament into every one of their hands.

QUEST. What are the legacies he leaves?

ANS. Pardon, peace, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, redemption, grace, and glory.

QUEST. But how shall I know if I have any interest herein?

ANS. Are you one of Christ's poor relations? Can you claim any relation to him by faith and regeneration? Then your name is in Christ's Testament.

QUEST. But how shall I be sure that the Testament is in force, and will be executed?

ANS. It is become of force by the death of the Testator, who died, and left his testament in the hands of the blessed Spirit to be executor of it, and to apply it to those the Testator appointed: yea (blessed be God) the Testator is risen again, and lives to see the execution of it himself likewise.

QUEST. But, will I get all Christ's purchase and legacies just now?

ANS. You shall be infest, and have your right secured to all this great estate left by Christ's will to you; and out of it you shall have a present maintenance, till the time appointed come, when you shall enter into the full possession of the inheritance. You are but minors yet, and not fit to be intrusted with it; but it is secured in good hands for you, till you come to full age. In the meantime, you hear the dying Testator leaves a charge upon you, to "do this in remembrance of him." Think on him and his love to you; think what he has contrived, what he has promised, what he has done, what he is still doing, and what he is about to do for you: remember him who remembered you in your lowest estate, and is still remembering you: remember him that is coming again quickly in the clouds, to meet you, take you home to his palace, and put you in possession of all. He commands you to show his death till he come again.

When you hear of his coming again, consider what a glorious coming and glad meeting that will be. O believer, you new see Christ only through these elements by an eye of faith, but then you shall see him by an eye of immediate vision, you shall see him even as he is; and O how mightily surprised will you be at the sight! You will say, as the Queen of Sheba said of Solomon, The half was not told me when I was in my own country; but, "beheld a greater than Solomon is here."

Before you rise from the table, you may think on Elijah's cake baked on the coals, and his cruse of water, in the strength of which meat he went forty days and forty nights till he came to Horeb, the mount of God, 1 Kings xix. 6, 8. Think how much more substantial, durable, and nourishing the food is that thou hast been partaking of, and bless God for it. Elijah is twice there awakened to take a double meal; and so ought you to rouse up and provoke your spiritual appetite to take another morsel ere you go; you should feed plentifully at Christ's table. It is a virtue to be a holy glutton at this feast: you know not if ever you get another feast like this, till you come to the mount of God above; this may be your last communion here, and the last time you shall drink of the fruit of the vine in this manner; take a large fill to strengthen your soul for your journey, you know not what blasts and storms may blow by the way: you have a siege to hold out, take in provisions here; you have a voyage to go, see that you victual your ship: death will try and put all your graces to it. The wisest virgins have no grace to spare at the coming of the Bridegroom; what storms of temptations and difficulties do many poor saints meet with on a death-bed! It is with much ado they put safe into the harbour at last. O then gather manna while it is falling, for your gathering time may be lost.

Consider, that, while you are at the table, you are near Christ your Physician; therefore be sensible of your maladies and look up to him with your finger on your sore, and cry with the Psalmist, Psal. xli. 4, "Lord, be merciful unto me; heal my soul, for I have sinned against thee." Now the balm of Gilead is among my hands, and it will be sad if I should miss a cure. The blood of Christ, that hath healed thousands, is now at hand; O let not my plagues continue with me. O let a drop of that precious blood light on my cold, dead, and hard heart, that some heat, life and softness may be got and preserved therein.

You are come to Christ on a good day, when he is on a throne of grace with a sceptre of mercy in his hand; see that you make all your wants known to him. A feasting time is a time of granting requests: "what is thy petition, and what is thy request, Queen Esther?" said king Ahasuerus at the banquet of wine. So said King Jesus to the worthy communicant at his royal feast, "What is thy petition, and what is thy request? What will ye that I shall do unto you?" as Christ asked the blind men, Mat. xx. 32. Let your requests be like those of the Psalmist, "Consider, and hear me, O Lord my God; lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death," Psal. xliii. 3. Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee, Psal. cxix. 175. "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow," Psal. li. 7. "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with thy free Spirit," Psal. li. 12. Or, you may put some of the Spouse's petitions at this time, "Draw me, we will run after thee," Cant. i. 4. "Awake, O north wind, come thou south, blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits," Cant. iv. 16. "Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe or young hart upon the mountains of spices," Cant. viii. 14.

O communicant, thou art near to a crucified Christ when at the table, as the penitent thief was near to him when on the cross; he got mercy from Christ when he sought it, and so may you, if you seek it with the same frame of heart. Cry, Lord, look on a poor sinner at thy table, as thou didst on him that hung on the cross. "Lord, remember me, now thou art in thy kingdom." Thy wounds are open now; Lord, shelter me in them. Thy blood is running fresh: O bathe my diseased soul in this fountain, that I may be whole for ever. So much for the second head of directions. I now proceed to the third head.

CHAP. III.

CONCERNING A COMMUNICANT'S BEHAVIOUR, AFTER PARTAKING, AND WHEN THE COMMUNION SABBATH IS OVER.

IN discoursing this head, I propose to do these following things: 1. To give some directions concerning your deportment when rising and going from the Lord's table. 2. Concerning your carriage when you go home to your closets and retiring places. 3. Concerning your behaviour and conversation in the world when all the work is over.

SECT. I.—CONTAINING DIRECTIONS CONCERNING YOUR DEPORTMENT WHEN RISING AND GOING FROM THE LORD'S TABLE.

Believers are sometimes ready to say, "It is good for us to be here; let us build tabernacles, and dwell still." But this table, though it be satisfying, it is not lasting; though the meal be sweet, it is short. All things here below are transitory, and communions are passing things with the rest. You must rise and go down from the mount, and return to the world, and travel in the wilderness again. O may the believer say, "And must I rise, and go back to that unsatisfying and soul-starving world again? What shall I do there, if my Redeemer go not alongst with me; Lord, take me by the hand, lead me, uphold me, and be thou still with me; and at last bring me to that endless feast thou hast prepared for thy people above, where I may ever lie in thy bosom, under the interrupted beams of thy smiling and cheering countenance, and for ever feed my hungry soul on thy blessed self, without the help of symbols or sacraments, and where the guests will be never called to rise from that glorious table any more."

QUEST. What is that frame and disposition of soul that we should have in rising and going from the Lord's table?

ANS. With respect to that observe, the following directions:

You ought to rise and go from the table,

1. In a wondering and admiring frame. Continue to wonder at the love of God in giving his beloved Son to die a cursed death for us. Though he loved him most dearly, yet he wounded him most deeply, that his precious blood might stream forth and save us. Hence it is said, Isa. liii. 10, "It pleased the Lord to bruise him." Junius reads it, Valde delectatus est; i. e. He was exceedingly delighted in it. Strange! other parents, whose love to their children is nothing in comparison of the Father's love to Christ, follow their children to their graves with many tears, especially when they die violent deaths:

but the infinite God delighteth in the painful and bloody death of his only Son, because it tended to the salvation of believers: he willingly gave his own dear Son, to die a shameful cursed death, that you might live a glorious blessed life for ever. O what manner of love is this! And what art thou, O believer, that thou shouldst be the object of this love more than others? By nature thou art mean as the worm, vile as the mire, black as hell, and a child of wrath even as others: and thou hadst now been wallowing in sin, with the worst of the world, if free grace had not renewed thee; nay, thou hadst been roaring in hell at this hour, if free grace had not reprieved thee. Look about thee, and see others refused, when thou art chosen; others polluted, when thou art sanctified; others put off with common gifts, when thou hast special graces. Though you and they perhaps sat together in the same desk hearing the word, or at the same table receiving the sacrament, yet free grace came and made the difference: "One is taken, and the other left." Here is matter for your admiration.

The consideration of this free love and distinguishing mercy of God should make thee say with David, "Lord, what am I, and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? What is man, that thou art mindful of him? And what am I, the worst of men, that thou shouldst be thus mindful of me?" O how did Mephibosheth admire David's kindness, when he spake familiarly with him, and said, "Thou shalt eat bread at my table continually!" 2 Sam. ix. 7. Observe his answer, ver. 8, "What is thy servant, that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?" But surely, O believer, thou hast much more reason to say so, and wonder that such a mean creature should be set at the table of the great God, and honoured to feast with himself. Lord, what am I, that thou shouldst have noticed the like of me? Better deserved I to be howling among the dogs without the door, than to be let in and feasted among thy friends; I better deserved to have been roaring in hell with devils, than to be set at thy table to rejoice with thy children. Lord, when thou wast pleased to look on me with an eye of pity, and embrace me in the arms of thy tender mercy; thou mightest have spurned my guilty soul into hell, saying, "Depart from me, I know you not." What a wonder of mercy is it, that I, who have forfeited all mercies, and deserved such a sentence as that in Jer. ix. 15, to be fed with wormwood, and to have water of gall to drink, should nevertheless have the flesh of the Son of God given me to be my meat, and his blood to be my drink! The Lord Jesus might justly have said unto me, as in Zech. xi. 9, "I will not feed you: that which dieth, let it die; and that which is to be cut off, let it be cut off." But O, how tender are his bowels, how compassionate his heart! Rather than my soul should starve, he is content to be slain that his flesh might become my food.

II. Rise and go from the table in a thankful and praising frame. Thankfulness well becomes this eucharistical feast, which is mainly designed as a thanksgiving to God for redeeming love. On this occasion you ought to "bless God in the congregation, even the Lord from the fountain of Israel," Psal. lxxviii. 26. Now, you should stir up your souls, and all that is within you, to bless his holy name, with the psalmist, Psal. ciii. 1—3, Now you should with the angels sing, "Glory to God in the highest, that there is on earth peace, and good-will towards men," Luke ii. 14. Now you should with John, sing praise to him that "loved us, and washed us from our sins in his blood," Rev. i. 15.

O may the worthy communicant say, how shall I mention the loving-kindness, and praises of the Lord, according to the multitude of his loving-kindnesses, and according to all he hath bestowed on me, and his great goodness to the house of Israel! O that I could proclaim thy love to all the world, and make the whole earth ring with thy praises! O that I could sing praises to him that loved me: to him that made the world, and furnished it so richly for me to dwell in: to him that made my body so wonderfully, and gave me a soul so capable to serve and enjoy him: to him that remembered me in my low estate, and laid aside his glory, took on my nature, and paid my debt on the cross: to him that sent his Spirit to quicken me when dead in my sins, that opened mine eyes, bowed my will, and turned me from darkness to light: to him who forgives my iniquities, heals my diseases, redeems my life from destruction, and crowns me with loving-kindness: to him that hath endured for me many slights, put up with many affronts, and waited on me with infinite patience; even "to him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests to God his Father," a note the angels themselves cannot sing; "and to him that is able to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, be glory, majesty, and dominion, now and for evermore! O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever. Who can utter the mighty acts of the Lord? Who can show forth all his praise? Now blessed be his glorious name for ever: let the whole earth be filled with his glory."

And, O believer, remember that you only begin this duty of singing praise in this world, for eternity itself will not end it: endless eternity will be short enough for this glorious work of praise. You ought to be acquainting yourself much with this work while here, that you be not a stranger to it hereafter. Resolve with David not only to begin it, but to persist and hold on in it also; Psal. cxlv. 2, "Every day will I bless thee, and I will praise thy name for ever and ever;" as if he had said, I will begin it now, and do it every day while here, in hopes that I will spend a whole eternity in it hereafter. Again he says, Psal. cxlvi. 2, "While I live I will praise the Lord; I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being." And when I have no longer being on earth, I hope to have a being in heaven, where I shall praise him to better purpose; and wherein, Lord, I am deficient now in thy due praise, I will pay it hereafter in everlasting Hallelujahs. O communicant, hast thou not great ground to praise this day, that thou livest not among the dark pagans that never heard tell of Jesus Christ? That thou art not among the fallen angels, for whom a sacrifice was never provided? That thou art not among the damned in hell, who are without the reach of mercy, and of hearing the joyful sound? You have been set at a full table, when others suffer an everlasting famine. And what will you render to the Lord for this distinguishing love and undeserved goodness? I have good ground to caution you against unthankfulness, as Moses did the Israelites upon the view of their entry into Canaan, Deut. viii. 10, 11, "When you have eaten and are full, forget not to bless God for the good land that he hath given you;" that you have a Goshen on earth, and the prospect of a Canaan above: bless him for a land of light that you dwell in, and for the rich table that he covers for you: bless God for a sacrament day, for it is one of the days of heaven; it is a day you ought highly to prize, and to praise God for. They that know the worth of this day could wish, with Joshua, that the sun stood still upon it, that it might be lengthened out, for their enjoying communion with God: but in a special manner they would wish that the Sun of righteousness stood still this day and shined, that, with Joshua, they might get a more full revenge on their enemies; viz. their lusts, these cursed Canaanites that remain still in the land.

III. You ought to go from this table in the eunuch's frame, who, after his sealing a covenant with God, went on his way rejoicing, Acts viii. 39. God's people are frequently in scripture called to "rejoice and be glad in the Lord;" and to be sure there is not a more fit season for it than now, when he hath been making such a glorious discovery of that great love wherewith he loved them. A man that is condemned for a crime, and ready to be executed, O what joy hath he when he receives his pardon! And should not believers rejoice in God, who here receive the atonement, and are, as it were, brought again from the gibbet by the mercy of God in Christ?

There are two things you ought to rejoice in; 1. In God. 2. In his ways.

As to the first, it is the duty of a covenanted people to rejoice in their covenanted God. With what joy doth Zaccheus entertain Christ, when he closed a bargain with him! Luke xix. 6; and likewise the jailor, Acts xvi. 34. And to be sure, whenever the babe of the new man is formed in the soul, it will leap for joy. It is most reasonable that Christ should have a joyful welcome into the soul. God not only commands and presses this joy, as in Psal. v. 11; Joel ii. 23; Phil. iii. 1; iv. 4, but he affords the greatest grounds for it. God the Father gives himself to us as a portion; his Son to be our Saviour; his well ordered covenant as a never-failing spirit of consolation; his Holy Spirit to be our comforter: his influences to blow up this holy flame of joy; his graces of faith, hope, and love, to breed and feed it; his ordinances to maintain and increase it; and particularly the Lord's supper is a spiritual feast instituted for cheering the soul: for after it, we see that Christ and his disciples sung a hymn.

What ground of joy have believers in their covenanted Redeemer, in his love, in his victories, and in his purchase? What ground of joy in his person and natures? In God incarnate they may see heaven and earth conjoined, God and human nature eternally married together, and themselves very nearly related to God. O believer, he is "bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh, and has a fellow-feeling of your infirmities;" and is not this matter of joy?

What ground of joy have you in the attributes of God, which are all engaged for you, and become yours by covenant? The thoughts of God may be sweet to you as to the psalmist, Psal. civ. 34. The thoughts of God are a terror to the wicked, but every one of his attributes may be a cordial to you, yea, even the most terrible of them: his justice, that before stood with a flaming sword to keep you out of paradise, doth now turn an advocate to plead for your happiness, 1 John i. 9. Justice is come over to your side, and pleads for your pardon and discharge, since Christ your surety hath paid the debt: and for the crown of glory to you, since he hath laid down the price.

His goodness and mercy afford you great matter of joy: why? for, as he is good, so he doth good, and will let his people want nothing that is good for them; he will hear their cry, pity them in danger, and be a strong hold to them in the day of trouble. And when you meet with mercies and comforts, you may receive them as tokens of his special love; they come to you wrapt up in the bowels of Christ, and dipt in his blood, and so are doubly sweet. When you get a deliverance from any distress, you may say as Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 17, "Thou hast, in love to my soul, delivered it from the pit of corruption." O believer, all thy mercies are covenanted to thee, which may make them sweet to thy taste; that word in Eccl. ix. 7. belongs to thee, "go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works." Every morsel of bread thou eatest comes from thy Father's hand, sweetened in the blood of Christ, and is an earnest of greater and better things laid up for thee.

God's wisdom and faithfulness may rejoice thy heart. He is a skilful physician, he ponders our case, weighs our necessity, and knows how to prescribe sometimes bitter potions, and sometimes cheering cordials: he knows how to time our blessings and our crosses also. O covenanted soul, it may be sweet to thee to think that all thy afflictions, as well as mercies, are the fruits of infinite wisdom and faithfulness: yea, thy being within the covenant, alters the nature and property of thy crosses, and makes them become good and medicinal to thee; thou art now to look on them as mercies covenanted and promised to thee. "When his children transgress, he will visit them with the rod. In faithfulness hast thou afflicted me, saith the psalmist." O what comfort may this bring thee, when thou considerest that all thy afflictions are an article of the covenant, the effect of God's love, and a fruit of Christ's purchase: so that you may say of every rod you meet with, The Lord sees I want this, otherwise I should not be exercised with it: my covenanted God and Father knows that this, and no less than this, is needful for me: what am I that he should be so mindful of me?

You may rejoice in the almightiness of God. He hath an arm that is full of power, that can easily level your spiritual Goliaths, pull down Satan's strong holds, and make good all his promises.

You may rejoice in his immutability. He is unchangeable in his love and in his covenant. Mutable creatures change their respects, and break their leagues and covenants: but God's covenant is indissoluble; for he is engaged for our part, as well as his own, Jer. xxxii. 40, "O believer, God hath promised both for himself and thee:" as you may further see in Heb. xiii. 5, compared with Jer. xxx. 9, and 2 Tim. i. 12. If once in the covenant, thou art always in it; you may sing that sweet song, Psal. xlviii. 14, "For this God is our God, for ever and ever: he will be our guide even unto death;" yea, likewise in death, and over death. That which dissolves the marriage covenant among men, will not dissolve this: adultery will not do it; for God saith, "Though ye have played the harlot with many lovers, yet return unto me. Turn, ye backsliding children, for I am married unto you." Death cannot dissolve it; yea, it brings you nearer to your covenanted God, where you shall ever rejoice in his presence. Though death robs worldly men of their poor happiness, and hungry heaven, yet it doth no harm to you: nay, when you find death begin to assault your tabernacle of clay, you may "lift up your head with joy; for behold the day of your redemption draweth nigh." You may sing with the psalmist, Psal. lxxiii. 26, "My flesh and heart faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." What though my eye and my heart-strings be ready to break, and the lamp of my life be like a candle burned to the socket, and near the going out; yet still God is my God and portion for ever?

Thus Olevian, a dying saint, comforted himself: "My hearing is gone, my smelling is gone, and my sight is going: my speech and feeling are almost gone; but the loving-kindness of God shall never depart from me." When the worldling's portion is gone, yours remains sure to you: lose what you will, you cannot lose that. Good cause had Habakkuk to say, Hab. iii. 17, 18, "Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be on the vines, &c., yet I will rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation." O believer, the more you view your portion, you will find the more ground for your rejoicing therein: for in God you have all things you need; all things you can desire; yea, more than "eye hath seen, ear heard, or heart can conceive."

But, secondly, as you ought to go from this ordinance rejoicing in God, so likewise in the ways of God; and like Jehoshaphat, you ought to have your hearts lifted up in the ways of the Lord. Put on holy resolutions to proceed with zeal, delight, and alacrity in the way of God's commandments: your hearts should now be enlarged to run and sing in his ways, and go about every duty with pleasure. Stedfastly resist every sin, and especially the sin that hath most easily beset you, your predominant sin, your beloved idol: abhor both inward and outward sins; flee drunkenness, uncleanness, swearing, lying, cheating, Sabbath-breaking, &c. Make religion your main work, and make conscience of heart-holiness: study to live near Christ, make use of him and constantly depend on him for righteousness and strength. Study to perform the duties both of the first and second table: carefully observe family duties and secret prayer. In a word, go on cheerfully in the ways of piety and devotion, and especially in those duties wherein communion and correspondence with God is to be obtained and kept up. Go on joyfully in the ways of justice and honesty, meekness and peace, temperance and sobriety, charity and beneficence, humility and self-denial; and trust in your covenanted God for covenant strength and furniture for every good word and work.

IV. In going from the Lord's table, you ought to mix your joy and praises with a holy fear and trembling; and you have great cause for this, when you consider,

1. Your manifold shortcomings in this solemn approach to God. Surely your souls were not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary, your preparation was defective in the sight of God. Have you not cause to be ashamed that your hearts were not more deeply affected with the great sights presented to your view, and the glorious things put in your offer? Have you not ground to be humbled for the coldness of your hearts, the waverings of your minds, the deadness of your spirits, and carnality of your affections, when you was about this heavenly and spiritual work? Alas for the weakness of our graces, the inconstancy of our frames, and the manifold infirmities which cleave to our best performances! Had we no more sin to answer for, but the iniquities of our holy things, they would be too heavy for us to bear. Let us be humbled under the sense of them, and look to our great High-priest to make atonement for them.

2. You have cause to be humbled and fear, considering the manifold dangers you are exposed to, and enemies you are environed with, who are never more busy than after a sacrament, and our being admitted to nearness with God. Christ, immediately after his baptism, and the solemn manifestation he had from heaven, was led away to be tempted of the devil, Matt. iv. 1. And it was after the Lord's supper that Christ told his disciples, that "Satan desired to have them, that he might sift them as wheat," Luke xxii. 31. It was after Paul was wrapped up to the third heaven, that he was in hazard of being exalted above measure, or puffed up with pride, and therefore had a messenger of Satan sent to buffet him, 2 Cor. xii. Have you got any thing of the riches of Christ, and the treasures of heaven, at this ordinance? Then look well to yourselves that you lose it not, for the devil is going about seeking to rob you thereof: therefore be not lifted up or secure, but be humble and watchful, and walk circumspectly.

SECT. II.—CONTAINING DIRECTIONS HOW TO BEHAVE WHEN YOU GO HOME TO YOUR CLOSETS AND RETIRING PLACES.

Think not your work over on a communion Sabbath, when you are come home from the church: but as soon as possible retire.

I. For prayer. You should be more bent upon prayer now than ever. The Psalmist, when God had dealt kindly with him, resolves therefore that he will call upon God as long as he lived, Psal.

exvi. 2. This is a strange return he would give God for former favours: he would go and beg new favours from him, and lie the more closely about his hand; I will love God, and love prayer the better all my days. This is not the manner of men, but God is delighted with such a return.

QUEST. But what shall we pray for now? Can God give more than what he hath given us in the sacrament?

Ans. Though God hath here given you the seal of the covenant, and a right to all its privileges and promises; yet he will be inquired of by you for the particular application and accomplishment of them: you must put God to his word, and pray with the psalmist, Psal. cxix. 49, "Remember the word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope. Be it to thy servant according to thy word." Again, you should pray that God may continue and preserve any good frame or tenderness of heart, spiritual motions and resolutions, or any warmness of affections and desires that have been wrought in you by this ordinance; for our hearts are ready to cool, and our goodness to vanish "like the morning clouds and the early dew:" you have need therefore to pray with David, 1 Chron. xxix. 18, "Lord, keep this for ever in the imagination of the thoughts of my heart:" and, Psal. lxxviii. 28, "Strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us." Your hearts are naturally deceitful, and your feet bent to backsliding; pray as in Psal. xvii. 5, "Held up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not." You have no strength in yourselves to keep the promises, and perform the vows to the Lord which you have made: therefore beg from your covenanted God, that he may furnish you for every good word and work; for "it is he that worketh in you both to will and to do."

II. Self-examination is a duty most necessary on the back of this solemn ordinance, as well as before it. Review your carriage at it, so that you may be humbled for defects, or thankful for attainments; cast up your accounts, and see what you have gained at this gospel-market. Will you not be as wise for your souls, as you are for your bodies? Were you at a market trading for the things of this world, you would take this course after you had come from it: but O "what will it profit you, though you should gain the whole world, if you should lose your souls?"

There are two things you should carefully search into when you come home from the Lord's table: 1. If you had sincerity in covenanting with God. 2. If you had his gracious presence with you in this ordinance.

QUEST. 1. How shall I know if I have sincerely transacted with God at his table, and if he hath taken me into the bond of his covenant?

Ans. 1. It is of great consequence for you to know this; for it is not every one that externally receiveth the seal of God's covenant, that is really taken into the bond of it: many thousands deceive themselves in this matter. You may discover your sincerity in covenanting, by reviewing the frame and condition your souls were in when you were about it, and by considering the frame and disposition they are in now.

I. "What was the frame of your souls when you were transacting with God?"

1. Were you low and vile in your own eyes, and deeply humbled under a sense of your own unworthiness and ill-deserving; so that you were made to say with the centurion, from the bottom of your heart, "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof; I have lived all my days in rebellion against thee; the bottomless pit is my due?" Then this is a good sign of thy being brought within the covenant, according to Ezek. xvi. 62, 63.

2. Were you weary of the burden of sin? Did you groan under it as a heavy load? Were you sensible that it was "too heavy for you to bear?" as the psalmist was, Psal. xxxviii. 3. Then it is a good sign; for it is to such that Christ affords rest in his covenant.

3. Did your souls long and pant for Christ, as the hunted hart for the water-brooks, the scorched ground for a refreshing shower, or a condemned man for a remission? Was it your cry, "None but Christ, give me Christ, or else I die: Lord Jesus, here is a poor beggar for thy bounty, a diseased Lazarus for thy cure, an empty belly for thee to fill, a naked back for thee to cover: never was there a soul that stood more in need of thee than I." Then this is a good token: for, wherever there is true faith, it empties the soul, discovers want and misery in ourselves, and great fullness in Christ. Faith comes with an empty vessel to Christ's open fountain, it comes with an open mouth to his full feast, and with an empty hand to his rich treasure.

4. Were you in a resigning frame when you took the seal of the covenant into your hand? For faith, as it embraces and lays hold on Christ, so it delivers up the soul to Christ; and as it takes Christ wholly, so it gives up the soul wholly to him. Did you give all you are, and all you have, your children, relations, honours, estates, interests, time, talents, health, strength, and all to Christ, to be disposed of, and employed by him, according to his pleasure? Then this is a good mark of thy sincerity.

5. Were you in a renouncing frame, willing to part with every lust, and put a bill of divorce in the hands of every Delilah or beloved idol? Then it is a good sign; for every sincere soul will say, at such a time, Ephraim, "What have I to do any more with idols?"

II. Consider the frame and disposition of your souls since you came from the Lord's table; for you may find out your sincerity hereby.

1. Ask your souls that question, which Christ himself once asked the Pharisees, Matt. xxii. 42, "What think ye of Christ?" Covenanted souls, to be sure, will have a very high opinion of him; for "to all who believe he is precious." Can you say, then, that you have high and admiring thoughts of Christ, and that you wonder at his beauty: once I was at peace without Christ, but now I see nothing but fire and wrath out of him: once I saw little beauty in him, and said, as the daughters of Jerusalem said to his spouse, "What is thy beloved more than another beloved?" But now I see him altogether lovely: yea, I see not only a matchless beauty in his person, but also in his way, his word, his ordinances, his people; nay, in his very cross, and every thing that belongs to him.

2. All covenanted souls will be mightily pleased with the contrivance, frame, and design of the covenant; they will say, "It is well ordered in all things:" they will be satisfied with all the articles of it, and with all the offices and relations of Christ; they will be content to be governed by his laws, as well as to be justified by his righteousness. All they who have entered into a marriage-covenant with Christ will look to his person more than to his patrimony, and they will embrace his precepts as well as his promises. Try, therefore, if it be so with you. Are you pleased with the design of the covenant, viz. to exalt free grace? Would you have Christ all and yourselves nothing? Would you be content with heaven, though it were for no more than to stand an eternal monument of free grace, and that you might, with others, join in your note to glorify and exalt it? Do you love still to cry, "not unto us, not unto us, but to Christ be the glory?" Then this is a good sign you are within the bond of this covenant.

3. Have you heart-melting thoughts at the remembrance of Christ's wounds? Are you sensibly touched for your sins that pierced him, resolved, through his grace, to pierce him no more, and that you will never give any harbour to those traitors that put to death the Son of God? Then it is a sign you have eyed him by faith at his table, and taken hold of his covenant.

4. If you be his covenanted friends, you will resolve to obey every commanded duty, John xv. 14. And remember this, ye will resolve to perform covenanted-duties in a covenant-way, in a gospel method; i. e., ye will do all out of love and gratitude to your benefactor and Redeemer; ye will do all to glorify him; ye will go out of yourselves even to Christ for strength, and depend on him for all.

QUEST. 2. How shall I know if I have met with Christ at his table, and enjoyed any thing of his gracious presence there?

Ans. Christ hath many ways of visiting his people, and holding communion with them; and though he hath not done it in the way you were expecting, do not conclude that he hath not done it at all.

1. He sometimes draws near his people in this ordinance, by bringing light to their understandings and making gracious discoveries to their souls. Sometimes he discovers to us his greatness and purity, so as to humble us to the dust, and make us seem nothing in our own eyes, and confess we are the vilest of sinners, and wonder that we are out of the pit: so was it with these holy men, Job xl. 4: Isa. vi. 3.—Sometimes he discovers his goodness and mercy, in giving his Son to die for such wretches, and offering pardon to such rebels: and thereby he sheds abroad his love into our hearts, and melts them in tears, confessions, and thankful resentments of his love, as in Luke vi. 44; 1 Tim. i. 16.—Sometimes he discovers Christ to be altogether lovely, sin to be altogether vile, the world to be altogether vain, holiness to be altogether necessary, and heaven to be altogether glorious.

2. He kindly visits his people, when he draws out their graces to a lively exercise, and particularly sends his quickening Spirit to melt their hearts into the exercise of repentance and mourning for sin, or to sharpen their faith, and enable them to lean on Christ for pardon and salvation, and say with that poor man, "Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief:"—Or when he kindles love in the heart, and makes it burn while he talks to them, and opens the scriptures, as he did to the two disciples going to Emmaus; or help you to say with Peter, "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee:"—Or when he draws out the desires, longings, and pantings of the soul after himself, and makes us thirst after him. Hence we see what a mistake many are in, who think there is no communion with Christ but by sensible consolations and manifestations of his love: for where there is a holy shame, grief, and sorrow, wrought in the soul for sin, it is as real an evidence of his gracious presence, as when the soul is affectionately melted into love, praises, and joy. Though Christ come not to you by the higher way yet be thankful if he come in the lower way.

3. Christ holds communion with his people in this ordinance, by strengthening them for duty, and making them delight in his service, and count it their meat and drink to do his will, and reckon "one day in his courts worth a thousand elsewhere."

4. When he intimates his special love and favour to their souls, which he doth in many ways, by dissolving their doubts and fears, scattering their clouds, shining on their graces, and clearing up their evidences; or whispering by his Spirit into their consciences, "Fear not, I am your salvation: be of good cheer, all your sins are forgiven you: the Lord hath put away thy sins, thou shalt not die." It is by this way the Lord sometimes brings his people into the banqueting-house, satisfies them, as with marrow and fatness, makes them to hear the voice of joy and gladness, fills them with peace that passes understanding, with joy that is unspeakable and full of glory. It is thus that he kisses them with the kisses of his mouth, i. e., applies the comforts of his promises, which are the sweet words of his mouth, yea, sweeter to them than honey or the honey comb: it is here that he makes them to drink of the rivers of his pleasures, brings them to his holy mountain; and makes them joyful in his house of prayer: it is here he "brings them out of the miry clay, sets their feet upon a rock, establishes their goings, and puts a new song in their mouth, even praises to our God."

It might be proper in this place to speak to the cases of several sorts of communicants: but having done this pretty fully in my Sacramental Catechism, I shall here speak only to two sorts.

I. Those who, after secret self-examination, and reviewing of their communicating, are put to complain that they do not find any comfort or spiritual advantage by the solemn ordinance of which they have been partaking.

II. Those who cannot but acknowledge, to the praise of free grace, that they have been kindly dealt with, and privileged with special manifestations of God's love and favour at this holy ordinance.

First, As to the first sort of communicants.

There are sometimes found not a few of God's people who, on the back of their communicating, are in a desolate condition. "O," saith one, "I have examined myself since I came from the Lord's table, and reviewed my communicating; and I fear I have not met with Christ there, nor got any comfort or spiritual advantage by the ordination. I think God is angry with me; and what shall I do?"

Ans. 1. Granting it be so that thou hast got no benefit by this ordinance, beware of laying the blame in the least upon the Master of the feast, who is a bountiful Lord, and delights in mercy; but leave your complaint entirely upon yourself, and search for the cause of your disappointment in yourself. And it is likely, upon due search, you will find, that either you have been slight in your preparations for the duty: your appetite hath not been sharpened with a sense of spiritual wants; you have not been watchful over your heart, either before, in time of, or after communating; or perhaps you have gone about this work too much in your own strength, without looking to God for strength and quickening in the gospel method. Jacob told his wives, Gen. xxxi., "I see your father's countenance, it is not toward me as before." Now what was the reason of it? "Jacob (say Laban's sons) hath taken away all that was our father's," he hath enhanced his riches. Well, hast thou dealt thus with thy heavenly Father? Hast thou robbed him of his glory in any measure by thy self-confidence? Then it is no wonder that his countenance was not so pleasant toward thee as at other times. Be humble then for your defects and short-comings: and say, "Lord, thou art righteous, but I am wicked."

2. God may hide his face from his people at the sacrament, either for their trial, or for their spiritual improvement and advantage. He may hereby try you how you will behave under such a dispensation; if you will love him and cleave to him, even when he hides himself, or frowns upon you. Do not despond, O believer, though God appear to frown, or to speak bitter things against you; but cleave still to him by faith, and bless his name that he is at all in speaking terms with you, and not wholly silent to you, as he is to many, upon whom he will not bestow a reproof, but gives them up to walk after the counsels of their own hearts. It is a great merey to have God rebuking us for our good.

But the Lord may be hiding himself, to raise in you the greater earnestness and fervency in seeking after him. Thus he dealt with the spouse, Cant. iii. 3. She was too lazy and careless in her inquiries for him, therefore he retires; and thereupon she rose from her sloth, and went through all the streets of the city in quest of him, saying, "Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? Tell him that I am sick of love." It were happy if your disappointment had the same effect on you, to make you rise and seek him more earnestly, and go further than you did before. The spouse went a little further, she went further than the watchmen, before she found him whom her soul loved; and so must you. You must go further than ministers, ordinances, or sacraments; go and look beyond all to Christ himself. Go also further in respect of diligence, sincerity, spirituality, and heart-holiness. Do as blind Bartimeus did, when he thought Christ was like to pass by him without noticing him, Luke xviii. 39, "He cried so much the more," q. d. Lord, pass not by me, allow me one word from thy blessed mouth, one crumb from thy gracious hand. O believer, do not limit God to the precise time of communicating, your feast may be yet to come; for the banqueting-house is not yet shut, though the communion-table be uncovered: therefore, lie still at the door, and cry so much the more, "Lord.

others are served, and not I: hast thou not one blessing for me, even for me, O my Father? Lord, I cannot depart without it; I must even die at thy threshold." Thus pray in faith, and wait in hope, and God will come in due time. "It is good that thy soul should both hope, and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord."

3. God's people do sometimes get gracious tokens of his bounty, and marks of his favour, when they are not well sensible of it; so that they have cause to say with Jacob at Bethel, Gen. xxviii. 16, "Surely God was in this place, and I knew it not." There may be real communion, when there is no sensible communion. The hearts of the two disciples going to Emmaus, burned with love to Christ, and Christ conversed with them, when yet they knew it not. Or they may sometimes reckon what they have got at the sacrament to be nothing, because they got not what they were expecting. They were perhaps expecting peace, comfort, or joy, which they have not found; and this makes them overlook any revivings and smokings of grace which now are begot in their hearts. Hast thou, O communicant, got a crumb of grace, do not undervalue it, though it be small, but be humble and thankful for it, for surely it is more than you deserve. It is not good manners for a stranger, when invited to a great man's table, to carve for himself; therefore be content with God's carving for you, and bless him he hath not sent you to the table of devils, and given you a portion with the damned.

Many are apt to think nothing is a feast, unless they get smiles from God, joy, peace, and sensible manifestations of his love; but there may be great bounty shown to us without these; particularly, if you have got any more sense of sin's evil, or concern for the hardness of your hearts; if you have got any higher esteem of Christ, and of the contrivance of salvation through his mediation; if you have any more hunger and thirst after Christ, any more love to holiness and the ways of Christ, any more desire after his presence in duties and ordinances, any more sense of your need of the fountain of his blood: then all these are gracious tokens of his bounty to your souls, for which you have cause to bless and magnify the Lord. We may enjoy the saving influences of the Spirit, when we do not feel his more abundant consolations. God may graciously accept of us, hold communion with us, and seal our pardon to us, though he do not testify it by giving in extraordinary joys. The truest communion with God is to enjoy communion with him in his graces, whereby our souls are made conformable unto God, and are stamped with his image. Well, if you have got any more grace, be thankful to God, though you have got no more comfort. Though you do not spring upward in joy, bless

God if you root yourselves more downward in humility. Though you do not enjoy much of God in the ordinances here, yet be thankful if you get your desires more enlarged after the full enjoyment of God above. The kindness of God must not be overlooked, nor the day of small things despised; but the least crumb of grace is to be noticed and received with thankfulness, and this is the way to get more.

We are not to judge of our profiting in duty, and of our gaining by ordinances, by our present feeling and receiving of sensible comforts: for the souls of God's people may be in a thriving state of grace, even when they are much cast down and sharply exercised. Let us then seriously reflect upon our communicating, and see if we can say that our hearts were single and sincere in the performance of the duty, and in our covenanting with God, and if we continue stedfast with God therein; this may administer ground of comfort to us, upon our after-reflection, though our souls were not lifted up with joy and comfort in the time of performance. God looks not so much to people's sudden fits of passion, or flashes of affection, as he doth to the bent and tendency of a sincere soul.

Let none then go from this ordinance with any harsh thoughts of Christ, or at all to give credit to these evil reports that Satan and our wicked hearts would bring up upon his good ways: but let us still love and praise him, and speak to the commendation of his grace and bounty whatever way he take in dealing with us. Though we should get no more from him, surely it is great matter of praise, if he continue to strive with us by his Spirit, when he lets others fall dead asleep; if he keep us waking and restless without him, when he suffers others to lie still in careless security; if he keep us still hoping and waiting in the way of duty, when others are sunk into the gulf of despair. Whoever they be that sincerely "trust in God's mercy, their hearts shall at last rejoice in his salvation," Psal. xiii. 5.

Secondly, As to the second sort of communicants before mentioned, namely, those of God's people, who cannot but acknowledge, to the praise of free grace, that they have been kindly dealt with at his table; they have been privileged with special manifestations of God's love and favour at this holy ordinance.

Well then, O believers, hath the Lord distinguished you from others at this occasion? Hath he taken you into his banqueting house, and dealt bountifully with your souls? Hath he feasted you with the goodness of his house, and allowed you his gracious presence, and the special intimations of his love? Then to be sure, you are under the highest obligations of love and gratitude to him: God looks for more at your hands than others, be careful to give him suitable returns, and improve what you have got to his glory. And, for that end, I shall give you the following advices.

I. Delight and solace yourselves in his presence; say, as in Psal. cxvi, "Return to thy rest, O my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee:" make Christ's love and favour the beloved centre of your soul. How much did Peter solace himself in that manifestation of Christ's love and glory he had on the mount of transfiguration? "It is good for us, said he, to be here, let us build three tabernacles, one for thee, one for Moses, and one for Elias." Not a word of building one for himself: he was so satisfied and delighted with the glory he saw in Christ, that he was content to lie without doors to behold it: neither cold nor rain could make him faint or weary.

II. Is Christ come into your soul? Take care to entertain him suitably, and attend him duly; wander not from his presence, but keep close by him, and follow hard after him, that you may be able to say with the Psalmist, "I am continually with thee; I will lie down with thoughts of him at night, and when I awake I will bestill with him." Beware of any thing that may be uneasy to him; it is a pity that such a blessed guest should meet with any disturbance, or be smoked out of the house by sin: O then lay a strict charge on all your lusts, corruptions, and worldly thoughts, to depart, that they "stir not up nor awake your beloved, till he please," according to Cant. ii. 7.

III. Earnestly entreat him to stay with you: say, "Lord, be not as a wayfaring man, that turns aside to lodge for a night, or a short time: but be thou my constant guest." And when he attempts to go away, strive to detain and hold him by prayer, as Abraham did Christ, Gen. xviii. 3, "My Lord, if now I have found favour in thy sight, pass not away from thy servant:" and with the two disciples going to Emmaus, Luke xxiv. 29, say, "Lord, abide with us; for it is towards evening, the day is far spent: and it is said, they constrained him, and he went to tarry with them." In like manner, plead with Christ, Lord it is towards night, and I know not what a black cloud is coming on me or the church; I need thy strengthening presence before hand: Lord, stay with me a while; I know not how far I may go, and what storms I may meet with, before I get another such meal.

IV. Set conscience to the watch-tower of thy soul, charge it to keep its post, and strictly examine all that go out, and all that come in, what thoughts go out from the heart, and what temptations are seeking to come in: and when lusts come knocking at the gate, seeking entrance into the heart, answer them according to that word, Ezek. xliv. 2, 3, "It is for the prince: the Lord God hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut;" it shall be patent to none but Christ. O it is sad when conscience falls asleep, suffers an enemy to come up to the gates, and enter into the city, without giving warning. Charge conscience then to watch, and give timely warning against every lust and temptation, against every declining of affections or backsliding of heart, and against every wrong or untender step that may blot your evidences or darken your sky; for though a believer cannot lose his salvation, yet he may lose the joy of his salvation, Psal. li., and be left to grope in the dark in a most uncomfortable state, without sun or stars appearing to him for many days.

V. Delight to think on Christ. "Let your meditation of him be sweet; remember him on your bed, and meditate on him in the night watches; let him lie as a bundle of myrrh all night betwixt your breasts," that is, in your heart. Carry him up and down in your thoughts all the day: mind what a view you get of Christ at his own table, think on what he has done and suffered; what a sea of wrath, what a sea of blood, a sea of tears, a sea of sufferings and sorrows he waded through to bring redemption and pardon to you. If we rightly considered what cost and pains Christ hath been at for us, we might wonder how he should be one whole hour together out of his people's minds: O what a shame is it to forget him! We see a worldly man doth not forget to think of his money, lands, buildings, and plantings, for a whole day or week to an end: but alas! we weary to think on precious Christ and heaven for an hour or two. O let us lament this plague, and beseech our blest Physician to cure it.

VI. The more you see of Christ and his beauty, be still desirous of further discoveries of it: if you have shared of this holy feast, you will find it both satisfies and begets an appetite. No doubt Moses was ravished with divine contemplations through the forty days he conversed with God in the mount; yet, after he comes down from it, he still longs for more, and cries, Exod. xxxiii. 18, "I beseech thee, show me thy glory." In like manner, thirst and pray for further discoveries of the King in his beauty.

VII. Take pleasure in commending Christ to others, and showing what a lovely Saviour and choice master he is: invite them to come, taste, and see that God is good. Let his name be sweet and savoury to you, delight in mentioning it. How sweet was his name to Paul? For in 1 Cor. i. and the first thirteen verses of that chapter, he mentions his name no less than twelve times: could never get enough of that sweet name Jesus, that rings with salvation: he sometimes there mentions it twice in one verse.

VIII. Remember that Satan envies you, and eyes you as a pirate doth a richly laden ship, and will do what he can, either to rob you of your treasure, or give you a troublesome voyage: you may expect trials on the back of this feast, and it may be from hands that ye would little expect; but resolve, whatever temptations come, or winds blow, that you will cleave to your Master, and never weary of his work and service: say to him as the Hebrew servant to his master, Deut. xv. 16, "I will not go away from thee, because I love thee and thine house, and because I am well with thee." I am sure, O believer, thou hast far better reason to say so than any else; there is no drudgery in Christ's service, you have the best master, the best work, and the best wages: have not you found him kind to you at this time? Will you ever forget it? You have at this time eaten plentifully of his bread. "O do not lift up the heel against him;" never betray him, nor give a wound to his interest any more.

IX. Be much concerned for his glory, and for the advancement of his kingdom. Pity those who are strangers to him, and pray for them; send portions to them for whom nothing is provided: pity others who have not got your length, and put in a word for them; pray for a crumb to them from that full table at which you have been feeding so plentifully.

X. Hath Christ been dealing more kindly with you than others? Then he expects you will do more for him than others, Matt. v. 47. He hath done singular things for you; see that you do singular things for him: carry as becomes his peculiar people. Be not content with common mercies, or such portions as bastards may have: be not content with common conversation; live not as the men of the world, whose hearts are set on things below, but live above the world, have your feet where other men's heads are. Show so much humility, mortification, patience, heavenliness, and charity in your walk, that the world may not only take notice that you have been with Jesus, but that you design to lodge and live eternally with Jesus. Live not according to common examples, but set Christ and his saints before you for patterns: and whatever others do about you, resolve to stand for Christ, though it were alone; say with Joshua, "As for me and my house we will serve our covenant God."

XI. Labour to keep still up a lively and spiritual frame of soul, and beware of losing what you have; be sensible that you are not able to maintain it more than to beget it: you have many enemies seeking to rob you of it; walk with a holy suspicion and jealousy, as a traveller, having much money about him, suspects every one he meets for a thief. Delight in Christian fellowship; one live coal helps both to kindle others and to keep them burning, Heb. x. 24, 25, "Let us consider one another, to provoke to love and good works. not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is, but exhorting one another." Again, be tender and circumspect in your walk; for a tender walk keeps up a tender frame. Beware of the cares of the world and earthly-mindedness; for if you thrust a knife into the earth, it blunts its edge. Frequent sacramental occasions, and those heart-warming ordinances which God appointed for your soul's advantage. Call your hearts frequently to account; say, "O my soul, how is it with thee now? Time was thou hadst a good frame, good motions and desires: what is become of you now? Such a chamber, such a place in the field, such a church or communion table, can witness the meltings of thy heart and flowings of thine affections towards Christ and things above: where are they now? But above all, be much in secret prayer, and in the exercise of faith on Christ the fountain of life: intrust your hearts and frames to his keeping, who is your great Friend and Surety; say believingly with the psalmist, "Lord, be surety for thy servant for good: into thy hands, O Lord, I commit my spirit; for thou hast redeemed me, O God of truth." Let thine everlasting arms be underneath me, and hold up my goings. Plead for the constant supplies of his Spirit, that he, who is as the dew to Israel, may afford oil to your chariot wheels, and wind to your empty sails. You have need to watch and pray, for Satan is still going about; this old crooked serpent can wind himself in at a very narrow hole; he hath many cold frosty winds to freeze up your affections, many deceitful charms to lull you asleep; you may sleep, but he never sleeps. O communicant, watch; for if he find you asleep, he will soon steal away the living child, and lay a dead one in its room: God save you from this dead sleep.

XII. Have you tasted of God's goodness at this occasion? Sit not down satisfied in what you have got; but let it excite in you earnest longings for heaven, where the full feast is. These are but the foretastes and first-fruits of the promised land, sent to wean your hearts from the world, and sharpen your desires after the Canaan that is above, where these first-fruits grow and are full ripe. A communion Sabbath is the likeliest thing we have in the world to that everlasting Sabbath that is above: but how small are the comforts of this lower table, if compared with the higher table? What is a sacrament feast here, to the marriage supper of the Lamb? What is drinking of the fruit of the vine here, to the drinking it new with Christ in his Father's kingdom, where the glorious heavens will be the room, and the heavenly host the attendants? Here we feed on Christ by symbols and sacraments, and have but bad appetites; but there they enjoy and see him as he is: here are many traitors and unworthy communicants, that thrust themselves in among the children; but there no Judas, no unfurnished guest can come, nor any thing that can impair the glory of that feast. What is the singing of psalms here, to the music of angels there? Had you been with the shepherds, Luke ii., and seen the angels, and heard the multitude of the heavenly host praising God, saying, "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good-will towards men," you would never have forgot that glorious sight and sound; but O that is little to what you shall see and hear above. The greatest manifestations of God here below are but a faint shadow of the beatific vision above. When Moses was talking a little with God in the mount, and saw his back parts from the clefts of the rock, it made his face so glorious that the people could not behold it without a veil: but O how will Moses' face and all about him shine now! It was little that he saw then, to what he sees now, and what we, if believers, will see ere long.

Peter was so transported on the mount with a sight of Christ's transfiguration, and Moses and Elias talking with him, that he was in an ecstasy of admiration, and said, "Master, it is good for us to be here, let us build tabernacles," q. d. Let us dwell still here, and not go down to yon vain empty world again; here is better company and purer delights. But O how much more is Peter ravished with wonder now! This was but a small part of that glory which Peter and the saints above see there.

O believers, you ought in a communion day to get up to the mount of meditation, as Moses did to the mount Nebo, and view this promised land; and as ye see it, you ought to long for it, and also "rejoice in hope of the glory of God," and say, "O shall I ere long join with that one hundred and forty-four thousand that follow the Lamb? Shall I bear a part in that heavenly concert? Shall all tears be wiped from my eyes? Shall my poor dying body be turned into a glorious star? Shall I be for ever with the Lord, and drink of the rivers of pleasure that run clear as crystal alongst the banks of eternity, and whose streams make glad the city of God? And shall not my heart leap for joy at the prospect of it? The night is far spent, and the day is at hand, the sun is at the rising; and will not a believer rejoice in hope of it?"

The wise men, when they but saw the star that pointed out where Christ was, yet it is said, "They rejoiced with exceeding great joy," Matt. ii. 10. But, O believing communicant, thou wilt shortly see the Star of Jacob, namely, Christ himself, who is the "bright morning star," shining in his glory; and will not that cause far more joy to thee? If the disciples returned from the sepulchro with great joy, when they but got the news that Christ was risen from the dead; what joy will it be to thee, to see him raised and reigning in his glory, and thyself raised from the grave to reign eternally with him?

Well then, let a communion day, and the comforts of it, put thee in mind of that happy state, and raise suitable desires and affections in thee towards it, and make thee long and say, "Lord, these joys are too great to enter into me now; O make me fit to enter into them!"

Lastly, As far as time and strength can allow, the evening of a communion Sabbath should be spent in secret and family duties. I acknowledge our frail bodies may be much fatigued by our long attendance, intenseness, and abstinence this day: but O if we could say this evening (and particularly ministers and elders, who had greater work this day upon their hands than others) that though we may be weary with our work, yet we are not weary of this work; for it is Christ's work, which is both pleasant and profitable, and carries its own reward in its bosom!

And since your bodies must be refreshed this night, and you must entertain some fellowship with others, there ought to be a more divine and heavenly air upon your conversations at this time than ordinary: let your carriage and discourse be such as becomes those who have been on the mount this day with God, that others may take notice of you, that you have been with Jesus.

When you see the table covered this night, or supper set upon it, you may think or say, "Now I am come from a communion-table to a common-table; from tasting of upper-springs, to share of the nether-springs; from feeding on manna, to eat the bread that perisheth: how great is the change of my fare! Lord, let not this table be a snare to me, nor in any way tend to divert my mind either from the sweet table I have been at, or that blest table above I would be at." We may likewise take occasion to admire the infinite bounty and goodness of God to both our souls and bodies: O what pains and cost he is at with us! At our common table we see his beast killed to maintain the life of our bodies, and at the communion-table we have seen his dear Son slain to preserve the life of our souls.

In the last place, keep a watchful eye upon all your thoughts and words this night; look well to the frames of your souls. Hath God shed abroad his love this day in your hearts? keep yourselves in the love of God. Lie down this night with sweet thoughts of Christ, fervently praying for a rich blessing upon the day's work, and for his gracious presence on the morrow, that the last day of the feast may be the greatest and sweetest.

SECT. III.—CONTAINING DIRECTIONS TO ALL COMMUNICANTS IN GENERAL, CONCERNING THEIR AFTER CONVERSATION IN THE WORLD.

Remember you have been covenanting with God, and taking solemn vows on yourselves at the Lord's table; see that your conversation be suitable hereunto. You have been admitted to great honours and special privileges: see then that ye show your thankfulness to God, the author of your mercies, by the love of your hearts, the praises of your lips, and exemplariness of your lives. But more particularly, observe these following Directions,

I. "Study to be true and faithful soldiers to your General, whose colours you have solemnly sworn to?"

You have come under a sacramental oath to God; see that you keep it sacred and inviolable. The psalmist gives it as a mark of a man that will go to heaven, Psal. xv., that he keeps his oaths and promises, even though it should be to his hurt and prejudice. How much more, then, should a man be careful to keep his oaths and engagements he comes under to God in the sacrament, when it is greatly for his good and advantage so to do? O communicant, be faithful to the Captain of your salvation, abide by his standard, desert him not in the day of battle, go not over to his enemies' camp. Remember what he hath done and suffered for you, and let the love of Christ constrain you to abide with him. Plutarch tells us of the soldiers of Pompey, that when he could not keep them in the camp by any persuasion, yet when Pompey threw himself on the ground, saying, If ye will go, ye shall trample on your general; it is said, they were overcome and persuaded to stay. So your general, Christ, when in the garden, threw himself on the ground, wrestling in an agony, to save you from sin, and stop your career to hell. O then do not trample on your general, but stop your self-destroying course, and abide with your Saviour. We read, 2 Sam. xx. 12., that David's soldiers were marching very fast, when they saw the dead body of Amasa lying in the way, (viz. the general wallowing in blood) they stopped their march and stood still. O communicant, though formerly thou hast been marching furiously in the ways of sin, yet when thou seest the mangled, wounded, pierced, and crucified body of thy Saviour before thee, thou shouldst stop thy course, and proceed no further. O do not trample on thy wounded General, do not despise his bleeding wounds, nor forget his dying love. Keep steadfastly your sacramental oath, and never act contrary to it. Beware of plotting against him, or corresponding with traitors. Let it never be heard, that any of Christ's sworn soldiers shall either desert or betray their renowned General. If you would be faithful soldiers to Christ your General, then carefully obey his orders, courageously adhere to his interest, valiantly fight for his cause, and manfully resist his enemies, and abide by his standard to the very last. "Be thou faithful to the death, and thou shalt get the crown of life," Rev. ii. 10.

II. "Study to be active and diligent in a course of new obedience, after the sacrament."

You should now walk circumspectly, be more humble and pious towards God, more just and righteous towards man, and more sober and temperate towards yourselves. Have a sincere respect to every commanded duty: keep the sabbath more exactly, hear more attentively, pray more fervently, meditate more frequently, and see to watch over your hearts, your words, and your ways more diligently, that so you may please God, walk worthy of Christ, walk worthy of the covenant, of the sacrament, of the kingdom, of the gospel and grace of God. Let your present deportment be answerable to your future preferment; and see that there be some proportion betwixt your privileges and your duties.

It should be with a man after his communion with God in the sacrament, as it was with Jacob after his communion with God in Bethel, Gen. xxix. 1, "Then Jacob lifted up his feet, (as it is in the original) and came into the land of the people of the east." After Jacob had met with God, then he lifted up his feet, i. e., he went on his journey with strength, with spirit and cheerfulness. So after we have had fellowship with God in the sacrament, we should, in the strength of that meal, lift up our feet, and go on cheerfully and resolutely in our journey towards heaven. Nay, we should, like Jehoshaphat, not only have our hands and feet, but also our "hearts lifted up in the way of the Lord." We should now run his errand most cheerfully, sing in his ways, and serve him with alacrity. When God calls us to any duty, we should presently answer the first intimation of his will, "speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." O communicant, thou oughtest now to be swift to hear every one of God's calls; be like the psalmist, Psal. xxvii. 8, "When thou saidst, Seek ye my face; my heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek." Though before I have neglected to seek thee in public with others, and in private by myself, and been, alas, very negligent in the duties of thy worship; yet now I will begin to read the scriptures, praise thy name, and pray diligently, not only in society with others, but also by myself in secret, and do all these duties of holiness mine oath at the sacrament doth bind me unto. And see that you resolve and perform all these, leaning to the strength of your covenanted Redeemer.

III. "Abandon all your former known sins, and strictly guard against them after the sacrament."

Remember what Paul saith, Eph. iv. 28, "Let him that stole, steal no more," &c. In like manner, say I, Let him that profaned God's name, profane it no more; let him that lied, lie no more; let him that used to break the sabbath, be drunk, cheat, be unclean, &c. do so no more. Hath Christ been washing you in the laver of his blood? O do not go back to wallow in the mire. Did he speak peace to you at the table? O do not turn again to folly.

Let never that be charged upon communicants that was laid to Israel's charge of old, Exod. xxxii. 6, "The people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play." O will any sit down to eat and to drink at the Lord's table, and then rise up to play the wanton, play the prodigal, play the apostate, and join with the enemies of God. Surely, O communicant, if thou shouldst do so, thy sins will not be of any ordinary dye; they will be very heinously aggravated, and far more grievous and piercing to Jesus Christ than the sins of many others. David was not much troubled at Shimei's railing, but Absalom's rebellion pierced his very soul, 2 Sam. xvi. 11, "Behold my son, which came forth of my bowels, seeking my life." So may Christ say, The sins of the wicked are no surprising thing, but the sins of communicants are very piercing: "He that did eat bread with me, hath lift up his heel against me." Psal. xli. 9.

O believer, hath Christ delivered thee from sin and Satan, hell and wrath, and wilt thou rebel against thy deliverer? O wilt thou thus requite the Lord for his marvellous loving-kindness! Mayest thou not say with the Jews, after their return from the Babylonish captivity, Ezra ix. 13, 14, "After such a deliverance as this, should I again break thy commandments, wouldst thou not be angry with me, till thou hadst consumed me?" If I should again join with the wicked, and return to my old sins, O what a dreadful place in hell might I look for?

IV. "Keep a watchful eye and a strong guard against the temptations of Satan, upon the back of a sacrament."

Satan is never more busy nor more violent to tempt and draw men to sin, than when they are new come from the Lord's table: why? He is exceedingly malicious, and hellish in his enmity against souls; and he knows, if he can draw them into sin upon the back of such a near approach to God, it is the way to make their sins out of measure sinful before God, and exceedingly to widen the breach between God and their souls. Look how Sennacherib dealt with Hezekiah after he had reformed the church, settled the worship of God, and put all in good order, 2 Chron. xxxi.

1. There it is said, "After these things and the establishment thereof, Sennacherib king of Assyria came and entered into Judah, and encamped against the fenced cities, and thought to win them for himself." In like manner doth Satan deal with communicants, after they have been at the sacrament, and have renewed their covenant with God and established their resolutions against the commission of sin, and for the performance of duty: after these things will the devil come with all his forces, and encamp against the fenced cities (the communicants' hearts), and seek to win them for himself. He hath an army of stratagems, wiles, devices, snares, and temptations, always at command; and lays many ambushments against the communicant: O what need have we to be on our guard after such a solemn ordinance, and to labour to foresee and prevent Satan's hellish designs against us! It were happy if we could say with the apostle, "We are not ignorant of his devices."

O communicant, when Satan comes to tempt thee to sin after the sacrament, say, What! wouldst thou have me perjured before God? Shall I, who have been at God's table, and have ate and drunk with him, lift up my heel against him? Shall I take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? Shall I defile that body wherein he hath chosen to reside? Shall I force him out of his habitation by any impurity, or offend him by entertaining nauseous thoughts, or the vile suggestions of that unclean spirit? Shall these hands, that have received the sacred elements, work deceit? Shall these eyes, that have been filled with tears at the Lord's table, be filled with lust or envy? Shall the mouth, that hath drunk of the consecrated wine, be full of rotten discourse? Imitate Joseph; when tempted flee with haste out of temptation's way, and say, "How shall I do this wickedness, and sin against God?" Or say with the spouse, "I have washed my feet, how shall I defile them; I have washed my soul, how shall I pollute it with sin? I have taken on with Christ, and how shall I turn my back on so good a master? "Get thee behind me, Satan."

V. "Study that blessed art of improving and feeding on the sacrament, and a crucified Jesus represented therein, after you are gone from it."

We should not only feed on Christ while at the sacrament, but we should continue to feed on Christ, the master of this feast, when the communion table is removed. As the Israelites in the wilderness, they did not only drink of the rock when they were at it, but after they were removed and gone from it, they still continued to drink of it. But how could that be? The apostle tells us that the rock followed them, 1 Cor. x. 4, that is, the water that issued out of the rock followed them as they journeyed, in all these stages and removes. So when we are gone from the clefts of the rock that were streaming to us in the sacrament, we should continue to make use of these streams, and share of the virtue and efficacy of this water of life, which follows us, and streams after us, all the while we are travelling in the wilderness of this world, till we come home to the heavenly Canaan. And as the streams of the rock not only followed, but also accompanied the Israelites, and run before them too; so we must have Christ with us, and depend on him in every step of our journey, and likewise have our eye still upon him as our guide and leader to heaven. O that we could learn the heavenly art of living by faith on the Son of God, by continued dependence on him, and making application to him for righteousness and strength; righteousness for removing our guilt, and justifying our persons before God; and strength for performing duties, conquering lusts, and bearing crosses! O that we could come with our daily sins and pollutions to a crucified Jesus, and make renewed and daily application of that blood we were bathing our souls with in the sacrament! May we still drink of the spiritual rock, and daily find the virtue, efficacy, and benefit of the sacrament, following and streaming after us while we are in the wilderness! May we constantly meditate on the love and death of our lovely Jesus, carry the print of the nails in our hearts, and continually bear about with us the dying of the Lord Jesus; that we may still look to him, draw nourishment from him, and walk on in the strength of the spiritual meal we have been receiving, till we come to perfection!

VI. "Endeavour to keep up the lively and lasting impression of the vows of God upon you."

Consider seriously the engagements you have come under at the sacrament: you have done like the people of Judah in Nehemiah's time, Neh. x. 29, who entered into a curse and an oath to walk in God's law, and to observe and do all the commandments of the Lord. It is a solemn oath, and a fearful imprecation you come under at the Lord's table, to be faithful subjects and servants to Christ: you swear allegiance to the King of heaven, over the broken body and shed blood of the Lamb of God: you imprecate upon yourselves, that a cup of wrath may be put in your hands, instead of the cup of the new testament, if you deal falsely with God in his covenant, which you here seal. Now, if you perjure yourselves, consider the hazard; you incur not only all the curses of God's law, but the sore vengeance of his gospel also: you not only draw down upon you the wrath of a just God, but likewise the wrath of a merciful Mediator: and whom have you to interpose for you, if he be against you?

O communicant, if thou shouldst like Samson break all these bands asunder, and venture to fetch that sacrifice away from the altar, which thou hadst tied to it with such strong cords of oaths, vows, and covenants; mayst thou not expect to bring fire from the altar along with it that will consume thee?

There are some who remember their vows no longer than the sacrament lasts: while they are at the Lord's table, they have perhaps some sense of their obligations to serve God and leave sin; but when they rise and depart from the table, the sense of their engagements departs from them. I have read of the Abyssines, that after the sacrament they think it not lawful for them to spit that day till the setting of the sun. This is superstition in them; but yet their superstition will rise up in judgment against the profane carriage of many after the sacrament. Would they not spit that day? What shall we think of those who so soon forget their vows, that they do not stick to spit in Christ's face on that very day they eat his bread, by their loose and ungodly practices afterwards?

There are others not quite so gross, that will lay themselves under some restrictions for a day or two after the sacrament; but then, alas! they drop all their engagements, and return to their former sinful liberties. O! doth the sacramental covenant bind but for a day or two? Doth the efficacy of that solemn ordinance last no longer with you? Is not the bond thereof as strong on thy conscience the next month, or the next year, as the very day thou receivest? The sacrament of baptism is but once administered, and that in our infancy; and yet we own that the baptismal vow and covenant bindeth to the day of our death, though we should live an hundred years. Now, is it not the same covenant and vow we renew at the Lord's supper, which we make in baptism? Why then should not the bond in this sacrament be as binding and lasting as in the other?

O communicant, keep up always upon thy spirit a fresh sense of thy sacramental covenant; renew the impressions thereof every morning in thy secret retirements, and then thou wilt be in better ease to beat off all temptations to apostacy through the day. Say still to temptations, Tempt me not from my allegiance and fidelity: the vows of God are upon me, sealed at the sacrament, and recorded in heaven: not one of my fellow-communicants but will be witnesses for God, that they saw me personally and publicly own and renew my covenant with him: wherefore, for my oath's sake, and those that sat with me, I will not do this evil, and sin against God. Shall I alienate and pollute the heart so solemnly devoted to God? Shall I make light of my oath, turn disloyal to my King, and false to my God? Shall

I ever be so ingrate or perfidious, as forget his kindness to me, or my vows to him? Shall he escape that doth such things? or shall he break the covenant and be delivered?

Thou hast great need to pray that God may fix the lasting impression of thy vows upon thy heart, for it is naturally deceitful, prone to forget God, and gad after the vanities of time. Cry with the psalmist, Psal. exix. 36, 37, "Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not unto covetousness: turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity, and quicken thou me in thy way." Let me never be so eager upon the world, as to forget to retire to converse with my Saviour: let me never so perplex myself with worldly business, as to omit to pray, to meditate, to read, and sing due praises to my God. No, no; I will say to the world and all time's things, I am not at my own disposal: "I have sworn, and will perform, that I will keep God's righteous judgments." O how deeply am I obliged to him that has paid my debt! What shall I render unto the Lord? Lord, though I can do nothing that is satisfactory, let me do something gratulatory. Christ gave himself a sin-offering for me, let me give myself a thank-offering to him, let me offer up myself a living sacrifice to my Redeemer, who offered up himself a dying sacrifice for my redemption.

VII. "See that you crucify sin, after you have been seeing Christ crucified set forth before your eyes in the sacrament."

Hath sin been so cruel as to put to death the Son of God? See that henceforth you have no pity upon the murderer of Christ your Saviour. As Saul eyed David to kill him, so do you eye those traitors, your sins, from this day forward to kill and destroy them. Never correspond or parley with them any more; never entertain a favourable thought of them, nor give them a kind look again, seeing they have done so horrid and inexcusable a deed.

O communicant, hast thou seen Christ struggling to satisfy justice for sin, and save thee from it; and will you after all choose wilfully to walk in sin? Will you not burn the spear that pierced him, and break in pieces the nails that crucified him? Every one of Christ's wounds is a mouth opened to plead for your wounding and killing of sin. Had you seen Christ wrestling in the garden in his bloody agony, sweating great drops of blood, lying on the ground; had you heard him utter these words, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me:" had you seen his soul beset on all hands by your bloody sins, and even brought to a nonplus, John xii. 27, when he knew not (to speak with reverence) well what to say; had you seen him bound, led and nailed to the cross, with a black angry cloud upon his soul, crying out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Would you not have vowed a revenge upon sin? O could you have loved or hugged the soldier, or been fond of the spear that pierced his blessed side? Well, O communicant, this thou dost when thou huggest thy sins, and especially when thou entertainest thy predominant lust or darling sin; your other sins are as the nails in his hands and feet; but this as the spear that made a great wound in his side, and went nearer his heart than any of the rest.

O, never suffer sin to live any more in you, that would not suffer your Saviour to live in the world; never allow that a room in your heart, which would not allow him a room amongst the living on earth. O beware of crucifying Christ afresh. Never dispute any more, when a temptation is presented, whether Christ or Barabbas should be preferred; your lusts denied or Christ crucified: but presently cry out against your lusts, "Crucify them, crucify them." Have you seen God taking off your former burdens, and laying them upon the back of his dear Son, who willingly took them on for you, though they pressed him down to the earth? O then, go not to lay any more loads upon him. Hath he taken you and washed you from your sins in his own blood? O do not return with the sow that is washed to her wallowing in the mire. Hath the Lord been graciously sealing the pardon of your sins? Go not to turn his grace into wantonness, by venturing to run on in a new score. If you have washed your feet in the blood of the Lamb, O beware of defiling them again.

VIII. "Walk always under the sense of God's all-seeing eye upon you in every thing you do." A holy and circumspect walk is what every communicant should endeavour, especially after the sacrament; this would tend, not only to your own peace and comfort, but also to the glory of God, and the promoting of his interest and kingdom in the world. Were your lives tender, circumspect, and shining in holiness before the world, there would be little need of miracles to confirm the word, or convert infidels; for your conversations would allure strangers, and mightily recommend religion unto them; so that they might thereby be drawn to seek acquaintance with the God of holy communicants, as Nebuchadnezzar was with the God of Daniel: and thus you would be instruments of turning many to righteousness, and so shine as the stars for ever and ever.

Now, if you would shine in a holy walk and exemplary conversation, then you must, like Caleb, "walk after God," Num. xiv. 24, you must imitate him in his holiness and purity. Again, you must, like Enoch, "walk with God," Gen. v. 22, live in communion and fellowship with him. And then, you must, like Abraham, "walk before God," Gen. xvii. 1, live and carry as those who believe he hath a special eye upon you in all that you do. And when you go about any action or business, spiritual or temporal, say to your souls, "I have a watchful eye over me, that pierceth into all my thoughts, that discovers the principles from which I am acted, and the ends to which I move: let me act then, as one that still believes this, as one that must shortly be accountable to God for all I do, and I know not how soon." Or, say to this purpose, "Now I am going about such a business, such a duty; and, if Christ shall send for me at the end of it, what account will I be able to give of my management to him? What do I know, but at the end of this duty I may either be in Abraham's bosom, or in a gulf of misery?"

Walk now in all your steps, as if you saw Christ crucified before you, breathing forth his dying love to lost sinners, and pouring out his blood to cleanse them from sin. Would not that be a great restraint upon you, to keep you from sin? Walk now, as a damned soul would walk, were he again to live under the offers of mercy: how diligently, think you, would he obey, how fervently would he pray, and how peremptorily would he reject all temptations to sin? So ought every sincere communicant to do, that intends to please God and walk worthy of the vocation wherewith he is called.

IX. "Endeavour to walk cheerfully and contentedly under every lot and condition. You may look for trials and difficulties while you sojourn in this world: but, in midst of all, you should aim to be much in the eunuch's frame after the seal of baptism, Acts viii. 39, who "went on his way rejoicing." Have you got the seal of God's covenant? Then, whatever your afflictions be, you cannot but have a reviving cordial, for your sins are pardoned. Let not worthy communicants say they are sick, when their iniquities are forgiven them. Should they walk dejectedly, who have got an interest in the new covenant secured, and all the promises and privileges of it ratified and confirmed to them? For, what do they want, but is to be had here? Whatsoever is a blessing is secured here, either sanctified riches, or a contented poverty.

A worthy communicant may say, Let God do with me as he will in this world, I desire to be content, seeing he hath engaged himself to be with me in all states and conditions, and to order all things for my advantage: surely "he cannot lie, he cannot deny himself;" all his words are oaths for their certainty, and all his promises "the sure mercies of David." Let my covenanted God choose out my lot for me, surely it shall be with more wisdom and with more affection than I can choose for myself. He whom Almighty wisdom and goodness takes a fatherly care of, and hath engaged to feed, cannot but have enough. If Christ be mine, all things are mine; nothing is excluded, when he is included.

X. "Delight in the company of the people of God." Shake off all ungodly society, and have your hearts linked to all those that bear Christ's image. Set the psalmist's example before your eyes in this matter, Psal. cxix. 115, "Depart from me, ye evil doers, for I will keep the commandments of my God." And verse 63, "I am a companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts." It is a true saying of Solomon's, Prov. xiii. 20, "He that walketh with wise men, shall be wise; but a companion of fools shall be destroyed." Make the liveliest of God's people your greatest intimates, and upon all occasions improve their fellowship to the best advantage. Beware of the cooling of your affections to the people of God; but let that divine sentence still run in your minds, 1 John iv. 11, "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." Let the love of God, manifested to you at the sacrament, engage you to carry lovingly and affectionately to all his people. Henceforth behave yourselves as servants of the same family, branches of the same vine, members of the same body, and children of the same Father.

XI. "Study to shine in the graces of meekness, patience, and forgiveness of injuries." This is the way to make you like your glorious Redeemer and pattern; and this is the way to adorn the profession of religion, and to make it amiable in the eyes of strangers. And surely all those who have been sharers of God's infinite mercy and goodness in the sacrament, will come away from it with a disposition to hear injuries, and a readiness to forgive those that do them wrong.

XII. "Labour to keep up constant longings for communion occasions here below, and for the eternal supper of the Lamb above." Surely those who have met with Christ in this ordinance will be breathing for further discoveries of his sweetness and beauty. You ought to be saying, like Moses, when he came down from the mount, "I beseech thee, Lord, show me thy glory:" let me have new manifestations of thy excellency, fresh intimations of thy love, and clearer discoveries of thy will. O, when will the opportunity return? When shall I come and appear before God? When shall I again see his power and glory in the sanctuary? When shall I taste his love and goodness again in the sacrament? When shall I again behold his well covered table, sit down thereat with his children, and be satisfied as with marrow and fatness?

But seeing this lower table is transient and uncertain, look for one to come which is fixed and abiding. "Yet a little while," saith Christ, "and I will see you again, and I will come and receive you to myself." O believer, your lovely bridegroom will keep his word and his day, he will come and marry you to himself for ever: therefore ever stand upon the watch-tower, wishfully looking for his appearance; never slack thy watch, nor let thy expectation cool, till he come and take thee home to himself, and set you down at the higher table, where he shall for ever lay aside his vail, and his amiable countenance never more be clouded with frowns; where you shall not have a sacramental but a beatifical vision; where you shall not remember him, but behold him as he is; where you shall feed on him without signs, and see him without a vail; where all your sorrows shall be turned into joys, where, for every reproach you met with in God's service, you shall reap eternal honour; for every hour of sorrow, you shall enjoy endless ages of comfort. "Make haste, my beloved, let the day break and the shadows fly away. Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Take me to that place where mysteries shall be turned into revelations, faith into vision, hope into fruition, espousals into embraces, sorrowful sighs into nuptial songs, drops of tears into rivers of pleasures, transient glances into the radiant and direct beams of the Sun of righteousness, short tastes into everlasting feasting and fullness. How small are the comforts of the lower table, if compared with these of the higher table! How dark are the discoveries believers have here, if compared with these bright manifestations above! But because I have insisted on this head formerly, I shall add no more here upon it; but wish that we may come at length experimentally to know the difference, to our everlasting comfort.

SACRAMENTAL MEDITATIONS.

PREFACE.

THE eternal Son of God, when taking his leave of an ungrateful world, instituted the sacrament of the supper, as a lively resemblance and memorial of his bloody sufferings and death in the room of his people; and also to be a bright and lasting evidence of the amazing love of God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to perishing sinners.

As God once sent his Son into the world in a lowly habit, clothed with human flesh, to save sinners; so now he sends him in a homely dress, clothed with the elements of bread and wine, to assure us of his love, and to engage us to come to him. Kings expect that their children will be respected, though their officers be neglected. "Surely," saith God, "they will reverence my Son." They will make him welcome, and hearken to him.

In this most august ordinance of the New Testament, the great God approaches very near to us, and we to him; and yet it is to be deeply regretted, that many, who profess to believe this, come to it with so little thought and preparation, and with so much indifferency and carelessness of spirit. O shall we adventure so near the great God, who is infinitely holy, in whose sight the heavens are not pure, and in whose presence the sun and stars are dimmed, and the brightest seraphims do gather in their wings, and account themselves as little flies before him! And shall we, who are creatures so mean and so vile, be careless and unconcerned when we make the nearest approach to this great and holy God, that we can make on this side of heaven!

Ought we not to go blushing, ashamed and deeply humbled on many accounts, and particularly for our ingratitude for redeeming love, that "love which passeth knowledge;" and for our contempt of "God's unspeakable gift," the greatest sin in the world; yea, we should go wondering that we are out of hell, for many thousands are burning there, who have not sinned so heinously in making light of precious Christ as we have done.

Moreover, reader, consider if you go to this ordinance unpreparedly, or with indifferency, you not only make light of the Lord Jesus Christ, but you are "guilty of the body and blood of the Lord," 1 Cor. iii. 27. Surely, that word may cause you to quake and tremble; blood-guiltiness of any sort is a dreadful sin, and especially to be guilty of the "blood of the Lord." Murder is a sin that cries for vengeance on the actor, and gives God no rest till he punish it, Gen. iv. 10, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth to me from the earth." If it be a crying sin to murder a common person, what must it be to murder a king? "Who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed and be guiltless," 1 Sam. xxvi. 91. O then what a crime must it be to murder the eternal Son of God, who is thy exalted King, thy everlasting Father, thy dear Redeemer, and thy God who gave thee a being. Child-murder is a heinous crime, but what Christ-murder is, no tongue can tell! If on him that slew Cain, that wicked man, vengeance should be taken sevenfold; what vengeance will be taken on him that crucifies afresh the Lord of glory? This consideration should make all of us afraid of careless and unworthy communicating.

If we would communicate worthily, we must be earnest, not only for the life of grace, but also for the liveliness of grace; not only for the truth and sincerity of grace, but likewise for the activity and vigorous exercise of grace. So that a believer himself doth not eat and drink worthily, unless the grace that is in him be excited and exercised at this ordinance. There must be not only faith in the truth of it, but there must be faith realizing, applying, appropriating, and making use of Christ's death and purchase in this ordinance. Not only must there be a disposition of soul to be humbled for sin, but there must be actual mourning and melting of heart for sin, and for particular sins, when we look on him we have pierced by them. Not only must there be a principle of love to Christ, but also an exciting of love to flame out to Christ, who loved us and gave himself for us.

Worthy communicating being a work of such importance, the following Scriptural Meditations and Advices are humbly offered to Christians, as an help in their preparations for it. Reading and thinking much on the subjects here proposed, may, through God's blessing, be useful to promote their habitual preparation for the holy supper. Christ's body and blood herein exhibited, are pure and holy things, and should be received in prepared and cleansed hearts. His body never saw corruption in the grave, nor will be mixed with it in hearts where corruption is allowed. It lay in a virgin-womb, and in a virgin-sepulchre, and will still be entertained in virgin-souls and affections; in hearts purified and consecrated to God. In those Christ chooses to reside, and not in those where sin and the world, with the lusts thereof, are harboured. O had we grace to maintain and cherish the fear of God, and the love of Christ, habitually in our souls, we might, without much pains, be prepared for coming to him at his table.

Did we always bear in our minds, that sacramental occasions are solemn appointments, and Bethel meetings with God, for renewing covenant, and entertaining fellowship and communion with him, we would guard more against formality creeping in upon us in our preparations for, and in our attendance upon this ordinance, than, alas, we do. O such formality will provoke the Master of our solemn feast to withdraw from them, and then what poor, dry, melancholy, and lifeless things, will they be! What are sacraments without Christ's presence in them? O let us never be satisfied with communion-sabbaths, without communion with Christ in them.

On the other hand, if we would keep up communion with Christ in these ordinances, let us beware of relying on our previous pains or preparations, either for the right performing of our duty, or for our acceptance in it. For we are never more ready to miscarry, and to be disappointed, than when we are guilty of this resting. Sundry go to the Lord's table with great humiliation for sin, and yet come away without comfort. Why? because they make a Christ of their sorrow. O what worth can we see in our best preparations, confessions, prayers, tears, humiliations, &c. if we compare them with the law of God? We have more cause to be ashamed of them, than to lay any stress on them. Could we renounce all self-confidence, and disclaim all our provision in point of dependance, and cast ourselves wholly on Christ for strength, through-bearing and acceptance, we would have better success at the Lord's table, than commonly we have.

We are never more fit for this holy table, than when we are most humbled, and most ashamed of ourselves, because of our unfitness for this solemn approach: and we are never less fit than when we think ourselves most fit and prepared for the duty. A holy deniedness to all sufficiency, and a deep sense of unworthiness and unfitness, is the best preparation we can attain to for this solemn ordinance. Let us make holy David our pattern, when going to partake, Psal. lxxi. 16, "I will go in the strength of the Lord God: I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only." And let us pray with the spouse, Cant. iv. 16, "Awake, O north-wind, and come, thou south, blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out." Amen.

DUNDEE, August 1747.

MEDITATION I.—"BY FAITH NOAH PREPARED AN ARK TO THE SAVING OF HIS HOUSE."—HEB. XI. 7.

Though the flood that drowned the old world, was at many years' distance, yet Noah was moved with fear at God's warning him of it, and prepared an ark for his safety. And shall not unconverted, unbelieving sinners, who have a far more terrible flood threatened against them, and may be only a few days distant, take warning, and provide with all speed for their safety? O shall I, a wretched, guilty sinner, take rest, while I am within the flood-marks of God's wrath, and not arise in time to provide an ark to flee to for safety? But, O good news, I have not the ark to provide, it is prepared to my hand. God, in his infinite wisdom and pity, hath made ready an Ark long ago for lost sinners of Adam's race to fly to; and now it is completely furnished and finished, and all things are ready, so that I have nothing to do but go and take possession.

O what had become of me, and other perishing sinners, had we the ark to build for ourselves? Nay, the whole creation had not been able or sufficient for this purpose. How soon would the raging flood of divine wrath sweep away all the arks of men or angels' building! But thanks be unto God for ever, for the excellent well built ark of God's devising, for the many spacious rooms and safe lodging-places within it, for the suitable accommodation and plentiful provision laid up therein, and for the door opened in the side thereof for perishing souls to enter by. The salvation of sinners by a crucified Christ is a well-ordered scheme, a beautiful contrivance! Blessed be the infinitely wise Contriver for it. I see all things in Christ crucified necessary for me: he is made of God to men, "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." There is in him infinite wisdom to guide me, a spotless righteousness to cover me, precious blood to wash me, the Holy Spirit to sanctify me, his good word to direct me, his just laws to govern me, and his infinite fulness to supply all my needs. Safe and happy then would I be, were I found in him. O that, upon trial by scripture marks, I could conclude myself to be within the Ark, to wit, a crucified Jesus.

Can I say, I have been warned of God, and moved with fear to fly to this ark? Have I discovered my shelterless state by nature, the waves and billows of wrath rising and rolling against me? Have I seen my own inability to provide an Ark for myself, and the excellency and fitness of the Ark of God's providing? Have I been made willing to abandon all false arks, and earnestly inquisitive how to get into the true Ark? Have I been made willing to use all appointed means for this end, to read, hear, meditate, pray, repent, believe, essay to climb up the sides of the Ark, and press to get in at the door thereof? Have I been willing to venture my all in the Ark, like Noah, notwithstanding of the discouragements, scoffs, and hatred of the world for so doing? Have I willingly acquiesced, sheltered, and lodged my soul in God's Ark, and been made to say, "This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell." Come what floods will, Christ shall be my Ark, his righteousness alone my refuge and hiding-place.

Alas! upon impartial search, have I not cause to fear that I have not yet fled to the Ark, but am still exposed to the devouring flood? And can I be easy or quiet in such a case? Can I forbear crying, What shall I do to get into the Ark Christ? Nay, what would I not do to get into it? Lord, what would thou have me to do? Wouldst thou have me to humble myself, confess, mourn, part with sin, close with Christ in all his offices? Prescribe, Lord, what thou wilt, I will not scruple what thou enjoinest me, but obey thee without reserve. I am resolved upon it, whatever it cost me, that the solicitations of the flesh, the temptations of Satan, the scoffs, reproaches, or persecutions of the world, shall not stop me from flying to the Ark; I would break through all these to be found in it. Lord, increase and strengthen my faith for that end; and help my unbelief.

O how suitable is the Ark Christ to my destitute and miserable condition. In myself I want all things, but I see a supply for all my wants in the Ark. I am poor, but I see gold in the Ark to make me rich. I am wounded by sin, but I see balm in the Ark to heal my wounds. I am blind, but there is eye-salve in the Ark to make me see. I am perishing with hunger, but I see bread in the Ark to satisfy me. I am naked, but in the Ark there is white raiment to clothe me. I am polluted, but in the Ark there is a fountain to wash me. I am exposed to more terrible floods than Noah was, but I see the Ark Christ can save me from them all. Noah's ark saved him only from a flood of water, but the Ark Christ saves from a flood of the curses of the law, and the wrath of God, which will sweep away all the unbelieving world. This flood rose, swelled high, and dashed furiously against our Ark; but the Ark was proof against it, and sheltered all the elect world from the flood; so that not one drop lighted on them. O how excellent is this Ark! for it can save me from being overwhelmed or carried away with any flood, and particularly it can save me from being carried away with a flood of Satan's temptations, which sweeps away many; or with a flood of indwelling corruption; with a flood of error; with a flood of profanity; or with a flood of neutrality and indifferency about spiritual concerns: by which floods multitudes are destroyed. Let me then by faith fly to this blessed Ark, where all believers are preserved from these destroying floods. Behold I run, I fly: may Jesus draw me, and help me in.

Blessed for ever be the God of heaven, for providing such an Ark for fallen sinners upon earth. I desire to count all things but loss and dung, that I may be found in this Ark, among the preserved in Christ Jesus, whom no flood can reach. However this Ark may be slighted by the world, I will prize it above all things, and count them for ever happy who get into it, seeing God declares it, that there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. The ark was slighted by the old world, and Noah ridiculed for preparing it for himself and his house; but it soon appeared that Noah was the wisest man that then lived upon the earth. Few there were that entered with Noah into the ark, and no doubt were reproached and mocked for their singularity; but soon was the world persuaded that they were the only wise and happy men in it. Better surely it was to have followed the eight persons that went into the ark, than to have joined eight millions of those who were drowned in the flood. Should I be so foolish as follow the old world in undervaluing the Ark, I must lay my account to be shut out and perish with them too: wherefore, I will not fear the reproach of men for being singular in my esteem for glorious Christ. May I be numbered among that happy company, however few they be, who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, and will bless God eternally for providing this Ark for drowning men! May I be one that will ever bless my lovely and loving Jesus, that pitied me and took me in, when others were washed off from the sides of the Ark, as adhering only to it by a dead and formal profession! May I be one that will ever sing to his praise, O amazing free love! that pitied and distinguished me when the flood came; that graciously drew and determined me in such a manner, that I got into the Ark and was safe, when many others were washed off and perished for ever!

MEDITATION II.—“GOD SPARED NOT THE ANGELS THAT SIN-NED, BUT CAST THEM DOWN TO HELL,” 2 PET. II. 4.

How admirable, free, and distinguishing, is the love of God to mankind sinners, in pitying them in their low and lost estate! O how different is the case of fallen men upon the earth, from the case of fallen angels in hell, and that of damned souls there! Manna is rained down upon us, while an eternal shower of fire and brimstone falls down upon them. They are bound in chains of darkness, whilst thou, Lord, art drawing us with cords of love. Thou didst not spare angels, nor take on their nature; but thou hast spared us, married our nature, and exalted it to the heavens. They continue without hope under the deluge of God's wrath, whilst the pleasant rainbow of the sacrament appears to us as a token of God's covenant of grace, and of his willingness to secure us from that overflowing flood by the interposition of his dear Son in our nature. O how welcome should we make that gospel rainbow!

Lord, thy wrath soon broke out against the angels that fell; thou didst punish them immediately upon their sinning against thee. Thou didst not wait for their repentance, nor make any offer of mercy to them, but presently, upon their first offence, didst condemn them to everlasting chains of darkness. O how far different is thy manner of dealing with us! Long hast thou waited upon us after we have sinned; yea, thou hast followed us with thy mercy, after many refusals of it, and even after our trampling the precious blood of Christ under our feet! Marvellous and peculiar is thy mercy to fallen men in respect of fallen angels! Glory to sovereign free mercy, that thou didst not cast us off for ever without a parley, as thou didst them; but waitest to be gracious to us, long stretching out thy hand, and calling us to repentance, saying, “Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?”

Against the sinning angels God was so provoked, that he resolved within himself, and hath kept his resolution ever since the beginning of the world, and will keep it to all eternity, that he will not so much as enter into a parley with those creatures, however glorious they once were, nor be reconciled to them upon any terms; yea, that he will hear of no terms, but will revenge himself upon them to all eternity. May not then the hearing of this cause us to quake and tremble? for why might not the Lord have dealt with us in the same manner, who were far more wretched and miserable creatures than angels? Surely, if a king be so angry with an offending nobleman, that was once his special favourite, as to banish him from court, and afterwards hear of no terms of reconciliation with him: would not a footman or mean servant that had offended, when hearing of this begin to dread, and say, O what will become of me, a poor man, when the king treats his peers so severely? I may surely despair of a remission or reconciliation with him. So, in like manner, we poor clay worms, upon hearing of God's severity to fallen angels, might have been overwhelmed with fear, if the bible had not told us that the Son of God's “delights were with the sons of men;” that “verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took upon him the seed of Abraham,” Heb. ii. 16; and that he gave himself to be a sin-offering and sacrifice for men! Astonishing news! Glory to God for these glad tidings of great joy.

O admirable love to Adam's rebellious offspring! Hast thou, Lord, passed by angels, and remembered us in our low and lost estate; and in thy infinite compassion become our Surety, to appease divine justice for our heinous sins, when no other sacrifice could do it? O what shall we render to thee for this distinguishing love? Surely our condition in Adam was no better than that of the angels who left their first estate. By nature we were in a most dreadful case, lying, like Isaac, bound on the altar, to be a sacrifice to the justice of God, and the sword of justice lift up to give us the killing blow, until the Son of God discovered himself, as the ram caught in the thickets, and calling to justice, Hold thy hand, loose them, and bind me in their room; I will be the sacrifice for them. In choosing fallen men, and not angels, God gave an amazing instance of the sovereignty of his grace, that would be merciful to whom he would be merciful; he would pass by the superior nature, and choose the inferior; prefer vessels of clay to vessels of gold! What can we say? Nothing, but wonder at God's free grace! Unspeakable love! Lord, it had been much if thou hadst provided an angel to mitigate our sufferings in hell, by giving us drops of water to cool our tongues; but that thou shouldst have condescended to come and change rooms with us, lie in hell for us, and suffer the very pains and agonies due to us, is love that passeth knowledge.

Lord, when I consider thy distinguishing pity and lowly stooping to purchase and recover such clods of earth and sin with thy blood and agonies, I am amazed at thy love, confounded at my own ingratitude, and ashamed at the coldness and hardness of my heart! O! was Christ willing to change rooms with the like of me, and shall not I be willing to change rooms with him, and at his demand to part with the filthy rags of my sins, and take on the robe of his righteousness? O shall not this amazing love of Christ constrain me to love him again, and live to him that died for me? Shall it not constrain me to think on him; constrain me to commend him; constrain me to adhere to Christ's truths and ways; to persevere in prayer, praise, and holy walking?

Are fallen angels left, and fallen men pitched upon to be the monuments of free grace, to fill up the vacant rooms which angels fell from? What shall I say to this, but "even so, Father, for so it pleased thee;" let thy sovereign free grace be the eternal song of both men and angels. "Not unto us, not unto us, but unto thy name be the glory." Blessed be God, that I hear this joyful sound of reconciliation with fallen men, and of a treaty of peace carried on with them. The devils never heard, and never will hear such news. But O if I come not in, and accept of the terms and offers made to me in the gospel, I will put myself in a worse case than the devils: for it cannot be charged upon fallen angels, as on fallen men, that God was willing to be reconciled to them, and they would not. Now, then, when the gospel-treaty is proclaimed, God forbid I be found guilty of refusing his terms, scorning his offers, and defying his threatenings. O how shall I escape, if I neglect so great and wonderful salvation as is tendered to me? Neglect it, Lord, I dare not, I will not. Lo, I come, I accept, I embrace, I take hold of thy covenant, and the seal of it tendered to me; I renounce the old covenant, I break league this day with all thine enemies, I proclaim war against them: I close with Christ Jesus, both as my righteousness and my strength: I make a full and free surrender and resignation of myself unto the Lord, to be his, and his only, in all I am, and in all I enjoy, to be ordered and disposed of for his glory and service. Lord, I am thine; I will not be my own, I will not be the world's, but I will be thine, thine only, and thine wholly; thine to love thee, serve and obey thee, without reserve. Since thou wouldest have no nature but mine, I will have no will but thine. I renounce my own will, and take thine for my rule. Lord, I am thine, O save thou me; and I will trumpet forth the praises of free grace and redeeming love for ever. Amen.

MEDITATION III.—"HE HATH NOT DEALT SO WITH ANY NATION," PSAL. CXLVIII, 20.

The nation of Israel was singularly privileged above others; they were taken into covenant with God, they had God's word and ordinances, the means of conversion and salvation; they had the gospel revelation, the knowledge and promises of the Messiah. But we, under the New Testament times, and in Britain, are yet more peculiarly privileged with clearer light and discoveries of the Messiah than the nation of Israel had. They lived under a darker and harsher dispensation of the covenant of grace by Moses, whose first miracle was the turning of water into blood; but we live under the clearer and sweeter dispensation of it by Christ himself, whose first miracle was the turning of water into wine that cheers the heart. The nation of Israel were called a people near unto God; but in gospel times we are allowed yet nearer access to God than they had. The children of Israel were not allowed so much as to touch the mount on which the Lord came down; the men of Bethshemish had not liberty to look into the ark, the place of his residence: but, behold, we are allowed to take a near view and steady look of a crucified Jesus in the sacrament, who is "the image of the invisible God, the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person." Yea, we have liberty not only to look to him, but also to touch him, handle his wounds, embrace his person, and lodge him in our hearts.

The advantage of a clear revelation of a crucified Christ in the gospel ordinances, and particularly in the Lord's supper, is an invaluable privilege. If the royal psalmist admired the divine goodness in causing the sun, moon, and stars to shine in the firmament for man's behoof, and therefore cries, "What is man, that God is thus mindful of him?" how far greater cause have we to say so, when we observe how God causes the Sun of righteousness shine so brightly in the firmament of gospel ordinances, and the "day-spring from on high to visit us" with the light of saving knowledge, and of eternal salvation through him? Again, if the psalmist exalts God's goodness so much in his giving the beasts of the field, fowls of the air, and fishes of the sea to be food for man: what ground have we to admire and praise God's infinite mercy, in giving us the flesh and blood of his own dear Son to preserve the lives of our souls? O what rare gospel feasts are these which God allows us in the land wherein we dwell! And O how wonderfully are they preserved and continued with us, from time to time, by the miraculous working of God's mercy and power; while others are visited with cleanness of teeth, and a famine of the word of God! He hath not dealt with every nation as with us.

And, Lord, how distinguishing is thy goodness unto me a most unworthy creature! By thy mercy I was born in a valley of vision; and I dwell in a lightsome Goshen, when multitudes of others, in pagan and popish nations, are covered with Egyptian darkness, and sit in the region of the shadow of death; I hear heaven's free market-days of grace proclaimed, when others have silent sabbaths; I am invited to a rich banqueting-house, when others are starving for the want of the bread of life. O that I could value my mercies aright! It is a great privilege that I am allowed to speak to the great God in prayer, and to hear him speak unto me in his word! But still he puts a greater honour upon me, by calling me to enjoy intimate communion and fellowship with himself, yea, inviting me to sit down with him at his table, and feast upon the fruits of Christ's death, and benefits of his purchase! O I am not worthy of the least crumb that falls from the children's table, and far less of being set down at the table with the children to eat of their bread, and share of the dainties provided for them by their heavenly Father. If Peter, after having seen Christ's glory, and his own vileness, judged himself unworthy to be in the same ship with Christ, and therefore cried, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man," how should I, the chief of sinners, adventure to sit at the same table with him, and feed upon his flesh and blood! Amazing condescension!

O what distinction doth God make among nations, in sending the gospel to them, with clear views and pressing offers of a crucified Jesus to perishing souls? And what cause have we in these nations, of admiring the distinguishing goodness of God to us in this respect beyond others! Would we not admire his goodness, if he caused the sunshine only in our horizon, as he did on Goshen; when other nations were covered with darkness, as the land of Egypt was? Yet surely the gospel-sun is by far a greater mercy. The gospel is indeed a joyful sound, Psal. lxxxix. 15, so called, with allusion to the silver trumpets made use of under the law to call people to the solemn assemblies, and to intimate to them the feast of the passover, which represented the love and sufferings of the Messiah. A joyful sound the gospel is, indeed, if we compare it with the sound of the law's curses and threatenings thundered from mount Sinai against sinners. But, behold, this joyful sound, bringing salvation, comes from heaven, even to heaven-daring sinners, who had openly rebelled against the God of heaven! Glad news! blessed are they who know the joyful sound; know it, so as to believe it, admire it, entertain it, and comply with it, so as to receive Christ offered therein to lost sinners.

Lord, I make this joyful sound welcome; it is music to my ear, and a cordial to my heart. I reckon their feet beautiful who bring such glad tidings to my soul. O how welcome would men make them, who would bring them an invention, that would secure their estates from consuming, their houses from burning, or their bodies from dying! But here we have the sure news of an invention that doth much more for us than all this; even a device that secures us from hell, and ensures us of heaven. Ought I not then cheerfully to comply with this joyful sound, and fall in with the call thereof? God forbid that I should stop my ears at it; it had been better for me then, never to have heard of it at all: how dreadful would my case be at the judgment day! How would devils, Turks, heathens, and my own conscience, upbraid me in hell, to all eternity, for my folly in slighting this joyful sound! Surely God may slight the mournful sound of their prayers in the time of distress, who slight the joyful sound of his gospel in time of health. But, Lord, I bless thee for it, I love it, I receive it, I welcome it, I fall heartily in with it, and will admire it for ever.

MEDITATION IV.—"BEHOLD WHAT MANNER OF LOVE THE FATHER HATH BESTOWED UPON US!" 1 JOHN III. 1.

In the amazing work of our redemption, we are called to behold and admire both the love of the Father and the love of the Son. Unspeakable love of the Father! that contrived our redemption, pitched upon and gave the Redeemer. O how readily accepted he of the Son's offer to suffer and satisfy infinite justice for sin in our room! Upon our fall he might justly have said, No, the soul that sins shall die personally, I will admit of no surety. But glory to the blessed Father, such was his love to us, that when the dear Son said, Father, I will be the surety for sinners of mankind, let my blood be shed for theirs, let the blow light on me, let me die in their room; such was the love and pity of the Father to us, that he presently accepted the offer, held our Redeemer at his word, saying, Be it as thou hast said: "Awake, O sword, against the man that is my fellow; smite the shepherd," and spare the sheep. I will glorify my justice upon my own dear Son, rather than upon them. Amen, said the blessed Son of God: I will be the sacrifice!

O love unspeakable, both in the Father and the Son! human love, angelic love, is nothing to it! O what is the love of creatures one to another, to this love of God to man? Astonishing love! that the eternal Son of God, entreated by no man, but hated of all men, should in his love and pity entreat for men: yea, undertake and die for them, when enemies to God and all that is good! "O the breadth, O the length, O the depth, O the height of this love of Christ, which passeth knowledge!" I may possibly feel it, but I cannot fathom it. The love of creatures is nothing to the love of Christ. It was great love that Jacob bore to Rachel, that he endured the heat of summer and frosts of winter for her: but all this was nothing to the winter-storm which Christ suffered for us. It was extraordinary love that Jonathan had to David, that he would peril his life to avert his father's wrath from him: but what was that to Christ's love, that took on his eternal Father's wrath, which was infinitely greater than Saul's and actually laid down his life to avert that dreadful storm of wrath from us! What love was it that made him stand before the mouth of hell-furnace, and suffer himself to be scorched with it in the most terrible manner, that he might stop the flame from breaking out on us! Behold him receiving the sword of justice into his bowels, to prevent its being sheathed in our hearts. Behold when the sea of God's wrath raged and was tempestuous, threatening to swallow us all up; Christ came, and said, like Jonah, Spare these poor sinners! take me up, and cast me into the sea in their stead, that the storm may be appeased against them! Christ was willing to be cast into the sea of wrath, to be a blessed plank of mercy for shipwrecked souls to grip to, and be saved.

Admirable love of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who would give his dearly beloved Son out of free love and pity to man, to die and suffer wrath for him! and would choose rather to see his dear Son agonizing and struggling under infinite wrath for a time, than to see an elect world struggling in hell among devils for ever! O who can utter the mighty acts of the Lord? who can show forth all his praise? O Father of mercies, from all eternity thou foresaw our fall and misery, and in thy wisdom and love didst contrive a noble remedy for us: thou even didst provide a Surety for man before the debt was contracted, a Saviour for him before he was lost; and by this glorious Surety thou hast found out a noble way to satisfy the demands of justice and entreaties of mercy, and glorify both these divine perfections at once. By this, Lord, we know thou lovest us, that thou hast not withheld thy Son, thine only Son, from us, to be sacrificed in our room, and graciously callest us to commemorate thy love, in providing this sacrifice, at thy holy table. Instead of this, thou mightest justly have called multitudes of us together, to make us a sacrifice to thy justice for our heinous sins and rebellion against heaven. But behold, thou callest us together to thy table upon quite another design, even to intimate to us a sacrifice of thy own providing, sufficient for us all; and actually to behold the bleeding victim of the innocent Lamb of God, who willingly, at his Father's call, gave himself to be slain to take away the sins of the world! Lord, what didst thou see in such creatures, to make thee to love us after this manner? Nothing, but much to make thee loathe us; yet the time when we were most loathesome, thou madest it the time of love. Surely "thy thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor thy ways as our ways!" How astonishing was thy conduct in redeeming us when lost! And worse are we than devils, if we be not ravished with the love of the Father, in projecting our redemption: and with the love of his eternal Son, that made him leave his glory in heaven, and even wade through hell to save the dregs of the creation.

O what manner of love is this, that the Father did give his eternal Son, to die for those who deserved eternal wrath for their rebellion and treason against himself! When notice was first given in this lower world, that the Son of God was coming down to it from heaven; what could have been expected, but that his business here would be to condemn the world, and hasten the execution of those whom he found in arms against him? But, O who can think, and not wonder, that he should have sent him to suffer and die for such as forfeited their lives, and deserved to be slain; yea, for such as were alienated from the life of God, and full of enmity against him, unworthy of any place of abode upon earth, and by their wickedness fully prepared for hell: O how surprising is it, that God would, in this our miserable state, send the Son of his love to die for us, to rescue us from deserving wrath, and purchase a new title for us to life and glory! Behold what manner of love this is, that the just should suffer for the unjust, the just Prince for the unjust rebels, that were in arms against him, the King of glory for the children of disobedience, the obedient Son for mortal enemies! O this is such a manner of loving, that the highest transport of wonder cannot reach: "For scarcely for a righteous man will one dare to die; but God commends his love to us in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us," Rom. v. 7, 8.

O how am I able to hear, speak, or think of this love, and my heart not burn with an admiring sense of the freeness and riches of God's grace; and with a vehement hatred and indignation against my sins, which contributed to pierce and crucify my glorious Redeemer! Can I be but ravished with love to him, when he comes to communicate his love to me at his table, and say, Behold how I have loved you, and given myself for you! I was "cut off, but not for myself:—I was wounded for your transgressions, and bruised for your iniquities." It was for you I was betrayed, reviled, condemned, and crucified; for you my hands and feet were nailed to the tree, my head crowned with thorns, and my side pierced with a spear: and all this I suffered, that you might be saved from hell, and get sin forgiven, and God reconciled to you for ever.

MEDITATION V.—"WHAT IS MAN THAT THOU ART MINDFUL OF HIM?" PSAL. VIII. 4.

When David beheld the heavens, with its glorious luminaries, the sun, moon, and stars, and the mighty works of God in the creation, and considered what a mean figure man made amongst them; he admires God's condescension and goodness, in his concern and pains about him, in his works of providence and redemption. Lord, what is man, fallen man, that thou shouldst notice him so much? A poor, vile, sinful worm! And yet how singularly minded and honoured is he, in God the Son's undertaking to be his Cautioner and Ransom? Had he done it for angels, it had not been so marvellous; but what is man, that God should visit him in this manner! should pay him a homely visit in human nature, to see what ailed him, to hear his complaints, and know feelingly his wants and miseries, that he might the better sympathize with him, relieve, and supply him!

But who is this that comes to pay this visit to man? Even he that is King of kings, and Lord of lords, who is infinite in majesty and power, in riches and glory. How awful are the descriptions given us of him in the Bible! "Great is the Lord and of great power, his understanding is infinite. He calls the stars by their names. Whatsoever he pleased, that did he, in heaven and in earth, in the seas, and all the deep places." And it is said of his coming to judgment, Dan. vii. 10, "A fiery stream issued forth before him, thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him." And yet this Almighty Person, the great God, condescends to clothe himself with our nature, and stoops to the very ground, in the most lowly manner, to pay a kind visit to his rebellious creature, man, even man that is a worm; and when he gets not access to him at first, he continues to stand and knock at his door. O how marvellous is this, that he who was Omnipotent, that could by a word have annihilated fallen man, and created a more amiable creature in all respects in his room, should stoop so low to him! That he who was Omniscient, and perfectly knew man's unworthiness, his enmity, his ingratitude, and what unkind returns he would make for the greatest kindness, should court him so earnestly! That the Judge of heaven should come down from the bench, and put on the pannel's clothes, that he might answer and satisfy the law for him! That the great General of the armies of heaven, should put himself in the room of a poor condemned deserter, to suffer for him! That the Creator should stoop to die for the creature, even the great God for a worm,—man, is love that swallows up our thoughts and language! What can we think! what can we say of it! it is love that passeth knowledge! the most penetrating angel cannot fathom its height, its depth, its breadth, or its length! Why? For its height is infinitely higher than the highest heavens; for its depth, none can see its bottom, for it made him stoop as low as hell; for its breadth, it is as broad as the whole earth and the whole heavens too; it comprehends all his people, even the poorest outcast on earth, as well as the highest saint in heaven; for its length, it never ends, but continues without interruption, notwithstanding of provocations; nay, it is drawn out parallel with the longest line of eternity.

Lord, what is man, that thou shouldst have minded him, visited him, and loved him so! A creature most unlovely, ugly and black as hell; that had got the image of God razed out, and the image of Satan pictured in its room. A creature lame and impotent, that could not rise but as Christ lifted him, could not stand but as he upheld him, could not walk but as he led him, nor move but as he drew him. A rebel, that was in league with hell, that hated his Sovereign, and was plotting with the devil to pull the crown off his head. A creature made loathesome by sin in God's sight; yea, more loathesome than the new born infant wallowing in its blood, than Job when full of boils, than Lazarus full of sores, or a dead carcase crawling with worms. A creature that was undesirous of God's visit or help, and unwilling to accept of it; that said to him, "Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." A creature that contemned his love, rejected his offers, and trampled on his blood. Who would have pitied such a creature; one so poor, so vile, so miserable? It had been much to have given him an alms; but for the Son of God to give his life for him, may strike men and angels with astonishing surprise for ever. "Lord, what is man," a poor feeble crawling worm, "that thou shouldst be mindful of him" after this manner? And what are we, that we should still have the offers of this love continued to us? O shall we ever make light of this love any more? "I believe, Lord, help my unbelief."

There is a parallel text, Psal. cxliv. 3, "Lord, what is man, that thou takest knowledge of him? Or the son of man, that thou makest account of him?" What a poor little thing is man, that thou shouldst make so great account of him, put such respect upon him above all other creatures, so as to condescend to stand in a nearer relation to him than to any other; as that of a Father, a Brother, a Husband, a Friend, &c.; yea more, thou hast dignified this poor thing, man, so much, as to assume his nature into an ineffable, personal union with the second Person of the ever glorious Trinity, whereby the nature of man is exalted above all the angels of heaven. It is not the angelical, but the human nature, which God hath chosen to tabernacle in: and now it is honoured so far, as to be set on the right hand of the Majesty on high. The great account God hath of this little thing, man, appears further in the great cost he hath laid out for him. Why, God not only gives his creatures to die for man, to yield him food, but he also gives his Christ to die for him, to procure him eternal life. Again, how great is the goodness which God hath laid up for him hereafter? Eye hath not seen it, ear hath not heard it, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive how great it is! O what a favourite of heaven must this little creature, man, be!

Lord, who can but wonder at the honour thou hast already put upon man, and at the favours thou still designest for him! Great things hast thou laid out, and great things hast thou laid up for man. I admire thy low stoop in the visit thou madest man, in the incarnation of thy dear Son, and in thy visit in the gospel-proclamation, and offer of pardon through him! but let me still plead for another visit, in the effusion of thy Holy Spirit: this other visit thou knowest is necessary to make the former effectual to my salvation. May then thy Holy Spirit work faith in me, to fall in with thy glorious device for the redemption of man in all points, to accept of thy love offers, and rest upon thy free promises of salvation through Jesus Christ, and his most perfect righteousness. Amen.

MEDITATION VI.—“AND THAT ROCK WAS CHRIST,” 1 COR. X. 4.

How useful was that rock in the wilderness to the Israelites sojourning there, after it was smitten by Moses's rod: when they were ready to perish in that dry desert, the rock sent forth streams of water to them in great abundance; streams that followed them up hill and down dale, in all their turnings and windings, marches and countermarches, through that weary land. That rock was to them a lively type of Christ, who, being smitten by the rod of the law's curses, whose minister Moses was, sends forth plentiful supplies to his people, while travelling in the wilderness of this world. There are two principal streams of blessings which he sends forth, most useful to us; namely, a stream of blood for our justification, and a stream of the Spirit for our sanctification. The channel or conduit-pipes, for conveying those streams to us, are the ordinances and promises of the gospel, and through these pipes these blessed streams run freely to all true believers, from the Rock Christ which was broached for them.

O, how costly was our redemption to our dear kinsman Jesus Christ! dear did our souls cost him! The Rock of our salvation was cleaved asunder, rent and pierced to the very heart, to let out the waters of life to us, by which only we can be preserved from eternal death, and obtain eternal life. How costly and precious are the streams of Christ's blood and Spirit, his mercy and grace, which flow from the smitten Rock, and follow us through the wilderness in the free offers of the gospel! They are life-giving streams, fire-quenching, heart-softening, soul-cleansing, healing and fructifying streams: welcome, then, should we make these streams to our souls in this dry and thirsty land. Likewise the rock was to the Israelites a shadow from the heat, and a covert from tempests and storms: so Christ our Rock screens us from the scorching heat of vindictive justice, and from the waves and billows of God's wrath. How necessary and useful is the Rock Christ to the souls of fallen men! O let me never, Jeshurun-like, lightly esteem this Rock of our salvation. O let me never go to false rocks, or false streams, for shelter or supply in straits, when the true Rock is so near, and the saving streams run so close by my door: yea, follow me daily in the channel of thy word and sacraments; streams appointed by Heaven to answer all the cases and ailments of lost sinners. O shall God in his tender mercy provide such a wonderful remedy, set the Rock a-broach for me, and cause its streams to follow me; and shall I be so foolish as turn my back upon them, and refuse to apply or make use of them? O save me from such cursed ingratitude and madness: “I believe, Lord, help my unbelief.”

O how much should my heart be affected at the holy table, when I see the Rock of my salvation smitten by the rod of justice, and behold the bloody spear pierce into his heart! O Rock of ages, what made thee to rend and cleave so! O brightness of thy Father's glory, who hath disfigured thee so? O river of life, clear as crystal, who hath troubled thee so? O, it was my sins, my pride, my passion, my unbelief, my worldliness, my hardness, impenitence, &c. these were the cause of my Redeemer's sufferings. The iniquities of sinful men were laid upon him. When he was pierced, it was I that should have been smitten. When he groaned and swate blood, I should have howled and roared in hell. Harder than the rock is my heart, if I can see my dear Saviour smitten and pierced, and not mourn. O can I see his side and heart streaming out blood, and mine eyes not pour out tears! Can I behold the Rock smitten for the sins of men, and not adore the holiness and justice of God manifested therein? Can I see my innocent Saviour wounded and slain for my sins, and my soul not hate them; yea, shall I not be filled with horror and trembling at temptations to sin?

Let me, at my Saviour's call, approach to his table, and come near to the Rock of my salvation, and hearken to the raging billows of infinite wrath, dashing against the Rock for my sins, and even making the Rock to groan, sweat, and tremble under the pressure. O what a dreadful hurricane of wrath did he endure, to keep the swelling ocean of divine wrath from overflowing guilty men? Surely my glorious Immanuel's groaning and sweating blood under the strokes of God's vengeance, is a greater evidence of the inplacable wrath and indignation of God against sin, than if he had hurled all the rocks of the creation into the midst of the sea; yea, or a thousand worlds of men and angels into hell. O that, while I am beholding this sight, I may tremble at sin, come by faith under the shadow of this Rock, and run into the clefts of it for safety. Here I would be out of the reach of the law's curses, and threatenings of wrath; and though I hear the roarings and dashings of the sea upon the Rock, yet a drop of it could not touch me.

O that I could imitate Moses, when I am at the table, and smite the Rock by the rod of faith, that the streams of Christ's blood and Spirit may flow out to me. What was his error will be my wisdom, to smite the Rock oftener than once, to put forth many acts of faith on Jesus Christ; such as the discerning, assenting, approving, deriving, receiving, closing, embracing, trusting, pleading, applying, appropriating acts of true faith. May I, like Israel of old, Deut. xxxii. 13, be helped by faith to suck honey out of the Rock, and oil out of the flinty rock: honey and oil, sweetness and fatness, quickening and comfort. How shall I come at this honey? only by sucking: and how shall I suck but by the mouth of faith? There is no sucking without it. Neither can I suck by faith, unless God make me do it; for it is said, Deut. xxxii., "He made them to suck honey out of the rock." It is God that must give me both a mouth and strength to suck, faith in the habit, and faith in exercise. It is only the blowings of the north and south winds on the garden that make the spices to flow out. "Awake, O north wind, come, thou south, blow upon my garden;" bring faith to life, that I may suck honey from Christ in the sacrament. Christ's breasts are now full; O let not faith be wanting; for if it be wanting, I can suck nothing. Blessed be God, Jesus Christ, my Redeemer, is the author of faith. Lord, increase my faith, that I may suck honey from the Rock. But what honey may I expect from it? The honey of pardon of sin. O how sweet is this honey!—The honey of peace and reconciliation with God:—the honey of a law-biding righteousness:—the honey of access to, and communion with God:—the honey of enlargement of heart, and loosing of bands, &c. O let me ever suck from this Rock, the Rock that answers all my needs, and richly supplies all my wants. Let me also, under all my straits, support myself with the psalmist's cordial, Psal. xviii. 46, "The Lord liveth, and blessed be my Rock." Why should believers in Christ droop in any condition, or look like dead men, while their Lord liveth, and their Rock standeth? Blessed be God, my Rock is a living and lasting Rock: my hopes may die, my comforts die, my frame die, my gifts, my wealth, and my relations; these may all die; but I rejoice in the news, that my Lord will not die, nor my Rock fall. He once died for me, but he is risen again. Good news! now he is alive, and will die no more.

MEDITATION VII.—"THEY SHALL LOOK UPON ME WHOM THEY HAVE PIERCED, AND MOURN," ZECH. XII. 10.

This promise hath a respect not only to the Jews when converted, but to all sinners when brought to repentance. We have all pierced Christ, inasmuch as our sins were the cause of his death: "He was wounded for our transgressions." Now a believing sight of a pierced Saviour is the best spring of sorrow for sin; it is faith's look to a crucified Christ that will set us a mourning after a godly sort. O that this promise may be made good to me at this time, that I may be helped to look believingly upon Christ, as pierced for my sins, my pride, my passion, my unbelief, my carnality, my disobedience, my impenitence, my sins of the heart, of the tongue, and of the life; that I may confess and bewail them, mourn and weep over them before the Lord. O! when shall I mourn and weep, if not now, when I am called to look upon my dear Lord and Surety at his table, all red with blood for my red and scarlet-coloured sins? I will not now stand afar off, and look to my Saviour on the cross, as those women who followed him from Galilee, Luke xxiii. 46. No: I will come close to him, take a near look, and a narrow view of his wounds and piercings by my sins, that I may see how wide and deep they are, that my eye may affect my heart with godly sorrow for sin.

When I look on him, I will consider the dignity of the Person pierced by and for me; he is the almighty Creator, the glorious Immanuel, the Plant of renown, the Prince of the kings of the earth, that is pierced and nailed to a cross. Jeremiah laments, in the captivity, that princes were hanged up by the hands, Lam. v. 12. But what were the princes of Israel to the Prince of peace, the King of glory, whom I see hanging nailed through the hands on the cross, and his blood poured out like water upon the earth! O it is royal blood, the blood of God, that I see running down to satisfy justice for my sins; and will not such a sight cause me to mourn for them? Can I look on my lovely Redeemer, stripped naked, mounted up, and fixed with nails to a tormenting cross? Can I see his head pierced with thorns, his back pierced with scourgings, his hands and feet pierced with big nails, his side pierced with a spear, and his heart pierced with sorrows for my sins, and my heart not mourn for them? Yet all the piercings and wounds of his sacred body were but small, to the piercings and agonies of his soul, when he drank of the cup of the Father's wrath for me, which made him cry out, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death.—My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Can I behold this loving Jesus, standing in my room, bearing the wrath of a Deity for me, and my heart not bleed? Can I see him, when the sword of justice was drawn to smite me, opening his breast to receive the stroke into his heart, and my heart not melt within me? Lord, grant me such a sight by faith, of a wounded bleeding Saviour, as to make me a melting and mourning sinner.

How can I leave this subject, until my heart be more affected? Had I been personally at mount Calvary, and with my bodily eyes had seen my dear Redeemer racked and nailed to the tree! Had I seen him lifted up between heaven and earth, that the nations might behold him, with his arms stretched out to embrace sinners! Had I beheld his dying looks, and heard his dying groans! Had I seen his precious blood for many hours run from his wounded hands and feet to the earth! Could I have stood by with dry eyes, or an unconcerned heart, especially when I had thought he was suffering all this out of love to me, for my sins, and in my room!—Why then should not I be as much concerned, when I come to his table to celebrate the memorial of that fearful tragedy, and look upon the outward signs which represent the same? Lord, give me faith's eye to behold the things signified thereby, even the bleeding and dying of the glorious Immanuel. And what kind of blood is it I see running down? It is innocent blood! precious blood! royal blood! heart blood! Nay, the blood of the eternal Son of God, one drop whereof is worth an ocean of our blood, and is of infinite value; and yet behold all this blood is shed for such worms as I am! O can I think long upon this subject, and not find my heart pained with love, and be ready, with Joseph, to seek a secret place to weep in? Had an ordinary man been executed for my crime, it would have affected me all my days; how much should it touch me to see the Son of God put to death for me? The sun fainted, the heavens mourned in black, the earth quaked, and the rocks rent, when this black tragedy was acted; how much more should my heart rend and mourn at the representation of it before my eyes? Surely my mourning should be great, deep, and bitter mourning, as in the text, like the mourning of a parent for the death of an only son; or like the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Me-gidde! O what was the death of king Josiah to the death of King Jesus, the eternal Son of God? O my dear slain Lamb, shall I mourn and weep over thee?

O! can I see his blood run down in streams, and my eyes not pour out some drops? Did Christ sweat blood, and weep blood for my sins, and shall not I weep tears for them? Shall I not give drops of water for streams of blood? Alas! am I more sparing of my tears for Christ, than Christ was of his blood for me? How fast did the blood trickle down Christ's cheeks in the day he wore the crown of thorns for me? But how slowly do the tears fall from my eyes when I commemorate his dying love! Can I shed tears in plenty for my dead child; and have I reserved none for a slain Saviour? Yea, slain for my sins! How sad is it to see so many weeping eyes at a funeral, and so many dry eyes at a communion table? Alas! this is a sad sign of few looking by faith to him we have pierced; few sensible of the evil of their sins, that were the hammers which drove the nails into his body. O for a realizing act of faith, representing all that the Lamb of God suffered, in the greatest certainty and clearest evidence, that it is no devised fable. O for an applying and appropriating act of faith, to bring all home to myself, and say, "He loved me, and gave himself for me."

What a hard heart is this I have beyond others! Can I see others weeping and mourning over a slain Saviour, that sit at the same table, eat the same bread, and drink the same cup with me, and cannot I get one tear? Is God come with his bottle waiting for my tears? Do others pour into it plentifully, and have I not one tear to drop into God's bottle? Lord, what means the hardness of my heart, and the dryness of my eyes, at the sight of my Saviour's bleeding and dying for my sins? When should I mourn and weep, if not now? Was there ever such an occasion for tears? O! doth God intend to reserve weeping for me in hell, where tears shall never be dried up? This is what I deserve, if I be hard-hearted and dry-eyed now. But, Lord, pity my hardness, and give me such a look as thou gavest Peter, that may cause me to weep, and weep bitterly, at the remembrance of my sins which pierced thee.

MEDITATION VIII.—"THE LORD LOOKED UPON PETER.—AND PETER WENT OUT, AND WEPT BITTERLY."—LUKE XXII. 61, 62.

Lord, since my looks to thee are so slight, so wavering and inconstant, that they make little or no impression on my hard heart, do thou vouchsafe to look upon me with pity and with power; for thy looks are efficacious, and melt down the hardest heart. O give me such a look as thou gavest to Peter, when he denied thee, and began to curse and swear: a look that may bring me to myself, and cause me weep, and weep bitterly, at the remembrance of my sins, my unbelief, my pride, my passion, my disobedience, which pierced thee, my dearest Lord and Saviour. "Look thou upon me, and be merciful unto me," Psal. cxix. 131. Christ's look to backsliding Peter was merciful, and full of compassion; his bowels yearned for his poor disciple, when ready to fall into the devil's arms by a total and final backsliding, and prevents him speedily. He would not let him lie long in that dismal state he fell into, as it were on the very brink of hell, but presently plucks him back, and recovers him. In like manner, Lord, look on me, and recover me speedily, when I fall into sin, lest my next step be into hell.

Christ's look to Peter was a preventing look; he looked on Peter before Peter looked to his Saviour for mercy, and before he looked on himself, or upon his sin, and the danger he was exposed to by it. Glory to my Redeemer, that watches over his people, sees and minds their danger when they themselves are little thinking upon it; he is more careful of them than they are of themselves. How marvellous was Christ's love, that would be so concerned about Peter at such a time, when he himself was amidst his bloody enemies, and upon trial for his life: even then, as it were, he forgets his own danger, and takes notice of the danger of his servant. He being "the great Shepherd of his sheep," ventures all to rescue one of his flock out of "the mouth of the lion, and from the paws of the bear." O who would not desire to belong to the flock of such a faithful, loving, and compassionate Shepherd?

The look Christ gave Peter was a convincing look; it laid open his sin to him, with all its aggravations, which made it very bitter to him. It spoke such language to him as this: "O Peter, what hast thou done? Hast thou cast off thy Saviour? And hast thou said, thou knowest not me, who knew thee from the womb, and am going to die for thee? Dost thou not know me, that called thee from thy nets, that empowered thee to preach the gospel, and work miracles, that kept thee from sinking in the waters? Am I not he thou sawest shining on mount Tabor? Even he thou saidst thou would rather die than deny? O for such a convincing look from Christ, that would pierce and melt my heart, and make me weep bitterly, both now and at his table, for my base ingratitude, in disowning and piercing my dear Redeemer!

Christ's look to Peter was a powerful and overcoming look, it conquered his will, loosed him from the world and sin, and made him yield presently to Christ; he was not able to hold out a moment longer, but, like Joseph, seeks a secret place to weep in. O how powerful is a look from Christ! it is sufficient to bow the most stubborn will, and melt the hardest heart; it can turn "the rock into standing water, and the flint into a foundation of water," Psal. cxiv. 8. How powerful was the look he gave to poor Jerusalem, when "lying in their blood;" a look that caused them to live, Ezek. xvi. 6. How powerful was the look he gave to Zaccheus on the sycamore tree, Luke xix. 5. O for such a look as would bring me presently down, in like manner, from the sycamore of my self-conceit and self-righteousness, and from my best beloved sins and idols, and cause me to receive Christ joyfully into my heart, and go with cheerfulness to his table, and receive the seal of his covenant, saying, "My Lord, and my God."

Christ's look to Peter was a peculiar and distinguishing look; the power and grace of God went along with it to change Peter's heart, and bring him to his right mind. Christ looked on many thousands that were never the better of it. He looked on Judas after he betrayed him, and when he presumed to kiss him, and reproved him too for his base treachery: but neither that look nor reproof melted his heart. As the beams of the very same sun hardens clay and softens frozen earth; so a look from the same Jesus, "the Sun of righteousness," left Judas hard and impenitent, whilst it softened Peter's heart. The one went on in his villany, whilst the other relented, and melted into tears. Why? he looked but on the face of Judas, looked on the heart of Peter. He looked on the one with a frowning judicial look, but looked upon the other with a recovering and drawing look. Christ's look to Peter was accompanied with the inward influences of his Spirit on his heart, otherwise it had been ineffectual. O if he would vouchsafe such a gracious look to my frozen heart, and soften it! I would fain bring my hard heart, and lay it before this blessed Sun, and wait until he draw by the cloud, look through, and shine upon it. Lord, I tremble to go to thy table with this hard heart, lest thou should look on me with anger, as thou didst upon these, Mark iii. 5, upon account of the hardness of their hearts. Lord, I desire to be grieved for my heart-hardness, and to look to thee whom I have pierced by it. Give such a look to my heart as thou gave to Peter's, melt it down into penitential tears, and cause me to go aside "and weep bitterly."

Christ's look caused Peter to remember and think upon Christ's words to him. It is in and by his word that he works upon sinners' hearts. O if the Spirit would bring the word to my mind, set it powerfully home upon my conscience, and so give the happy turn to my soul. Lord, help me to lay up my words, and ponder them in my heart; and O bring them always seasonably to my view, that when I fall, I may not lie long under sin, nor continue in a state of backsliding from thee. May I have such a look from thee, as shall look all my idols out of countenance, and look my wandering heart into a right frame for the covenanting and communicating work: A look that shall put new life in all my drooping graces, and kindle such a flame of love to Christ in my heart, and of indignation against sin, as all the devils in hell shall never be able to quench. A look that shall make me weep while I live, for piercing Christ the Lamb.

O shall others shed tears in plenty for sin, and my eyes remain dry? Shall others get their hearts broken, and mine continue hard? Lord, thy grace is free; O how easy were it for thee to melt my heart, and moisten my eyes: one touch of thy hand, nay, one look of thy countenance, one cast of thine eyes, is sufficient to do it. O turn unto me, and give me one merciful look; for thy ordinance will be lifeless, and lost unto me, if thou look not on me. How can I go to thy table to behold Jesus, my Surety, all red with blood for my red and scarlet-coloured sins, while my heart doth not mourn, nor my eyes run down? Surely the streams of my Saviour's blood deserve to be lamented with tears of blood, and shall not I do it, at least with tears of water? Was he wounded for my transgressions, and shall not my heart bleed and eyes weep for his wounds given him by my sins?

MEDITATION IX.—“AND SHE SAID, TRUTH, LORD, YET THE DOGS EAT OF THE CRUMBS.” MATT. XV. 27.

This woman was a Canaanite, and lived among heathens, yet she had greater knowledge and faith of the Messiah than most of the Jews. Her faith, humility, patience, and resolution, amidst the greatest discouragements, are here recorded for a pattern and encouragement to desponding believers in all ages.

This woman was so sensible of her misery, that she addresses Christ with great earnestness for help: She doth not speak calmly or coldly to Christ, but she cried unto him, and followed him with her cries, ver. 22, 23. Surely, if I were duly affected with my spiritual wants and miseries, I would speak to God in no other language than that of cries and tears. O what cause have I to bewail my coldness and indifferency in prayer, and the little sense I have of my dangers and necessities, which are great beyond expression.

This woman, notwithstanding of her great earnestness and strong faith, met with very great trials and discouragements in her addresses to Christ.

1. Her first trial is Christ's silence to her, when crying to him for mercy, ver. 23, “He answered her not a word.” Strange! not a word from a meek and merciful Saviour, that never put a poor sinner, seeking for mercy, away from him before; but still invited all to come to him for it. That is a sore temptation, Lam. ii. 8, “When I cry and shout, he shutteth out my prayer.” Believers are apt to think that God shuts out their prayers in wrath, when it is not so. Christ heard this woman, accepted her, was pleased with her, and strengthened her to hold on in prayer, though he did not immediately answer her. He entertained her with silence to draw her on to be more importunate, and to try her faith, patience, and perseverance, and thereby to teach us to be followers of those who through faith and patience do now inherit the promises. Christ keeps the door bolted for a time, that we may knock the harder, Matt. vii. 7, “Ask, seek, knock.” The choicest mercies come to us after the greatest wrestlings. Likewise I see here, that there is love in Christ's heart to wrestling souls, even when frowns appear in his looks; wherefore let me take encouragement from him, “though he slay me, yet to trust in him.”

2. Another sore trial the woman met with, was the answer Christ gave his disciples when interceding for her, whereby he seems to exclude her out of his commission, ver. 24, “I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.” The Jews were called sheep, but the Gentiles, dogs. The Jews were indeed to have the free offer of Christ's grace and purchase. Though the woman might have taken Christ's words as a plain repulse, yet she studies to put the best sense on them she can, and continues her importunity. Which teacheth us never to leave the throne of grace for any discouragement.

3. She gets a repulse yet more sharp than the two former, even after she had come close up to him, and fallen down at his feet, saying, “Lord, help me.” Then it is Christ ranks her among the dogs, those that were without the covenant, profane and unclean. Now, one might think, she is cut off by this word, and will insist no more after it. Nay, she takes hold of that word of reproach, and pleads upon it in the text, “Truth, Lord, I am a dog,” vile and unworthy; yet let me humbly ask the dog's room and privilege, even to creep beneath the children's table, and gather some crumbs of mercy. O how much is contained here for our instruction and imitation!

1. What cause have we, O Lord, to bless thy goodness, that we Gentiles, of dogs are now become children, and allowed to come to thy table! And at the same time to fear thy justice, since the Jews, of children, are now become dogs, and shut out as unclean! If they were cut off, who crucified thee in thy low estate, what may we expect, if, by our sins, we crucify thee in thy glory! Let us not be high-minded, but fear.

2. Christ puts the strongest faith of his people upon the sharpest trials: he thinks fit, for his own glory, where he gives much grace, to try grace much.

3. Those who are eminent in faith are most humble: this woman was so. O how humbly did she plead with Christ! She threw herself on the ground, lay low at his feet, and from the dust cried for help; she claimed nothing, only begged for mercy. And when Christ spurned her from his feet, calling her a dog, she doth not murmur nor complain of his harsh carriage, but humbly takes with the charge; "Truth, Lord," thou dost not miscall me, nor call me so bad as I am, "I am a dog," a most vile and unworthy creature, and have no right to the children's bread, and must starve, if thou hast not mercy on me. She can bear any thing, the worst frown or chastisement from Christ, only she cannot bear being excluded from his mercy and grace; she would have some token of it, though never so small: she claims not a Benjamin's meal, nor a child's portion, only let her have a dog's crumb. Lord, I take patiently the stripe from thee; give me but a crumb after it, and I will go away satisfied. Surely the more humble any suppliant is at the throne of grace, he comes still the better speed, for the "Lord resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble."

4. God's usual method of dispensing his mercy and grace to sinners, is, first to cast them down before he raise them up; he first humbles and lays them low in a sense of their unworthiness and vileness, before he advances them to his favour. We must first see ourselves to be as dogs, "less than the least of all God's mercies," before we are fit to be dignified with "the privileges of children."

5. When unbelief draws dismal conclusions from every thing, and tempts us to quit our grips and hopes, upon any dark dispensation, and to say with that wicked king, 2 Kings vi. 33, "This evil is of the Lord: why should I wait for the Lord any longer?" Behold, faith is a valiant and importunate grace, it puts the best construction upon all Christ's actions; it is sharp-sighted, to see and take hold of all advantages to strengthen itself, and finds encouragement even in that which is discouraging. That which seemed to cut off this believing woman's hope, she improves it as a ground of hope, and an argument in prayer, "Truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat," &c. q. d. Even the worthless dogs belonging to the family, and though they may not feast with children at the table, they may creep under it, and gather crumbs, those off-fallings that would be swept to the door, this will not wrong the children. Let me stand in relation to Christ, though in the meanest station, even that of his dog; I will be thankful for it, or for any thing, if he do not turn me out of the house.

6. When our discouragements are greatest, we should learn, from this woman, never to give over the exercise of faith and prayer; but to look on all our disappointments in the success of prayer, as excitements to greater earnestness in prayer. Faith will not set limits to the Holy One; though speedy answers be not given to our prayers, it becomes us to wait on God's time, who is the best judge of the fittest season: "He that believeth will not make haste:" Why? he knows his extremity is God's fit opportunity.

7. A resolute adhering to Christ by faith under trials is most pleasing and acceptable to him; as when we persevere in the use of means when success is small, when we depend upon his promise, and look to his power; when, under the darkest dispensations, we watch over our hearts and steps, that they do not decline from his ways, as those in Psal. xlv. 17, 18. And glory to him that gives us such encouragement for this resolute adherence to him, as the mercifulness of his nature, and his faithfulness, which assure us there is more good will in his heart than is visible in his dealings; and that his providence will never give his word the lie. He gives secret strength to his people to adhere to him when he seems most opposite to them, as he did to this woman. He loves to bring about his people's mercies by means improbable and contrary, to glorify his wisdom. He delights to bring light out of darkness.

8. Great will the reward at last be of the believer's faith, humility, and perseverance in prayer; for, saith Christ at length, ver. 28, "O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt."

MEDITATION X.—"THIS DO IN REMEMBRANCE OF ME." 1 COR. XI. 24.

O my soul, here is a solemn ordinance instituted for keeping up the remembrance of a crucified Jesus; and behold it was appointed by himself, when he was just a going to do more for us than all the angels in heaven could have done, even to make atonement for our sins by his death and sufferings; and he twice repeats his dying charge to us, ver. 24, 25, "This do, this do ye." Men used to regard the command of their dying friends, and perform their wills religiously; and shall not I with pleasure obey the will and command of a dying Redeemer, when the thing he requires is so easy and agreeable, to eat and drink at his table in remembrance of him? If I forget thee, O Friend of sinners, let my right hand forget its cunning, &c.

Our loving Redeemer well knew the treachery of our memories, the worldliness of our hearts, and inconstancy of our affections, that we would be ready to let his death and love slip out of our thoughts, and therefore he would have the signs of his sufferings frequently presented to our eyes. Alas! for the cursed ingratitude of my heart, that is so apt to forget him that remembered me when there was none to pity me: but, glory to him that taketh such pains to cure my forgetfulness, by setting forth Christ crucified so evidently before my eyes, in the broken bread and poured out wine in the sacrament. I look upon this ordinance as a visible representation and commemoration of my Saviour's death and sufferings for his people, which he will have continued till he come again to judgment. It is like a marble pillar set upon his grave, with an inscription bearing account of his glorious achievements and mighty deeds, his glorious sufferings, conflicts, and victories for his people. Wherefore, as oft as he calls me, I will go thither, and put all the honour and respect I can upon my kind Benefactor: I will remember his love, proclaim his worth, and publish his praises. I will hereby own myself before the world to be one of his disciples, and a follower of the Lamb. I will declare my abhorrence of sin that pierced him, and my gratitude to the Lamb for the atoning sacrifice he offered up for me upon the cross. I will triumph in this as the only ground of my hope. I will put the crown on his head, and cast all my crowns down at his feet, and cry, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, and has redeemed me from my sins by his blood; worthy is he to receive all honour, power, glory, and dominion, for ever and ever."

Glory to my dear Saviour, that seeks no greater return for all his labours of love than a thankful remembrance of it at his table. O! shall I grudge to give such a small return to him that suffered the pains of death and hell for me? Had he bid me sacrifice my first-born, give all I have to the poor, or go in pilgrimage to the Holy Land to visit his sepulchre, or go to the top of mount Calvary where the cross stood, as a token of thankfulness for his love, could I have refused it? But he puts me to no such hard task. Lord, thou bidst me not go to a bloody scaffold to remember thee, but to a well-covered table to do it. Thou bidst me not go there to bleed or burn for thee, but to eat and drink; not the bread of affliction, or water of adversity, but bread that strengthens the heart, and wine that cheers the drooping spirit; bread and wine which thou hast sanctified and blessed for me. Surely, O dear Saviour, I owe my life to thee, nay, a thousand lives, if I had them; but it is not my life, but my memory and thoughts, thou art calling for; it is not to die for thee, but to remember thee. Didst thou drink a cup of wrath on the cross for me, and will not I drink a cup of blessing at the table for thee nay for myself, and for my eternal salvation?

Let me go then to this holy table with faith, love, and thankfulness, to remember Christ and his dying love, as he commands me. And while I remember him, let me also receive and embrace him, as my bleeding High Priest, in the arms of my faith, and at the same time throw my guilty soul into his wounded arms for saving me from wrath. Let me go and remember the woundings and piercings of my Redeemer, with a pierced and wounded heart for these cursed sins which nailed and killed the Prince of life. Let me henceforth be the death of sin, which was the death of my dear Saviour. O, shall I suffer sin to live any longer in me, that would not suffer my Redeemer to live in the world!

But let me consider my High Priest beforehand, and what of his sufferings I should remember at his table. I will remember how the glorious Heir of all things denuded himself of his riches and glory, how he left his throne of majesty to lodge in a virgin's womb; yea, to be born among beasts, and cradled in a manger, for such a worm as me. I will remember how he was attacked by the devil, contradicted by sinners, and reproached by the world for my sake. I will remember how sorrowful his soul was in the garden, when the bitter cup was put in his hand; and how he swate, how he prayed, how he fell to the ground, till he was quite overwhelmed with wrath, and covered with his own blood for my sake! I will remember how he was sold for a small price, and basely betrayed by Judas; how he was taken by the soldiers, tied as a malefactor with cords, denied by Peter, forsaken by all his disciples, and left alone among his cruel insulting enemies. I will remember how he was blindfolded, mocked, spit upon, buffeted, and affronted by ruffians a whole night, and patiently suffered all for my sake? I will remember how his lovely countenance was disfigured with blows, and the plucking the hair off his cheeks; and how the sweetest face ever the sun saw was all besmeared with blood and spitting for my sake. I will remember how he that clothed the lilies of the field was himself stripped naked, bound to a pillar and cruelly scourged, till the pavement of Pilate's judgment-hall was all bedewed with his precious blood. I will remember how the crown of thorns was platted with the sharp points turned inward, put upon his head, and driven into his temples with a reed, till they pierced his skull in many places, and a new shower of blood run down his blessed neck. I will remember how the heavy cross-tree was laid upon his scourged and bleeding shoulders, and he made to carry it through the streets of Jerusalem, forth of the gates, and up mount Calvary to the place of execution, until his strength was spent, and he foundered under the burden. I will remember how the cross-tree was laid down, and my Saviour stripped naked and stretched out upon it as a rack; and how he was fastened to it with four big iron nails through his hands and feet, and the cross lifted up and let fall into a deep hole digged for the foot of it, to the violent rending and widening of his sacred wounds by which he hang, until his blood streamed forth at them, and he expired amidst the most exquisite tortures.

I will remember also the sufferings of his soul at that time when the Lord ran upon him as a giant, and made his soul the butt of his envenomed arrows, the poison whereof drank up his spirits until his strength was dried up like a pottsherd. I will remember how his soul was troubled and nonplussed at the distant prospect of this cup; and how sore amazed he was soon after, when it was put into his hand. I will remember how the tasting of it cast him into a bloody sweat and agony, which dyed his garments red, and bedewed the ground whereon he lay. I will remember how he was broken with breach upon breach, till all the sea-billows of divine vengeance went over him, and the Lion of the tribe of Judah was made to roar under the strokes and bruises of the flaming sword, Psal. xxii. 1. I will remember the dreadful hidings of God's face he lay under, until he was made to cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" I will remember the inexorableness of divine justice, that would not spare him one stripe, excuse him one farthing of the debt, nor one drop of the cup; so that he drank till he cried, "It is finished;" and gave up the ghost. Glory to him for his love in finishing the work.

MEDITATION XI.—"FOR I AM IN A STRAIT BETWIXT TWO"— PHIL. I. 23.

As the apostle was in a strait whether to choose to die or live, so I am in a strait whether to go to the Lord's table or to stay back. Now thou callest me, Lord, to celebrate the memorials of thy death, yea, to feast with thee at thy holy table, and I know not what to choose; I am in a strait betwixt two. My heart is so unholy, and my unworthiness so great, I tremble to go forward to feast with a God so holy, and whose purity is infinite; and yet my wants are so many, and my necessity so great, that my case is hopeless if I stay back! Lord, I can go to none else in all the world to supply my needs, but to thyself alone. But O! when I think of going forward, my guilt stops my mouth, and fills me with blushing. Lord, if the holy angels, those pure and unspotted seraphims, who burn in zeal for thy service, must even cover their faces before thee; how shall I venture into thy presence, I whose zeal is so languishing, whose love is so cold, whose mind is so earthly, and prayers so dull? Shall I approach so near a holy God in such a case? But what then shall I do? Shall I join with those worldlings who were bidden to the feast of the great King, refuse, and make my excuse? Then I fear the King will be angry, declare me unworthy to taste of his supper, yea, swear in his wrath that I shall never enter into his rest.

Lord, I abhor myself for my unworthiness and vileness, my guilt and pollution; but where shall I go to get help and remedy for it, but unto thee alone? Hast thou not bidden me come, though my sins be red as crimson? Have not many such come to thee, and found relief and help? Surely, O Lord, thy goodness is greater than my sinfulness, and thy mercy surpasseth my misery; for though my sins reach even to the clouds, yet thy mercy is above the heavens. O merciful Father, extend thy free, boundless mercy to a miserable, helpless sinner: surely misery is the proper object of mercy. Holy God, if thou help me not for the sake of my miseries which I have deserved, yet help me for the sake of thy mercies which thou hast promised in Christ thy dear Son. Wherefore I plead for Christ's sake, that thou wilt hear the cry of my miseries, and not the cry of my sins. O doth not his precious blood cry louder for pardon, than my sins for punishment? Lord, hear the cry of that blood, and let it not be as water spilt upon the ground. For the sake of that prevalent blood, pity, pardon, and accept a poor unworthy creature, that desires to obey thy call, and prepare his heart to seek thee, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary.

O Lord, though I may be ashamed to come to thee, my needs are so pressing and pinching that I cannot stay away. "To whom shall I go but unto thee, for thou hast the words of eternal life?" The whole creation cannot supply my wants. Thou only art my Sun, from whose beams I must receive saving light: thou art my Head, from whom I must get spiritual life: thou art my Root, from which I must derive sap and growth: thou art the Fountain from which I must draw living water: thou art the Treasurer from which I must obtain the riches of grace. So that without thee I am nothing, I have nothing, I can do nothing. To thee then I must go for all my supplies, and out of thy fulness receive grace for grace. Lord, thou hast enough to supply many worlds of needy souls; for the sun is not so full of light, nor the sea so full of water, as thou art full of grace and mercy to needy creatures: and as thou art full, so, I am assured, thou art free, and willing to communicate thy fulness. In spite then of all objections and difficulties, forward to thee I will go, and cast myself down at thy feet; "If I perish,

I perish." O! did ever any perish at mercy's door?

Lord, I have heard of thy mercy to the very chief of sinners, and cannot this mercy reach the like of me? Surely the vile sinner I am, thou hast the fairer opportunity to show the riches of thy mercy, the freeness of thy love, and the efficacy of thy blood; and if I be allowed to share therein, the sweeter and louder will the eternal hallelujahs be, that will be sung to the Lamb of God on my account. O that he would glorify his mercy, his love, and blood, in my relief. O where shall a poor heavy laden sinner go, but to him that can free him of his burden? Where shall I go with a multitude of sins and miseries, but to thee who hast a multitude of tender mercies? Where shall I go with my deep and heinous guilt, but to thee who hast a deep fountain to wash it away? Behold one depth called to another, the depth of my misery to the depth of thy mercy? My wound is great, but thy balm is excellent! My sore is broad, but thy plaster is answerable! "O Lord, be merciful to me, heal my soul, for I have sinned against thee."

Lord, is not the gospel-feast I am invited to, a feast of charity, to which thou callest not the rich, but the poor, maimed, halt, and blind, who cannot make any return for thy bounty? And may not such a miserable object as I am, take encouragement from such a free extensive invitation? Luke xiv. 21.—My blest Redeemer, while he was on earth, did not disdain to eat with publicans and sinners, nor to dine with Simon a leper. And though he is now exalted in the highest heavens, yet he still retains the bowels of a man, and all the pity and charity to perishing sinners he had, while here in his state of humiliation. Wherefore, sensible of my unworthiness, loathing myself for my vileness, and trusting to my Saviour's compassion to the miserable, I desire to go forward to his table: O that he would direct and strengthen me to go about such a weighty work! Let not that ordinance, which God hath instituted for a blessing, be made a curse to me, through my unworthy partaking. Lord, rebuke all unseasonable thoughts and wanderings that would mar the duty; excite and actuate in me every proper grace, and enable me to manage so, that I may not dishonour, but glorify thee; I may not increase my guilt, but augment my grace: I may not bring more hardness, but softness into my heart. Lord, descend thou into my heart, by the influences of thy Spirit, that I may ascend unto thee by the actings of grace; and when the King sits at his table, let my spikenard send forth the smell thereof. Lord, I look to thee for strength, conduct, and through-bearing, in every strait. I trust not in my preparation, but in thy free mercy for acceptance; I trust not in my faith, but in thy faithfulness, who hast promised to give power to the faint; I trust not in my repentance, but in thy free pardoning mercy; I trust not in my doings, but in Christ's doings. O take away my filthy garments, and clothe me with the best robe,—"The Lord our Righteousness"—I will go in the strength of the Lord God; I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only. —Awake, O north-wind, and come thou south, blow upon my garden, that the spices may flow out.—If thy presence go not with me, carry me not up hence.

The Lord made a breach on the Israelites for not seeking him after the due order, 1 Chron. xv. 13. He smote 50,000 of the Bethshemites for an irreverent look into the ark, which typified Christ; and what cause have I then to fear a stroke, should I rashly touch the symbols of his body and blood! Seeing this ordinance is intended for doing honour to the King of Zion, O save me from doing indignity to him, by betraying him with a kiss, or by throwing his picture or great seal into a puddle. May I so separate for this feast, that the blessed Master of it may see I am watchful of his eye, tender of his honour, and fearful of his anger. Lord, awake my heart, stir up my graces, and prepare me for a meeting with my Saviour, and let not my soul, whose only hope is to be saved by Christ's blood, be sent away from his table with the guilt, instead of the benefit, of that blood upon it.

MEDITATION XII.—"BUT MY GOD SHALL SUPPLY ALL YOUR NEED, ACCORDING TO HIS RICHES IN GLORY, BY CHRIST JESUS," PHIL. IV. 19.

Heavenly Father, out of thy rich bounty thou wast pleased once to lay up a great stock for me in my progenitors' hands, but they very soon squandered it all away, so that I became extremely poor and needy. O! what can I do in this indigent condition, but come back to thee for pity and new supplies? For ever blessed be thy name, for the reviving news thou hast published in the gospel, that thou hast now laid up a new stock for bankrupt sinners in the hands of a Surety that cannot fail, and hast erected a throne of grace for such as I am to come to in time of need, where Christ Jesus my Surety sits, as commissioned by thee, with glorious riches to supply my wants. Many are the needs which thou thinkest fit to leave upon me, that I might have the more errands unto his throne, and that thou mayest the oftener hear my voice. O pour out upon me a spirit of grace and supplication, and cause me to delight in approaching to thee, and pouring out my wants before thee.

Behold, Lord, a needy creature, an object of pity, approaching to a liberal Saviour, whose fulness is infinite! O how suitable is it to my wants, which are great and innumerable! I am starving, and have no bread; I am naked, and have no clothing; I am wounded, and have no cure; I am in debt, and have no money; I am polluted, and have no fountain; I am burdened, and have no rest; I have destroyed myself, and can find no help in myself. But yet there is help for me elsewhere; I have heard of the mercy of the King of Israel, and of the remedy he hath provided for those who are helpless, lost, and miserable. Wherefore, though I be poor I will not despair, for thou art the Lord of the whole world, and hast opened thy treasures to the needy. Though I be polluted, I will not despond, for thou hast the fountain of salvation: though I be naked, I will not with Adam run from thee, and hide myself; nay, I will run to thee to cover me with the wool and fleece of the Lamb of God, even the spotless righteousness and innocence of my Saviour: though I be hungry and starving, I will take encouragement from the glad tidings thou hast proclaimed in the gospel of a rich feast for the poor and needy. Lord, I come to thee as the hungry to be fed, as the naked to be clothed, as the wounded to be healed, as the cold starving creature to the fire, as the unclean to be washed in the Fountain that is opened not to the house of David only, but even to the poorest inhabitant in Jerusalem. Glory to God, that it is so free and open to the poor and needy.

Lord, I come not to thy table because I am worthy; but because thou art rich in mercy, and promises that "the needy shall not be forgotten, and the expectation of the poor shall not perish. And that when the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, thou the Lord wilt hear them, and open rivers in the wilderness, and fountains in midst of the valleys." O come, do as thou hast said, pity a poor needy perishing creature, and fill my narrow vessel out of the ocean of thy mercy, where it will not be missed. Come to the feast of thine own appointment, and display thy fulness and liberality. Cast open the doors of thy treasures, and allow me access to Christ's unsearchable riches. Thy word, Lord, assures me that in all ages thou hast bestowed these riches upon the poor and needy, without money and without price. And this warrants me to plead with thee to come to thy house, where many needy beggars are gathered, and scatter thy bounty among them, and admit me to gather with them. O let not such a miserable object go from thy door without an alms, without a crumb of the children's bread, seeing there is bread enough in thy house and to spare. O let none return ashamed from the Fountain who come expecting water. Thou hast promised to pour water upon the thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground. O! is there any more dry, more poor, more needy than I am? Lord, make me as thirsty as I am dry, as humble as I am poor, and as sensible as I am needy. Alas, that I have so little sense of my wants! O! deal not with me according to my sense of need, which is small, but deal with me according to my real need, and thy royal bounty, which is exceeding great.

O that I were poor and needy in my own eyes, and truly sensible of my own wants: that I am drowned in debt to the law and justice of God, owe many thousands, and have not one farthing to pay: that I am destitute of every thing that is good, can do nothing to please God, and am unworthy of the least of his mercies. O that I were made willing to quit all confidence in my own righteousness, duties, frames, or attainments; and well content to go entirely out of myself to Christ, for righteousness to justify me, and for his Spirit and grace to renew and sanctify my nature.

Lord, I am poor, but I see God has treasured up unsearchable riches, and infinite fulness in Jesus Christ, to answer all my needs: I am naked, but I see in Christ a robe of righteousness that is sufficient to cover me, and a whole elect world; I am a starving creature, but in Christ there is the bread of life, and the waters of life for my soul: I am foolish and ignorant, but Christ hath infinite wisdom to teach me and guide me: I am laden with guilt, but Christ's sacrifice is sufficient to atone for it: I have strong lusts and corruptions, but Christ hath a kingly power to subdue them: I am under much darkness, but Christ is "the light of the world:" I am under fears and discouragements, but Christ is "the Consolation of Israel:" I am wounded and sick, but Christ, my Physician, hath excellent balm for me: I am under a burden of debt, but Christ, my Surety, is rich and fully able to pay it: I am in prison, and under bonds, but Christ opens prison doors, and looses them that are bound: I am fatherless by Adam's fall, but Christ is the everlasting Father, "in whom the fatherless find mercy:" I have many enemies to pursue and accuse me, as law, justice, Satan, and conscience: but Christ my Advocate can answer them all. Therefore I flee to him for refuge, I close with him in all his offices, and put my whole confidence in him.

It gives great encouragement to my poor needy soul, that I have a Saviour so full of goodness and pity to look to, a mighty agent in heaven to plead my cause, and to present my bills, petitions, and supplications, to the Father. I put all my requests and concerns in his hand, and commit them to his care and management; he knows the fittest time to present them, and to send me an answer. In the sacrament I swear allegiance to thee, as my Sovereign Lord and King, over thy broken body and shed blood; I engage to be a true and faithful soldier in thy army, and to take the field against thy enemies. Many pieces of furniture do I need for this warfare; I need the girdle of sincerity, the shield of faith, the helmet of hope, the sword of the Spirit, the breastplate of righteousness, and to have my feet shod with the preparation of peace. But glory to thy name, my Redeemer and Captain of salvation hath provided a noble armoury and store-house to answer all these my necessities and wants. Lord, supply all my needs out of thy infinite fulness, and furnish me with every thing requisite and necessary for the work and warfare thou callest me unto. O my enemies are lively, and they are strong: but I look to my glorious Captain, to gird me with strength for the battle, and to teach my hands to war.

MEDITATION XIII.—“AND TO KNOW THE LOVE OF CHRIST, WHICH PASSETH KNOWLEDGE.” EPH. III. 19.

Where shall I begin my thoughts upon the subject of the love of Christ to men? And when begun, how shall I make an end? It hath a breadth and length, a depth and height, that passeth knowledge. If the apostle Paul, that had the brightest discoveries of this love, owned this, much more may I. I may sooner find out the height of heaven, the breadth of the earth, or the depth of the sea, than measure Christ's love. It is an unfathomable ocean that hath neither bank nor bottom. O whither did his love carry him? From the height of glory to the depth of misery. How low and deep was our fall, that nothing could recover and raise us up, but the low abasement of the Son of God, the King of glory? How low was the step he made to help us up; even to put on our nature, and suffer himself to be pierced for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities? Blessed Lord, thou tookest not on thee the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham; these are fast bound up from thee with chains of darkness, whilst thou drawest us to thee with cords of love! How distinguishing was thy love to man, that brought thee from heaven to earth, from the throne to the manger, from the manger to the wilderness, from the wilderness to the garden, from the garden to the judgment-hall, from the judgment-hall to the cross, from the cross to the grave; yea, from the glory of heaven, to the very torments of hell! And all for creatures that were black and ugly as hell. How wonderful is the sight thou callest me to see at the Lord's table? even to see him suffering for sin, that never committed sin! To see “him made sin for us, who knew no sin, that we,” who knew no righteousness, “might be made the righteousness of God in him!” An amazing sight indeed!

“Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him!” O what is he, that thou shouldst magnify and set thy heart on him? And what am I, the worst of men, and vilest of sinners, that thou shouldst stoop so low to exalt me! That thou should endure the poverty of this world, that I might enjoy the riches of heaven? Be content to live in the form of a servant, that I might have the adoption of sons! Be willing to bow thyself unto death, to raise me to eternal life! Content to be numbered among transgressors, that I might have a room among the blessed! To be crowned with thorns, that I might be crowned with glory! To be condemned before men, that I might be justified before God! To drink the bitter cup of wrath, that I might drink the pure river of life! To cry out in sorrow upon the cross, that I might triumph with joy upon the throne! To stand before the mouth of hell-furnace, to keep its flames from breaking out on me! O Lord Jesus, thy love hath over-flown all banks, and thy compassion knew no bounds! Can I think on it, and my heart not burn? Can I speak of it, and not be overcome, so as to seek, with Joseph, a secret place to weep in!

O love that passeth knowledge! How shall I think of it, and not stand amazed! That the General should die for the soldier, the Physician for the patient! That the righteous Judge of heaven should come to the bar, put himself in the malefactor's clothes, and be condemned for him! That the blessed Son of God should interpose his innocent breast to receive the mortal stroke for us! That God all-sufficient should be exposed to hunger and thirst, to grief and weariness, and the vilest reproaches and indignities, for worms like us! Behold the Creator of the world wounded, mangled, and killed, by ungrateful creatures whom he came to save! Behold his bowels yearning towards them who raked in them with their bloody hands! Behold his heart burning with affection toward them that cruelly pierced it! Surely a believing view of this love of Christ is sufficient to mollify a heart more cold and frozen than ice itself! O love unfathomable! Who can measure its dimensions! It hath a height without a top, a depth without a bottom, breadth without a side, length without end! Astonishing love! that my exalted Lord should stoop so low as to become a man; nay, a poor man, a man of sorrows, a deserted man, a dying man, and also a dead man, for such a wretch as me! Nay, more, that he should stoop to be made a curse, and undergo a dreadful load of wrath upon his innocent soul, infinitely more heavy than what is laid upon any damned soul in hell!

O what a sea of wrath did my loving Jesus swim through, to save me from perishing! Behold how that raging sea wrought and was tempestuous, roared most terribly, and threatened to swallow me up with the rest of the elect world; till once my Redeemer stepped in, and undertook to be the sacrifice for calming the sea! Take me up, said he, like Jonah, and throw me into the sea, and ye shall be all safe. In this Red sea our blessed Jonah was content to swim for thirty-three years, without seeking deliverance, till once the sea was perfectly calm, and every elect soul out of danger. Marvellous loving-kindness! O that I could, with a suitable frame of heart, both remember and admire redeeming love and redeeming blood, when I go to sit down at my Redeemer's table. O that I may there get faith's sight of the various instances of his love, "that passeth knowledge." Let me there view Christ in the womb, and in the manger; in his weary steps and hungry bowels; in his prostration in the garden, and clotted drops of bloody sweat. Let me view his head with a crown of thorns, and his face besmeared with the soldiers' spit. Let me view him in his march to Calvary, and his elevation on a painful cross, with his head bowed down, and his side streaming blood! O unparalleled love! It had been wonderful love to have sent one of the lofty seraphims to suffer for us; but to give him whom all the seraphims serve and adore, is "love that passeth knowledge!" Let me view the scripture designations and titles of "him that loved us, and gave himself for us," that he might wash us in his blood.

He is our "Emmanuel, the Wonderful, the Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of peace, the King of kings, and the Lord of lords, the Prince of the kings of the earth, the Lord of glory, the Rose of Sharon, the Plant of renown, the Brightness of his Father's glory, the express Image of his Person, the Bright and Morning Star, the Sun of righteousness, the Light of the world, the Head of the Church, the Beginning and First-born from the dead, the appointed Heir of all things." This is "he that loved us, and gave himself" to die for the redemption of a crew of rebels, grace-abusing and gospel-slighting sinners! O what am I that thou shouldst spare, yea, ransom and feast me in such a manner! Long ago mightest thou have shaken off the hand of thy providence such a viper as I am into fire unquenchable; and there made me to know, in sad experience, what it is to abuse free grace, by the loss of eternal glory. But, instead of that, thou hast pitied me, loved me, become my Surety, to appease justice for my heinous sins by thy blood, when no other sacrifice would do. Lord, I welcome thy love-feast; I lay my hand on the head of the Sacrifice, and rest upon it; "I believe, Lord, help my unbelief." O that I may henceforth live under the continual sense of my infinite obligations to my glorious Surety, that could make "his soul an offering for my sin." O what return shall I give him for all his soul-travel and agonies for me? O that I could spend my whole life, and each day of it, in magnifying his love, and living to his praise. Now, "blessed be his glorious name for ever and ever; let the whole earth be filled with his glory." Amen and Amen.

MEDITATION XIV.—"AND BEING IN AN AGONY,—HIS SWEAT WAS AS IT WERE GREAT DROPS OF BLOOD," LUKE XXII. 44.

O my soul, this text affords thee great subject of thoughts, when thou goest to remember thy dear Saviour at his table. Here I see him in a bloody agony! And, first, let me observe the place where his agony began, the garden of Gethsemane, which lay in the valley of Jehoshaphat, on the east side of Jerusalem, at the foot of the mount of Olives. Now, it was in the valley of Jehoshaphat that God did plead with the nations in Christ their Surety, Joel iii. 2. The word Gethsemane signifies a mill or press for olives, as being probably the place where they pressed the olives that grew on the mount, and there squeezed the oil out of them. In this place it pleased the Lord to bruise Christ, our true olive, that so out of his fullness the fresh oil of his merit and grace might flow abundantly to needy souls. Never was there such an olive pressed there before, since the first planting of that mount! Never was there such precious oil seen as Jesus' blood! O that I may partake of the root and fatness of that good Olive which was pressed here, and of that oil, which will make my grace to grow, and my face to shine!

As it was in a garden that man's sin and misery first began, so it was in a garden that our blessed Surety began his last expiatory sufferings for sin, which cast him into a fearful agony. As the garden of Eden produced man's misery; so the garden of Gethsemane provided a remedy. O that when I walk and retire myself in a garden, I may have grace to think seriously, and with suitable affections, upon the sins of men, and the sufferings of my Saviour for them! and, at the same time, to send up my ejaculations to God for an interest in his agony and atonement, and for the comfortable intimation thereof to my soul. When my dear Redeemer was in his agony of soul, I read of his offering up "prayers and supplications, to God, with strong crying and tears," Heb. v. 7. And have I no prayers nor tears to offer up to God at the remembrance of his agony? especially when I consider how much my sin contributed to throw him into it. O how strong and bitter were my Surety's cries at this time, when God bruised his soul, and poured down a flood of his wrath upon him! He cried, till he was spent with crying; he grew hoarse with it, and his throat so dried, that he could cry no more, Psal. lxxix. 3. Now was his soul in travail, and great cause had he for his strong crying and tears! He was silent, under all the pains of his body, and under his sufferings from men; all that time he is dumb, "as a sheep before her shearers:" but, behold, when fierce wrath from God alighted on his soul, he cried vehemently; and he prayed most earnestly and importunately for support and through-bearing under this terrible storm. O that, from my Saviour's example, I may learn, when under soul trouble and inward distress, to make my prayers to God more earnest and fervent, and to persevere without weariness and fainting; which I have great encouragement to do from this, that my Saviour's fervent prayers and tears have made way for mine.

I observe also, in this passage, that the agony of Christ's soul increased so much, that it produced a sweat of blood over his body; yea, great drops or clods of blood, which by his violent agony, burst through his very clothes, and watered the ground where he lay. O what trouble and anguish, pangs, and sorrows, desertions and strugglings must his soul have endured at this time, under the burden of God's wrath for his people's sins, which put his sacred body and blood into such a dreadful commotion and ferment! O what a prodigious and preternatural sweat was this! Never was the like heard of since the world began! According to the course of nature, Christ's lying in the open air, in a cold night, upon the cold ground, with the greatness of his consternation, should have drawn all his blood inward from the external parts of his body; but Christ's sweating and bleeding was altogether preternatural. He sweat without external heat, he bled without external wound. The fire of divine wrath, now kindled in his soul, was so very hot and raging, that it made the blood about his heart to boil, and burst through both flesh and garments. He had received at this time, no wound nor external violence from any hand; no Judas, no soldier, no tormentor, had yet attacked him; no spear, no nail, no thorn, or scourge, had yet touched his sacred body, and yet he bleeds most plentifully! O but the sword of justice had reached him, and made a deep wound and wide gash in his soul; at which breach a sea of wrath brake in with such violence that it overwhelmed him; made him fall first on his knees, and then flat on the ground, where he lay agonizing and crying, till all the waves and billows of divine vengeance went over him. O! what a dreadful pressure was my Saviour's soul under at this time! What squeezing anguish had he about his heart, that made his body to struggle and sweat in such a manner, so that every pore of his body became a bleeding wound! O how awfully should I be affected with this tragical sight! How thankfully should I remember my Redeemer's love, when he calls me to do it at his holy table!

In my Saviour's agony I may see, as in a glass, the malignant evil and cursed nature of sin, that no less could atone for it than the soul-travail and agony of the dear Son of God! Can I ever make light of sin, when I view the great drops of blood standing above his garments, while he lay grovelling on the earth in the anguish of his soul! Shall I not henceforth abhor sin, and stand in awe of offending a just and holy God, seeing it is such a fearful thing to fall into his hands: "If such things were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" Was the cup of wrath so terrible to the innocent human nature of Christ, when presented to him, that he shrunk and cried out? O what will it be to guilty sinners! Here I may see how costly the redemption of souls is; ere this could be compassed, God must become man, Eternity must suffer death, the Lord of angels must weep in a cradle, the Creator of the world must hang like a slave! He must lie in a manger at Bethlehem, cry in an agony at Gethsemane, die on a cross at Calvary! Unspotted Righteousness must be made sin, and unblemished Blessedness must be made a curse! O did Christ value souls at so high a rate! and shall men be so foolish as to throw them away for a thing of nought?

Here I may see the great difficulty of making peace with God, when once his law is broken; no less could do it than the blood and soul-agony of the Son of God; even an infinite ransom must be paid, ere God would be reconciled to man. O how much am I beholden to Christ that undertook the reconciliation, that prevented my ruin by taking the cup out of my hand? O the cup he drank for me was mingled with wrath and curses, a cup full of vengeance, pressed down, heaped up, shaken together, and running over; a cup, which, if men or angels had but tasted, they had reeled, staggered, and fallen headlong into hell. Yet, said Christ, ere any of my elect ones drink it, I will drink it for them; reach it hither to me bitter as it is. O how ready was Christ to engage for men! and how willing was he to perform! How ready, full, and free, was the fountain of his blood to wash the defiled! Behold how freely it issued forth before a wound was opened; all his veins and pores poured it forth, without waiting for the tormentors. Lord, make me as willing and ready to apply to it. Did Christ wrestle in an agony to obtain the redemption of lost sinners; and shall not I wrestle as in an agony to get an interest in this redemption; and the evidence thereof cleared up to my soul! O for faith and fervency in prayer, that I may wrestle without ceasing for the assurance of his love, that I may go with joy to his table.

MEDITATION XV.—“HE OPENED NOT HIS MOUTH; HE IS BROUGHT AS A LAMB TO THE SLAUGHTER,” ISA. LIII. 7.

It becomes me to read and consider these words with great attention, seeing they were the occasion of the Ethiopian eunuch's conversion; for it was while he read and thought on these words, that God sent Philip to join him, Acts viii. 29. O that God would, in like manner, send his Holy Spirit to join me while I am meditating on them.

1. I observe that Christ is the great sacrifice provided by God to make atonement for our sins; he is the great antitype and substance of all the lambs and beasts that were offered up in sacrifice under the law, and therefore he is often in the New Testament called “the Lamb, the Lamb of God, and the Lamb slain.” The Spirit of God seems to have a peculiar delight in dwelling upon this type of “the Lamb,” more than in any other of the Old Testament types; and should not I delight in it too, and often with pleasure make mention of “the Lamb, the worthy Lamb,” that will be the object of the praises of saints and angels through all eternity?

2. Christ is represented by a lamb, to point out the innocence of his person, the meekness of his nature, the usefulness of his benefits, and his patience under sufferings. How patient is the lamb under injuries! it is silent both before the shearer and the butcher; it parts with its fleece in shearing-time, and with its life in slaughter-time, without any noise or resistance. Dogs and swine howl and cry when violence is offered to them, but the lamb is quite silent. So Christ, the Lamb of God, opened not his mouth under the greatest revilings, mockings, buffetings, spitings, piercings, and the most cruel death which he suffered from men, 1 Pet. ii. 23; and hence it is said in the text, when he was led to the slaughter, “he opened not his mouth.” He opened not his mouth, unless it was to bless, teach, or pray for those who injured him; yea, he not only did pray, but also plead an excuse for them, “Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.” And after his resurrection, how ready was this meek Lamb to forgive all that wronged him! When giving orders to preach remission of sins to a lost world, he bids begin at Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 46, where they mocked and pierced him, because there they had greatest need of his blood to wash them from guilt. How meekly did our blessed Lamb behave to Peter when he denied him in his own hearing? He did not turn and frown upon Peter, as he well deserved, though he might have frowned him into hell; it is said only, “He turned and looked on Peter,” Luke xxii. 61, not with an angry look, but with an affectionate melting look, which recovered him to a penitent frame: neither did he afterwards upbraid him with his carriage. O meek Lamb of God! can I remember thee at thy table, without being filled with remorse and grief for my impatience under injuries, and the proneness of my heart to resent them? Shall I not be ashamed of my unchristian temper, when I see my meek and loving Jesus willing to be the sport and derision of men and devils, that he might be the author of salvation to perishing souls? O! how astonishing is it to see the Creator affronted by the creature, the Potter by his clay, the King of glory by worms of the earth, and yet hold his peace? Now is the Head so meek and patient, and should not the members be so too? O how unseemly is it to see a company of fierce lions following a meek Lamb? O that I could learn more of him that is meek and lowly in heart!

3. Here I see the greatest instance of divine love that ever the world saw. Behold an offended God willing to spare wretched criminals, and take satisfaction from a Surety in their room; and he himself finds out the Lamb to be the sacrifice, even his eternal Son, who willingly undertook to assume a body for that end. How astonishing are the Lamb's words, Heb. x. 5, “Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me;” as if he had said, “Father, since all the legal sacrifices are insufficient to satisfy thy justice, atone for sin, and ransom precious souls; even take the body thou hast prepared for me, let that be the sacrifice to justice; it is more valuable than any other, being the tabernacle of my divine Person; it will bring glory to thy offended justice, and satisfy it to the full. I yield myself willingly to be the prisoner of justice, and go quietly as a lamb to the slaughter; not dragged to it, as an ox or a bullock, but meekly and pleasantly, like a lamb.” When, according to this agreement, justice required the Lamb to be sacrificed, O how patient and silent was he under all the accusations laid against him, though he was wholly innocent; he would say nothing in his own defence; at which Pilate, not knowing the cause of his silence, marvelled greatly, having never seen the like before. But our Lamb considered that he stood not only at Pilate's bar, but also at the bar of God's justice as our Surety, bearing our guilt; and though man had nothing to lay to his charge, yet he knew what divine justice had to charge upon him, and therefore he is silent and answers nothing, that he might not hinder our redemption, nor stop the payment of our debt. When justice charged him with our sins, our unbelief, pride, covetousness, &c., he might have said, "O Father, these transgressions are not mine, I never offended thee;" but he will do nothing to rescue himself. Therefore, when the fearful charge of the whole sins of an elect world was exhibited against him, and the sword of justice drawn, ready to strike, he opened not his mouth, but takes with the charge, as if he had been guilty of all. Glory to the silent Lamb for ever, that would not hinder our release from punishment, but meekly took the stroke for us.

4. Behold this meek Lamb, before he was brought to the slaughter, led up and down from place to place; from the garden to the high-priest, from the high-priest to Pilate, from Pilate to Herod, from Herod back to Pilate, from Pilate to Calvary. Behold him mocked, abused, and disgraced by them, buffeted and spit upon, crowned, scourged, and pierced, and yet never resists nor complains. He willingly "gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, and hid not his face from spitting." Now the meek Lamb is content, as the ram caught in the thicket, to be slaughtered and sacrificed in our room, who were lying bound, like Isaac, to have been the sacrifice. O! it was our sins that platted the thorns; they also were the reed that drove them into his temples, yet he opened not his mouth.

5. Now this slaughtered Lamb is set before my eyes in the sacrament, and God's call to me is, "Behold the Lamb of God," John i. 29. Now let me behold him with an earnest and steady look, with faith and expectation, that I may get healing to all my diseases. As no stung Israelite got healing from the brazen serpent unless they looked to it, so none can get benefit from Christ unless they behold him. May I never look away from this Lamb to my tears, convictions, prayers, reformations, or any thing else; seeing the best of duties will make bad saviours. If I expect salvation from other things, I am undone, for there is no other name given under heaven whereby men can be saved: but if I look to the Lamb of God, my salvation is secured by his promise, Isa. xlv. 22.

6. There was no house in Egypt safe from the destroying angel, but those who had their doors sprinkled with the blood of the paschal lamb: so there is no soul safe from the sword of revenging justice, but those who by faith put themselves under the protection of the blood of this slain Lamb. Let me therefore take the bunch of hyssop, faith, and dip it in the basin of the new covenant, and sprinkle this blood on my guilty soul, and so I shall be safe.

7. How blessed is their characters who follow the Lamb, Rev. xiv. 4. May I follow him as my Physician to cure me, my Righteousness to justify me, my Life to quicken me, my Husband to supply my wants, my Guide to conduct me, my Pattern to direct me in my steps. Let me learn, from his example, to be patient without murmuring when I am under affliction. Let me learn meekness towards men, when I meet with reproaches or injuries from them. Let me learn a readiness to obey God's call to every duty. O did Christ go willingly to the slaughter for us; and shall I be backward to pray, communicate, part with sin, or do any thing he requires of me? Let me, in all duties and ordinances, seek after the Lamb's presence, seeing my eternal happiness lies in being ever with the Lamb, and to be fed and led by him, Rev. vii. 16.

MEDITATION XVI.—"IN WHOM WE HAVE REDEMPTION THROUGH HIS BLOOD," EPH. I. 7.

How dismal is our case by nature! We are slaves to sin and Satan, and prisoners to the justice of God, being sentenced to die, doomed to wrath, and reserved to public judgment and execution. In this miserable condition were all mankind, until Christ came to ransom us. And O how difficult and costly was our redemption to Christ! no less could be the price of it than his precious blood. The glorious Son of God, who created heaven and earth, must become a creature, be born of a woman, and pour out his blood on an ignominious cross, before we could be redeemed from sin and wrath. O how valuable must the blood of this infinite Person be! What is the blood of earthly kings and princes to this blood! Surely one drop of it is of more value than an ocean of theirs! and yet every drop of this blood was poured out upon the ground for our redemption. In this blood I see sundry things:

1. The amazing love of Christ in shedding his blood for the redemption of such creatures as I am; creatures most ugly, that had lost the image of God, and got Satan's image pictured in its room, and were thereby become black as hell. Creatures, loathsome as dead carcasses, being dead in trespasses; and yet those he loved so as to shed his blood, and bleed to death for them. For as lovely as Sarah was while alive, yet when dead, Abraham could look on her no more, but would have her buried out of his sight. But Christ said not so of his elect spouse when dead; no, said he, let me bleed and die for her to bring her to life; though at the same time she was more loathsome than Job with his boils, Lazarus with his sores, any dead carcass with vermin. O what cause could be given for the love of a bleeding Jesus? Well might he say, "I loved you, because I loved you; and I loved you freely." And O with what sorrow, pain, and agony, was his bleeding love attended, while his dear soul was overwhelmed with the terrible billows of his Father's wrath! Christ knew well beforehand all these sufferings, and all the ingredients in the cup, yet he would needs drink it for us. He foresaw the poison of God's arrows that would drink up his spirits; the burning thirst that the heat of divine wrath would create in him; yet willingly did he go to bleed and die, like a lamb to the slaughter. "O love that passeth knowledge!"

2. In Christ's blood I see the glory of infinite wisdom displayed. Who could have found out a way to reconcile justice and mercy, and satisfy both their demands about Adam's fallen race? A general council of angels could never have thought of the Son of God being made flesh and shedding his blood! How shocking would the suggestion have been, if God had not made it. But behold hereby infinite wisdom hath discovered a way to gratify both justice and mercy; to punish sin, and yet pardon the sinner; to maintain the honour of the law-giver, and yet preserve the life of the law-breaker. Hereby mercy is satisfied in sparing the rebel; and yet justice more glorified, and sin rendered more odious, than if the sinner himself had been eternally damned for it. Nay, though all the men on earth had been cast into hell-fire for sin, and the angels with them, it had been no such instance of justice, as Christ's bleeding and dying for sin: for what is the punishing of creatures, to the suffering of the Creator!

3. This blood being the blood of God, hath infinite virtue and efficacy; it hath purchased the church of God, and all grace and glory to her, Acts xx. 28; it protects all who come under the covert of it from the wrath of God, Exod. xii. 13, "When I see the blood, I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt." This blood, which is the price of our redemption, hath marvellous effects; it pleads for the guilty, and obtains pardon of sin, peace with God, nearness to and communion with him. It cleanses, heals, satisfies, and beautifies perishing souls; it seals the new testament, overcomes our enemies, liberates the prisoners, opens heaven's gates, and gives boldness to enter in. The person of our Redeemer being preferable to a million of worlds full of men and angels, his blood alone might well serve for an elect world. What sins can be so heinous or so numerous, but the blood of God can wash away? This was famous Cranmer's support that day he suffered martyrdom; when his heinous sin of renouncing the truth stared him in the face, and he was greatly dejected for it; he brake out, "Surely God was made flesh, and shed his blood, not for lesser sins only, but for great sins also:" this relieved him, and made him die with courage. This blood can help in all straits, deliver from all fears, and is able to save to the uttermost. It hath saved many who have condemned themselves, and thought their salvation impossible. It hath eased many consciences, when the terrors of the Almighty have surrounded them, and his arrows have stuck fast in them. It hath unstung death, and carried many safe through its darkest valleys. This blood hath cleansed many whose hearts were filthy as the mire, and whose lives swarmed with the most abominable lusts; such as the Corinthians, 1 Cor. v. 11; and three thousand of those who had imbrued their hands in shedding of it, Acts ii. 36. Nay, it is able to take away the sins of a world, John i. 29, and much more the sins of any one soul, though like a mountain for weight, or the sand for number.

4. I see this redeeming blood to be a suitable remedy for all my maladies; O that I could look to it by faith, apply it to my sores, and plead it with God: "Lord, I am an unrighteous creature, but here is justifying blood; my heart is unholy, but here is sanctifying blood; my soul is wounded, but here is healing blood; my lusts are strong, but here is mortifying blood; my heart is hard, but here is softening blood; my affections are dead, but here is quickening blood; my love is cold, but here is heart-warming blood. When I am at the holy table, I am near this blessed remedy; O let me not miss a cure, when the balm of Gilead is among my hands; let me not perish in my guilt beside the open Fountain. O! this blood hath healed thousands, and shall I remain under my plagues? Lord, let that innocent blood, which ran from thy hands, heart, and side, drop on my guilty soul, and cleanse me from all sin. O my glorious bleeding Lamb, 'if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.' O say to me, as thou didst to the leper, 'I will, be thou clean.' Surely thy blood is more able to save me, than my sins are to destroy me."

5. How just is it, that I should commemorate the shedding of this blood in the way that Christ appoints? Lord, help me to go to thy table, and realize the shedding of this blood to myself, as much as if I had stood by the cross, and seen it with my eyes flowing from his wounds. Let my faith be the evidence of things not seen, and let it realize the shedding of Christ's blood as evidently to me, as if I had actually seen it. Ah! I cannot say it is so, while my eyes are so dry, and my heart so hard; alas for my stupid unconcerned heart, that doth not hurst into love and tears at the sacramental view of this blood-shedding! How can I see these hands, that sway the sceptre of the heavens, nailed to the tree of reproach, and not mourn? How can I see those feet, that trample on the powers of hell, nailed to a tree, and not weep? Did the earth tremble, rocks rend, sun hide, and heavens darken, and will not my rocky heart rend for sin, that caused all? Since thou, Lord, comes to me in streams of blood, let me go forth and meet thee with streams of tears. O! shall I be more sparing of my tears for Christ, than he was of his blood for me? Can I see this precious blood run down in streams, and my eyes not pour out some drops? Can I refuse drops of water for streams of blood? Can I see the blood of the King of kings spilled like water on the ground, and the earth drinking it up, and my heart not rend for shedding it? O that "my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night" for the slain Lamb of God!

6. How dreadful must the crime be, to tread this blood under foot by unbelief, or unworthy communicating! "Had Zimri peace, that slew his master?" And can I have peace, if I be guilty of the blood of him that is my Master and Redeemer both? How sad will my case be, if that blood, which alone can procure my pardon, shall cry for my eternal punishment? "Deliver me from blood guiltiness, O God." O that I could value and esteem, plead, and apply this precious blood more! Lord, accept of it as a full satisfaction for all my sins, and an all-sufficient price for my soul's redemption. Is not one drop of thy Son's blood of more value than a sea of mine? My sins, alas! have shut me out of paradise, but O let this blood open paradise to me again; and let me, through this Red sea, enter into the heavenly Canaan; I know I can have no other passage to it. Lord, impute not the guilt, but the merit of this blood to me.

MEDITATION XVII.—"HE SHALL COME DOWN LIKE RAIN UPON THE MOWN GRASS, AS SHOWERS THAT WATER THE EARTH," PSALM LXXII. 6.

This is spoken and promised of Christ, and serves to teach us, that Christ coming to his church and people, by the gracious influences of his Holy Spirit, is most useful and refreshing to their souls, like showers of rain to the dry ground, or a meadow newly cut, to make it spring again.—Christless souls are like the dry ground, without the moisture of saving grace, their hearts are hard; neither rods, mercies, nor sermons, make impression upon them. Why? they are without Christ, the Fountain of grace and spiritual influences. Before the fall, man's soul was like a well-watered garden, beautiful, green, and fragrant; but by his apostacy from God, in Adam our first head, the springs of grace and holiness are quite dried up in his soul; and there is no curing of this drought, but by the soul's union with a new Head, namely, Christ, our second Adam, who has the Spirit given him without measure, for the use of his members.—Now, when we are united by faith to Christ, our Head of influences "the dry land is turned into watersprings;" Christ comes down as the rain by his Spirit of regeneration, and brings the springs of grace into the soul. He is the first and immediate receptacle of the Holy Spirit, and of all the regenerating and sanctifying influences, and out of his fulness we must by faith receive them. And when at any time the springs of grace are interrupted in the soul by sin or unbelief, so as the ground turns dry, the plants wither, and the things which remain are ready to die; the soul hath need to look up to Jesus Christ, to come down with new showers upon the thirsty ground, and decayed plants.

1. As the rain is the free gift of God to the dry ground, it comes free and cheap to poor and rich, small and great, and costs them nothing: so Christ, with his blessings, is God's free gift to a dry perishing world, for which we should continually be thankful. 2. As nothing can stop the falling of rain; so nothing can hinder Christ's gracious influences, when he designs to awake, convince, or soften a hard heart. When those showers do fall on sinners, the most obstinate will must yield, and cry, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" 3. As the rain is most necessary and suitable to the dry ground, and to the various plants it produceth, and also to the different parts of every plant or tree; such as the root, trunk, branches, leaves, flowers, and fruit; so Christ is absolutely necessary, and his influences most suitable, to all his people's souls, and to every faculty of them, the understanding, will, memory, and affections; and to all their different graces, faith, love, repentance, &c. to root and stablish them, strengthen and confirm them, quicken and increase them, cherish and preserve them. 4. As the rain comes down in divers ways and manners to the earth, sometimes with cold winds and tempests, thunders and lightnings; and at other times with calmness and warmth: so Christ comes to sinners, sometimes with sharp convictions and legal terrors, and sometimes with alluring invitations and promises. 5. O how pleasant are the effects of rain to languishing plants, to make them green and beautiful, lively and strong, fragrant and fruitful? So the effects of Christ's influences are most desirable to drooping souls, for enlightening and enlivening them, for confirming and strengthening them, for comforting and enlarging them, for appetizing and satisfying them, transforming and beautifying them.—A shower from Christ would soon make the church, though withered, turn green and beautiful, and send forth a smell as of a field that the Lord hath blessed; and likewise some drops of this shower, falling down upon the languishing graces of communicants, would soon make them vigorous and lively in showing forth their Saviour's death at his table.

Here I may see the reason why many souls continue as dry ground in their parched natural condition, while others near them are flourishing and fruitful; Christ's shower hath come down upon the one, and not upon the other; one piece is rained upon, and another piece is dry and withered, according to that word in Amos iv. 7. O, what cause is there to bewail the evident symptoms of this continuing natural drought in multitudes of souls! Why? their hearts are hard, impenetrable, and unaffected with the miserable state they are in by nature, and with the woeful plagues of their hearts. They have no sense or feeling of the evil nature of sin, notwithstanding of all the reproofs and threatenings of the word, or the rods and strokes it brings upon them; or of the sufferings of Christ for sin. And though God assures them, that the end of dry ground is cursing and burning, they are impenitent and unconcerned under all. O if parched souls in their natural estate were made sensible of their misery, and brought to bewail their case, and say, "O I am as the heath in the desert, that sees no rain; I am a dry tree; If I continue in this state, I will be cut down as cumbering the ground, and made fuel to hell-fire. I see the axe of justice laid to my root, every hour I am in danger of the blow. O if Christ would interpose to spare me, and come down upon me as the rain, and bring the moisture of grace into my soul."

How lamentable also is the case of those who once seemed to be watered by this heavenly rain, and now are parched by a long consuming drought and withering wind! They have lost their former greenness and moisture, their spirituality and liveliness, and their duties are quite dwindled away into a lifeless carcase and dead formality. They have lost their wonted freedom and enlargement in prayer, and are fallen under sad bonds and straitenings of spirit, which makes them count holy things a weariness, and frequently neglect secret prayer. Surely such have great need of Christ's coming down upon them as the rain, to make them spring up as the grass, and revive as the corn. Alas, we have a sinful hand in bringing on such a spiritual drought, by quenching the motions of the Spirit, indulging fleshly lusts, giving the world Christ's room in the heart, and neglecting to live by faith on the Son of God, who is the Rain and Dew of Israel.

How happy are those who live under the droppings of this rain! They are like trees planted by the waters, their roots spread forth, and their leaves are green, Jer. xvii. 8. "Have I the signs of such persons? Is my heart ready to melt at sight of a crucified Jesus set before me in the sacrament? Do I mourn for my sins that pierced him? Am I ready to think worse of myself than any other person can? Is my heart soft and pliable to the will of God, both in his precepts and providences? Do the world's good things bulk but little in my eye? Is it my desire to meet with Christ in every duty and ordinance? Do I still look on sin as Christ's enemy? Am I afraid of provoking him by sin to withhold the showers, and make the heavens as brass to me? Am I desirous to bring forth fruit answerable to the waterings he graciously allows me." O may I find these marks in my soul.

O that I could earnestly plead for the fulfilling of this promise in the text, that Christ would come down as the rain, that he would send the showers he hath merited and promised, send them to myself, to the church, and to the whole land; to the present age and to the rising generation. O what glorious effects would these showers produce! They would beautify the church and her assemblies, make both ministers and professors to shine in holiness, and congregations to be lively in worship. They would open prison-doors, loose bonds, enlarge hearts, revive drooping souls, turn their water into wine, their sorrow into joy, their complaints into praises, and make them sing in the ways of the Lord. By these showers God would be glorified, the church cemented, and her distempers healed. Ordinances would be successful, communions more pleasant, the godly more valued, religion more esteemed, and the way to heaven more delightful. Lord, look on the dry ground and present droughty season with pity, open the windows of heaven, and send down showers as in former times, as in other parts of the world. Send a shower to young communicants, and to those who have not seen thy goings in the sanctuary: a shower to stony hearts and withered hands; a shower to soften the clods, loose the roots, and open the springs. O how much good would one of Christ's showers do to a poor dry land! what wonders would it work! what prisoners would it loose! what cloudy minds would it brighten, and what doubting souls would it resolve! Come down, Lord Jesus. Amen.

MEDITATION XVIII.—"LORD, I AM NOT WORTHY THAT THOU SHOULDST COME UNDER MY ROOF," MATT. VIII. 8.

Faith and repentance still go together; every believer is a true penitent: he that puts on the Lord Jesus, is also clothed with humility. The higher thoughts a man hath of Christ, the lower thoughts will he have of himself. When the man's eyes are open to see the holiness and excellency of Christ, he is made to own his own nothingness before him, and his infinite distance from him, and to say, like the centurion in the text, "I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof." q. d. It is too great an honour for such a guilty and filthy creature to entertain a Saviour of infinite purity; my heart is more unworthy than my house, I have nothing to commend me to thee. The lowly soul abhors himself, as vile in the sight of a holy God: he says, I am all as an unclean thing, and all my righteousness is as filthy rags; in me dwells no good thing; I am insufficient of myself to do any thing that is good, or even to think a good thought; it is God that must work in me, both to will and to do, of his good pleasure. He is under no obligation to pity or help me, it will be absolute free mercy in him, if he do it. The lowly man hath undervaluing thoughts of himself, and of all his own doings and attainments: he renounceth all confidence in his own righteousness, and humbly submits to the righteousness of God by faith: he is content to be stript of all his own garments, that Christ may be his clothing: he looks not to his own performances to recommend him to God, but only to Christ his Surety: he is willing to go out of himself, and live wholly upon borrowed righteousness and borrowed strength, even to live upon Christ crucified, and to derive, daily and hourly, from him, strength both for duty and difficulty, for work and warfare. The man that is lowly in heart, submits to the will of God in all his dispensations, is content with every condition he thinks best for him; he is patient in affliction, and silent under God's rod, without answering again. He is sensible that he justly deserveth hell, and therefore is very thankful for the least mercy; like the woman of Canaan, he owns himself unworthy as a dog, and will be thankful for the crumbs that fall from the children's table. He will be thankful for a word from Christ, for a look, for a smile, for the least token of his favour, or the smallest influence of his Spirit.

Wherever faith is in exercise, it is a soul-humbling and self-emptying grace, and lays the soul very low before God; and God always hath respect to such faith and to such lowliness, Psal. cxxxviii. 6. Christ put great respect upon the lowly centurion, Matt. viii. 10—13, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel; go thy way, and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee." He also put great respect on the humble publican, Luke xviii. 13, 14, and declared him justified; for, saith he, "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted." He put great honour on the humble woman of Canaan, that owned herself vile as a dog, Matt. xv. 27, "O woman, great is thy faith, said he, be it unto thee even as thou wilt." And he saith of himself, Isa. lviii. 15, though he be "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, yet he dwells with the humble spirit." And thus he sets himself before us, as the great pattern of humility, and bids us learn it of him. When he appeared unto Moses, it was not on a lofty cedar, but in a low, mean, humble bush. And when he would appear in our nature, it was not a great exalted woman he takes up with, but a low humble virgin, as Mary herself observes, Luke i. 48—52. May I be helped then to appear before him at his holy table, with a humble spirit, and lowly frame, that he may vouchsafe to dwell and hold communion with me.

O that I had the marks of a lowly heart, and could say, that I blush and am ashamed before God in prayer, because of my sinfulness and pollution! that I am made to wonder at free grace in sparing such a vile unthankful wretch, in keeping me out of hell, in offering me Christ and pardon through his blood, and calling me to his holy table. That I disclaim all righteousness by the law, and expect nothing but wrath and ruin from that source; that I look only to Christ, and have admiring thoughts of him and his law-biding righteousness. That I have a deep sense of indwelling sin, and of the corruptions of my heart, and think more meanly of myself than any other person can.—That I am jealous of my wicked heart, and afraid lest I betray or wound the Son of God, and contract blood guiltiness: and therefore I adventure to his table with much fear and trembling. Lord, bestow upon me such a humble heart.

O can such an ill-deserving creature appear before God, and expect mercy, who have so long abused mercy! Lord, instead of stretching forth a sceptre of mercy to invite me to thy table, thou mightest, with the rod of thy justice, justly dash me in pieces as a potter's vessel. Instead of entertaining me with the bread of life, and the cup of blessing, thou mightest give me the bread and water of affliction; yea, cast me into that pit, where I should cry in vain for a drop of water to cool my thirsty tongue. O shall such a wretched dog as I presume to come to thy table, and eat of the children's bread, who am not worthy to eat of the crumbs that fall from it! But I have heard of the mercy of the King of Israel; that he delights to show it to the unworthy that humble themselves before him. O I am vile, and unfit to appear before thee; but surely they are undone who keep away from thee. I am come to thee, not because I am fit or worthy, but because thou art rich in mercy; and hast contrived a way for saving the like of me. Lord, I am not worthy to come within sight of thee, but far less that thou shouldst come under my roof to lodge with me! "Will God in very deed come and dwell with men!" This is a wonder, though all men were as innocent and righteous as once Adam was!—But will he lodge or feast with me that am a leper! Will he come under the roof of my soul, a house so ruinous, smoky and defiled, where he has not a fit place to lay his head? But, O my humble, condescending Saviour did not disdain to lie in a manger among beasts, nor to dine with Simon a leper! O Lord Jesus, come in thyself and furnish the house, prepare an upper room in my soul, large, swept, and garnished, and there abide, and keep the pass-over with me.

Lord, I am not worthy to eat the crumbs that fall from my own table, much less those that fall from thine. I deserve not a room to stand among thy servants, far less to sit down with thy children. I am not worthy of my daily bread from thee, and shall I be allowed to eat of the bread of life? Shall I, who deserve not the bread of men, be admitted to eat the bread of angels? Shall I sit down with him, at whose feet they fall? If John the Baptist, one of the greatest that was born of women, who was filled with the Holy Ghost from the womb, thought himself not worthy to loose Christ's shoes, how unworthy am I, the meanest of creatures, a transgressor from the womb, to be admitted to touch, nay, feed upon Christ's broken body and shed blood! If Peter, after seeing Christ's glory, and his own vileness, judged himself unworthy to be in the same ship with Christ, and cried, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man:" How shall I, the chief of sinners, adventure to sit down at the same table with him in a familiar way! If the woman with the bloody issue was afraid to come and touch the hem of Christ's garment, how much more may I, who am full of the running issues of sin, fear to touch the symbols of his body and blood, or put my hands into his side? If the purest angels must cover their faces when before him, how shall I, who am so impure, appear openly in his presence? But glory to God, for the blessed covering provided for my guilty soul, under which I may appear and be accepted. I come to thee wrapt in it, Lord, accept of me.

O how distinguishing are thy favours to me an unworthy creature! Thou mightest justly have put in my hand a cup of trembling and unmixed wrath, a cup filled with horror of conscience and fearful despair: But, instead thereof, thou givest me the cup of blessing, filled with the hope of pardon and eternal life. I might have been in hell drinking the damned's cup of wrath, into which justice is still pouring in as fast as they drink out: but glory to free grace, thou callest me to drink the cup of salvation, which my Saviour hath purchased with his blood, and sweetened with his blessing. Thanks be to God for it for ever.

MEDITATION XIX.—"THANKS BE UNTO GOD FOR HIS UNSPEAKABLE GIFT," 2 COR. XI. 15.

Many give thanks to God for meat and drink to their bodies, which indeed is the duty of all; but alas, few give thanks to God for Jesus Christ, the only food of precious souls, and God's unspeakable gift to men! Many are fond of temporal gifts and earthly riches, which are nothing but vanity; but ah, they are easy about this pearl of great price, this matchless gift, whose value no tongue can express, nor open up what is contained in it. The apostle tells us a great truth, Eph. i. 3, that "God blessed us with all spiritual blessings in Christ." In this gift of God, we have innumerable gifts bestowed on those who believe on him; such as the gift of spiritual illumination, pardon of sin, a law-biding righteousness, reconciliation with God, adoption into his family, restoring of his image, sanctifying influences, spiritual strength for work and warfare, loosing of bonds, witnessing of the Spirit, unstinging of death, conduct through the dark valley, and a title to the mansions of glory, and the eternal enjoyment of God. Christ is the most necessary and most enriching gift that ever was given to the world. God gave him to be a Plank of mercy, to save our souls when shipwrecked. He gave him to be our Physician and balm, to heal us when our wounds seemed incurable. He gave him to be "the Lord our righteousness," when we had no righteousness. He gave him to be our Advocate to plead for us, when he had many accusers, and none to take our part. He gave him to us to be "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." In this gift there is infinite fulness and unsearchable riches. Well may the spouse call Christ a "bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire," Cant. i. 13, 14, because so many gifts and blessings are bundled up in this one gift. O what can I conceive, or what can I express of this gift? He that would describe, or speak of this gift, would need to have his tongue dipt in heaven. Should an angel come down from it to tell us of this gift, he would outspoke all the men on earth; yet, when he had said all he could, the gift would be far above his expression; Why? because he is unspeakable.

Thanks be unto God that gave us not a servant, not an angel, not a friend, but his Son. Not an adopted Son, but his own Son by eternal generation: "A Son, who is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his Person." Yea, he gave us his only Son, to die as a sacrifice in our room! How bitterly did Jacob bewail the parting with one son, when he had eleven behind! But God gave his only begotten Son, and the Son of his love, for us! It is recorded, as an admirable instance of Abraham's obedience, that he was willing to part with his only son at God's command, Gen. xxii. 12, "Now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me."—But what was Abraham's son to God's eternal Son, the second Person of the glorious Trinity! a Son that was his equal! a Son in whom his soul delighted! a Son that never displeased him at any time! How bitterly did David mourn at parting with a rebellious son! "O Absalom, my son, my son, would to God I had died for thee," &c. But what are all the sons of men, or ten thousand worlds full of men, or as many heavens full of angels, to the beloved Son of God, whom all the angels worship and adore! And yet this is the gift which God gives us. In giving this gift, divine bounty hath stretched itself to the uttermost. He could have created a million of heavens more bright, and millions of angels more glorious, for us; but a more glorious Son he had not, nor could have; a greater gift he had not in all his treasures, than his own co-eternal and consubstantial Son, yet he makes a free gift of him to us! O who would not give thanks unto God for this his unspeakable gift! And who would not part with all the world, to have an interest in this gift sealed to him at the Lord's table! This is the gift that sweetens all other gifts, and without which nothing in a world hath any sweetness in it.

This gift of God is most free; it was impossible that the world could have Christ any other way than as a free gift. A man like old Jacob may be bereaved of his children, but it was not possible that God could be bereaved of his dear Son. Neither could we have him by purchase; we were so poor, we had nothing wherewith to purchase the least blessing. And what though all the riches of the world had been ours, though all its mountains had been gold, pearls, or diamonds, they would not have been sufficient to purchase one sight of this gift, far less a right to it. Nor could ever any motive be found out for bestowing this gift, but the mere free love of God, John iii. 19, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son:" As if he had said, since the world hath no merit, nor price, worth, nor motive, to obtain this blessing, I just make a free gift of him to the world: take him freely, poor beggars of Adam's family; take him, and he will enrich you all! And O how seasonable and unexpectedly was this gift given! Adam, when he came trembling before God after his fall, looking for his final doom, little expected such a gift, until God himself, to the astonishment of angels and men, promised the seed of the woman.

Who could have thought, that the great God would have gifted his dear Son to such vile wretches, sinners that were not seeking him! Nay, who of mankind could have desired such a gift? Indeed, when we had been perishing, we might have looked up, and cried, O God, have mercy upon us: but who would have said, O give the Son of thy love to bear the wrath due to us? We neither deserved, nor desired this gift, but God gave it most freely and surprisingly! When Adam broke God's covenant, he was pursued with a cry, "Adam, where art thou?"—Doubtless, Adam expected a terrible blow from the sword of justice; but, behold, he is pursued with a cry, and the unspeakable gift in the Crier's hand! O how surprising was this to poor, trembling, guilty Adam! What cause had he to cry, "Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift!"—"What shall I render to the Lord for such a Gift?"—And the same cause have we.

O wonderful love! this free gift is offered freely to the poorest creature of Adam's family; so that such an one as I, am warranted to accept and embrace it, and make sure my interest in it; "Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief." Many covet other gifts, but I covet this best Gift, this enriching Gift; this is a lawful covetousness: I receive this Gift of God into my bosom, into my heart. O that I had the marks of those who possess this Gift, and are truly thankful for it! Can I say, that this Gift is truly precious in my eyes, and that I esteem it far above all temporal gifts whatsoever: that I am often thinking upon his matchless excellency, his humility and condescending love; and do I frequently break out with the psalmist, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth I desire besides thee." Have I low thoughts of myself, as unworthy that Christ should come under my roof, reckoning myself, with Paul, the least of all saints, and chief of sinners? Do I renounce all Christ's rivals and competitors, such as my beloved lusts, and beloved righteousness? Do I count all my doings and duties, "but loss and dung" for the righteousness of Christ? Do I take the crown off every head, and put it upon Christ's head, and give him all the glory of my salvation, and say, that "in the Lord Jesus only I have righteousness and strength?" Am I careful to avoid every thing that would dishonour Christ? and do I say to every temptation that offers, "How shall I do this wickedness, and sin against God," or bring a reproach on Christ and his ways? Do I rejoice when Christ is honoured, his throne raised, his glory advanced, and his subjects increased; and when strangers and young ones are drawn to love and admire him? Am I often saying, "What shall I render unto the Lord for his unspeakable Gift?" I am at a loss how to express my thankfulness: I have nothing to give him; but I will render all I have to him, my soul, my body, my love, my praises, my time, my talents, my walk, and conversation. Lord, accept of my two poor mites, soul and body, in token of my gratitude, for God's redeeming love and free Gift; and make me fit for giving thee thanks eternally for this unspeakable Gift: O that I could apply these blessed marks to myself.

And O what thanks do I owe to my dear Saviour, that willingly submitted to be Heaven's Gift to the children of men, yea frankly offered, and gave himself to be a sacrifice for them, to drink of the brook in the way, even the cup of God's wrath, that we might drink the cup of God's blessing! O how low was our fall, that nothing could raise us up again, but the low abasement of the Son of God! And O, how low was the step that he behoved to make to recover us! The Son of God must be tread upon as a worm! The Almighty Physician must come from heaven, and let his heart be pierced, to prepare a medicine to cure our disease! He that "thought it no robbery to be equal with God," must be made equal to robbers and murderers! He must not only suffer death, but desertion also, from God, from man, and the whole creation! He gave himself not only to suffer the pangs of death, but the pains of hell; not only the sorrows of dying men, but the sorrows of damned souls! O unspeakable Gift!

MEDITATION XX.—"THE SON OF MAN MUST SUFFER MANY THINGS," LUKE IX. 22.

Our Lord oft spoke of his sufferings to his disciples, because he would have them deeply imprinted upon the hearts of all his people, that they might always think upon them, and carry about with them the dying of the Lord Jesus. As Christ foretold his sufferings beforehand, so they came exactly to pass. He said he must "suffer many things" for his people, and accordingly he did so. Let me view his sufferings before I go to commemorate them at this table.

1. I must consider him that suffered many things for us; the Spirit of God requires us to consider the High-Priest, who he is, Heb. ii. 1. Though he calls himself in the text the Son of man as to his human nature; yet he is also the Son of God as to his divine nature; yea, God equal with the Father, the great God our Saviour. This God-man, the Wonderful, is our High Priest, that suffered many things for us. He is our glorious Emmanuel, the innocent and immaculate Lamb of God, that had not the least spot or crime of his own to suffer for. He is the brightness of his Father's glory, the express image of his person; he is the King of kings, and Lord of lords. He that suffered, is he that went always about doing good to persons of all sorts, and deserved well of those who persecuted and crucified him. He is the great lover of mankind, and Friend of sinners, our glorious Benefactor, who remembered us in our low estate; one that comes under the most endearing characters to us, as that of our Father, our Husband, our Brother, Master, Physician, Ransomer, &c. Now will not a son be sensible of the sufferings of his Father, or a wife of the sufferings of her husband? Or one brother be touched with the sufferings of another? This is the great High Priest that suffered many things for us.

2. I am to consider the many things he suffered. Ah, they are so great, so various and manifold, I cannot recount nor comprehend them! I may say he suffered in both natures: though his Godhead could not properly suffer grief or pain, yet it suffered an eclipse for thirty-three years, except a short time it shone forth on mount Tabor. He suffered many things in his human nature, both in soul and body; he was persecuted, tempted, calumniated, betrayed, bound, mocked, spit on, buffeted, scourged, wounded, crowned with thorns, and crucified. He suffered in all his offices; he was mocked as a Prophet, and bid prophesy who smote him; and as a Priest, he was bid save himself, seeing he pretended to save others; as a King, he was mocked with an old purple robe and thorny crown: he suffered in his honour and reputation; being disgraced and reproached by men, called a Samaritan, one possessed of the devil, a blasphemer, a glutton, a drunkard, a seducer, &c.; he was even overwhelmed with calumny: he suffered as a blasphemer against God, as a traitor to Cæsar, and an enemy to Moses' law, though he was entirely free of them all: he was wounded and pierced in all parts of his body, in his head, hands, and feet; in his cheeks, back, and side. He suffered in his outward goods, being spoiled of all things, and even stripped of his clothes to his very skin, and nailed to the cross naked: he suffered in all his five senses; his sight, with the spiteful carriage of those that passed by wagging their heads; his hearing, with their blasphemous talk; his smell, with the noisome savour of the skulls of the dead; his taste, with vinegar and gall; his feeling, with thorns and nails piercing his head, hands, and feet. He suffered in the most tender and sinewy parts of his body by the tormenting nails, especially being violently stretched out, and probably disjoined, to make them reach to the holes; therefore he saith, Psal. xxii. 16, 17, "They have digged my hands and my feet, I may tell all my bones; they look and stare upon me." He suffered most of all in his soul, and its noble faculties. How great was the agony and travail of his soul, when he swate blood in the garden through all the pores of his body! O how great was the anguish of his mind upon his heavenly Father's deserting him, which made him send forth a dreadful cry to heaven for relief, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Then it was he cried and groaned under the pressure, but no relief appeared; there was none to answer, every door was shut against him: for at this time his own sun, his own heaven, his own Father, his own Godhead, did all hide their faces and consolations from him! O the many things he suffered for us, they cannot be numbered.

3. I am to consider from whom the Son of man suffered. He suffered from all hands; from earth, from hell, from heaven; from men, from devils, from infinite justice. He suffered from all sorts of men; from king Herod and his men of war, who mocked him and set him at nought; from the Jewish priests and rulers, who cruelly used and persecuted him to death; from governor Pilate, who scourged and condemned him to be crucified. He suffered from the Jews and from the Romans, from the clergy and from the lawyers, from soldiers and servants, from great ones and commons, and even from those he had done much good unto. He suffered from those whom he came to save and wash by his blood; for there were three thousand of those who crucified him, or were active in his sufferings, that were converted to him by Peter's sermon, Acts ii. He suffered not only from enemies, but from professed friends and disciples; one of these betrayed and sold him, another of them denied and abjured him, and all the rest forsook him, and left him alone to suffer in the midst of devils and ruffians insulting over him: he suffered from the devils, and all the powers of hell; those dogs and bulls of Bashan were all let loose to tear and gore him in his last sufferings; "for this, he said, was their hour and power of darkness." But, which was worst of all, he suffered also from heaven; for he being substituted in the room of sinners, a just and a holy God acted as an inexorable judge towards him, he frowned terribly upon him, smote him with the sword of justice, and withdrew all the feelings of his loving-kindness from him, and all those divine influences which might any way refresh his troubled soul in the hour of his greatest need: and thus he fell a sacrifice to incensed justice for our heinous guilt and provocations. At this time a fearful black cloud was spread over the glorious Sun of righteousness, never was there any such eclipse seen or heard of as this! For a candle to be put out is no great matter, but for the sun to be darkened is very uncommon. But though sun, moon, and stars had all been blown out at once, it would be nowise so amazing as the darkening of the eternal Sun of righteousness upon the cross! A strange and marvellous sight! What meant the heat of this great anger? Must even the Creator himself suffer for the creature's sins? Must he suffer such a load of wrath as to make him cry out to the astonishment of angels and men!

4. I am to consider the High Priest, and for whom it was he suffered these great and many things. He suffered not for himself, for he never offended either against God or man, and deserved no punishment: he suffered none for fallen angels, they must all suffer for themselves: it was only for men of Adam's race, that were debtors to justice and prisoners of wrath; he suffered for creatures most undeserving, for rebels, and for many that were his greatest enemies; and even for those who were his murderers and executioners, for he both prayed and was heard for them, when they were pouring out his blood.

5. Let me consider with what affection he suffered all these things for us. It was with ardent love to perishing souls, which many waters could not quench: with fervent wishings and longings for the hour of his passion, "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished!"—with great liberality. It is not the blood of his finger, or a part of his blood, that he would shed for us; no, he would needs pour out all his blood, and even his heart blood too, and with that he poured out his soul also, Isa. liii. Why would he be so liberal? that with him there might be plenteous redemption, Psal. cxxx. 7. He suffered with great meekness, patience, and resignation; when he suffered, he threatened not, but was led as a sheep to the slaughter, dumb, not opening his mouth: with great humility and self-denial, content to be as a "worm and no man," to bring glory to his Father: with a thirsty zeal for the salvation of souls, and for completing the work of our redemption; and hence it was he cried on the cross, "I thirst," and glad when he could say, "It is finished."

O what cause have I to obey his dying charge, to go to this memorial-feast, and to think upon and wonder at the matchless love of Christ, that made him willing to suffer so many things for such wretched creatures as I am! He knew well enough beforehand what our salvation would cost him, yet he willingly undertook it, saying upon the first motion of it, "Lo, I come." But, saith God to him, if you will engage in this work, you must undergo my wrath, and be handled as if you were the sinner in law:—Well, saith Christ, "I come to do thy will, O God:" I am satisfied with the terms: let the cup be never so bitter, I will drink it ere these miserable creatures do it. O loving High Priest! how shall I think of thy sufferings without raptures of love and admiration! I had been in hell, if thou hadst not been in an agony here; I had for ever been scorched there, if thou hadst not swate here; yea, not only I, but all the posterity of Adam had perished, if thou hadst not suffered these many things for them. Surely the weight of wrath, which made thee heavy, and caused thee fall to the ground, sweat, groan, and cry, would have sunk all mankind into hell for ever. O what ingratitude must it be to refuse Christ's offers and terms of salvation, after what he has suffered to purchase it! Was he at so much pains to obtain redemption for us, and will we be at no pains to get an interest in it? Did he shed blood, and will not I drop tears? Lord, pity this heart of mine.

MEDITATION XXI.—“JESUS, KNOWING ALL THINGS THAT SHOULD COME UPON HIM, WENT FORTH,” JOHN XVIII. 4.

Christ foreknew all his sufferings, with all their ingredients, before they came upon him, yet he willingly and resolutely went forth to meet them. He will not flee, nor hide himself from his persecutors, but cast himself in their way. He saw the cup of wrath mixed and ready for him, and now, as it were, he reaches forth his hand to take it. When the people would have forced him to a crown, he hid himself from them, John vi. 15. But when they would force him to a cross, he offered himself to them, knowing that his hour was come to fulfil his suretyship for us, and complete our redemption. Upon this account he made his sufferings welcome, and the passover that introduced them, Luke xxii. 15, “With desire have I desired to eat this passover.” He abhorred all counsels that tended to hinder him; and rebuked Peter as smartly for dissuading him from suffering, as he would have done Satan himself, Matt. xvi. 23. And though all his disciples would have dissuaded him, John xi. 8, he marched with great forwardness to Jerusalem, where he foretold the bloody tragedy was to be acted; he hastened to the field of battle, and place of suffering. Yea, he went so fast to it, that his disciples were amazed at it, and afraid to follow him, Matt. xx. 18; Mark x. 32. They were behind him, and would have fallen behind altogether, had it not been for shame, and let him go alone; they were amazed to see a man hasten so fast to a bloody death; but he would not stop, though they had all left him, as they did afterwards. And when his time was come to be apprehended, he will neither let Peter defend him, nor angels rescue him, though there were twelve legions at his call. One angel would have been sufficient to do it, or one word from his own mouth; but, saith he, “The cup my Father hath given me to drink, shall I not drink it?” Wherefore when they accused him of blasphemy against

God, and of enmity to Cæsar and Moses' law, and things he was perfectly innocent of, he would make no legal defence to save his life before Pilate, but held his peace, insomuch that Pilate marvelled greatly. He might think it was easy for him to answer all they said, but he knew not the reason of our Lord's silence; namely, that he would do nothing to hinder the elect's redemption, which he had undertaken. And as he was silent before Pilate, so was he before divine justice, and would do nothing to divert the stroke. Soon might he have rescued himself when justice drew the sword, by saying, “Father, these sins are not mine:” no, he is silent, and takes with the charge, as if he had committed them all. On me, saith he, be the curse; I will be the sacrifice for these lost sheep. O love unspeakable!

The reasons of my Saviour's willingness to suffer are obvious; he knew it was his Father's will he should suffer, and therefore he said, Psal. xl., “I delight to do thy will, O my God.” He knew it would greatly display the glory of the divine attributes, that was sullied by our sins; it would highly magnify his love to the sheep, John x., “I lay down my life for my sheep:” I do it of myself, freely, without compulsion. It was necessary to make his sacrifice acceptable and well-pleasing unto God. The heathens would not offer a sacrifice to their gods that came struggling to the altar; so every sacrifice offered to the true God must be a free will-offering, as we would have it of a sweet-smelling savour unto him. This Christ hath taught us by his example, and upon this account God hath twice proclaimed from heaven, “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.”

O was Christ's willingness to suffer for sinners so well-pleasing to the Father, and shall it not render him most amiable and lovely to us? Surely the Mediator's frank and cheerful undertaking to suffer so much for us, when unrequired by us, is a favour infinitely kind and obliging, and commands raptures of love and praise from us when we celebrate his holy supper. What a moving sight is it to the eye of faith, to behold our glorious Emmanuel voluntarily stating himself in our law-room without the soliciting of any creature, and engaging cheerfully to go through Satan's buffetings, death's pangs, and hell's flames for us! With what elevated thoughts, and raised affections, should we admire, love, and praise a crucified Jesus, who did all this willingly and unrequired for us! O, he never had so good will to eat when hungry, as he had to suffer and satisfy justice for us! Hence it is said, “My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work,” John iv. 34. Here is food, most delicious for faith to feed upon at the Redeemer's table. Again, from this willingness of Christ to suffer for us, I have good ground to conclude his willingness to receive us, when we come to him by faith to partake of the fruits of his sufferings. O how can any believer, or sensible sinner, question or doubt of Christ's willingness to help and save them, who was so willing to offer himself a sacrifice to justice for them? Surely he is far more willing to save than any sinner is to repent or believe. And from this I will take my encouragement to come to him. Since my loving Jesus came willingly as a lamb to the slaughter, I will venture, with humble confidence, to go to this meek, passionate, sweet-natured Lamb, for pity and help in the time of my need, trusting he will not reject me, nor any that comes to him upon his call in the gospel. "I believe, Lord, help my unbelief."

O did Christ suffer the pains of death and hell so willingly for us, and shall not we be willing to suffer the reproachings and revilings of men, or any other persecution, for him? And when any such injuries are done us, shall not we bear them with meekness and patience after Christ's example, who submitted cheerfully to every thing he knew to be his Father's will? Though he was perfectly innocent, and met with the greatest provocation from wicked men, yet he patiently bore them; taking all as out of his Father's hand, who had mingled the cup for him. Therefore, when he was reviled, he reviled not again; he could have told Pilate, Caiaphas, and his other persecutors, what sort of men they were, yet he opened not his mouth, but went willingly as a lamb to the slaughter. O that we could imitate the meekness, patience, and willingness of the Lamb of God, in all the sufferings he calls us to.

O did Christ delight to do his Father's will, and go willingly through the most hard and difficult task of sweating, bleeding, and dying for us; and shall we find so little delight in doing his will, and performing the duties which lead to communion and fellowship with him, as prayer, praise, reading, hearing, or communicating? Did Christ come so cheerfully to die for us, and shall we go so backwardly and unwillingly to this table, to enjoy fellowship with him, when he invites us to it? O what a shameful requital is this! may not Christ say, "Is this thy kindness to thy Friend?" When the Father called me to suffer, and drink the cup of trembling for thee, how readily did I echo back, "I come, lo, I come; to do thy will I take delight!" but when I call thee to pray or communicate, how backward and dead-hearted are you in that work! I did not weary so soon in the garden, as thou dost in the church! I did not so soon weary on the cross, as thou dost in thy closet! I was longer in my agony, wrestling under the wrath of God for thee, than ever thou wast in wrestling in prayer for thy soul.

Did Christ offer his sacrifice so willingly for us, O then let me go to God my Saviour, with the sacrifice of myself and my duties, and with a ready and a cheerful heart: "God loveth a cheerful giver." As "Amaziah offered himself willingly unto the Lord," 2 Chron. xvii. 16, and David saith, "Accept of the free-will offerings of my mouth," Psal. cxix. 108. O that with like willingness I could offer myself, my heart, and my sacrifices of prayer and praises unto the Lord: and when I feel any reluctance and backwardness of spirit to duty, let me still call to mind how willingly Christ offered himself a sacrifice to God for us, and chide my heart for its unwillingness. Surely it is as much for the honour of God, and the credit of religion, as it is most just and reasonable in itself, to serve God with joyfulness, who has so willingly given us the unspeakable gift of his dear Son to die for us. The wicked and profane are ready to reproach religion as a sour and melancholy thing, when we serve God in a dead-hearted manner; and God himself is highly displeased with us for it, as is evident from that long and terrible chapter, the 28th of Deuteronomy, that is full of curses and threatened judgments, verse 47, where the cause of all is given, "Because thou servedst not the Lord thy God with joyfulness and gladness of heart." Since the sacrament is called the Eucharist or thanksgiving, let me go to it with a joyful and thankful heart, blessing God for Christ. "O thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift." Amen.

MEDITATION XXII.—"IT IS EXPEDIENT FOR YOU THAT I GO AWAY," JOHN XVI. 7.

No wonder that sorrow filled the disciples' hearts at the intimation of Christ's departure from them. They had enjoyed a sweet time with him at the communion-table; his presence with them was their heaven, and they cannot think of parting with them. They are greatly troubled, that he will neither stay with them, nor take them away with him: "Nevertheless, saith he, it is expedient for you that I go away." Lord, saith the soul, how is it expedient for me to be left behind thee in a state of corruption, with indwelling sin that darkens my mind, deadens my heart, disorders my affections, and indisposes me for spiritual work? How shall I stay behind thee, amidst Satan's temptations and fiery darts, flying thick about me? Must I abide in the place where that enemy hath his circuit, and still rangeth about, devouring many thousands? Could I win away with Christ, I would be quite out of the reach of his shot. Lord, either stay with me, or take me up to thee. O must I stay behind thee amidst the infectious defilements and ensnar-ing examples of an ungodly world? When I open my eyes here, what will meet them but multitudes wallowing in pride, sensuality, covetousness, injustice, malice, envy, drunkenness, gluttony, uncleanness, contempt of God and religion? Must I stay to see this horrible sight, the whole world lying in wickedness? Must I stay to hear God daily dishonoured by the tongues of the ungodly? Must I stay to see Christ slighted, wounded, and crucified afresh by wicked men? O what danger will I be in of being infected by their examples! But, Lord, if I could win away with thee, I would be quite out of hazard, and out of the world. How shall I stay behind thee in such an earthly tabernacle, to be burdened with bodily distresses, sickness, pains, and manifold complaints; and amidst innumerable losses, crosses, and disappointments from the creature? How shall I stay to see such melancholy divisions, contentions, debates, and separations, as fall out among the people of God in Christ's absence? Must I stay behind thee to suffer injuries, reproaches, cruel mockings, bad usage, and persecutions, both from the tongues and hands of men; and sometimes to be torn as with the teeth of wild beasts?—Hence this world is called “a den of lions and mountain of leopards,” Cant. iv. 8. O could I win away to heaven with Christ, I would see no lion nor leopard there. There is none to hurt or destroy in all God's holy mountain above.

Have I seen the King in his beauty, and must I be left behind him? Hath the communion-table been like mount Tabor, where he was transfigured before my eyes, with his countenance shining, and his raiment white as light? and must I go down from the mount again to a land of darkness, of drought, and of perplexing doubts and fears, where I shall sometimes go mourning without the Sun; yea, neither sun nor stars appearing to me for many days? Must I be put to walk without the light of God's countenance, and without the feed of my soul, communion with my God? After I have been lifted up, must I lay my account with being cast down again, perhaps into depths like these of Asaph, Psal. lxxvii. or like those of Heman, Psal. lxxviii., with fears of sinking in them, and of falling short of heaven for ever? Could I win away with Christ, I would be at once delivered from all these fears. Here my knowledge of God is small, and often obscured with darkness; my faith is weak, and often in hazard of being overwhelmed with unbelief: here my love is cold, and often like to be chilled with frost-winds, from Satan and the world; my prayers often are formal and wandering, my praises low and flat; here my best wishes are attended with many short-comings and defects. But, O if I could win to heaven with Christ, where grace and holiness are in perfection. I would praise him without wandering, and serve him without sin for ever! Here sin still cleaves to my nature, mixes itself with my services, and defiles my best duties. Here I still carry about with me a deceitful and treacherous heart, whereby I am in hazard of backsliding from God, and mis-carrying for ever, should I be left to it. But, O were I with Christ, I would be free of all these anxious thoughts and fears. Lord, stay here with me, or take me up to thee.

But thou sayest, it is expedient for me to stay behind for a time. Why, Lord? Must I stay that my travelling graces—my faith, hope, and patience,—may be tried and exercised here below, and thereby gradually strengthened and ripened for the perfect state? Must I stay that I may be conformed to my Head, both in serving and suffering; that thy wisdom, power, and mercy, may be glorified in conducting and preserving me through all difficulties and dangers of this wilderness: “Thy will, Lord, be done,” only leave me not alone; but, “for thy name's sake, lead me and guide me.” Or, is it thy pleasure to suspend my heaven for a while, that I may promote thy glory on earth, be useful to the souls of others, and recommend my dear Redeemer to those who knew him not, which is a work I cannot do in heaven? O fit me for it by thy grace, and fill me with zeal for thy glory. O let thy kingdom come upon earth, that the kingdom of glory may be hastened.

Thou sayest, It is expedient for thee to go away. Why, Lord? Must thou thyself be thy people's Forerunner, to carry tidings to heaven of their complete redemption, and of their coming after thee in their several generations? Must thou go to open the passage, and pave the way for access to their persons and duties, and prepare rooms and lodgings for them against the time they come home? Must thou go to be a public agent and intercessor for thy people, under all their trials and tossings here below, and likewise to provide and furnish a rich and glorious communion-table for them in thy Father's house above? Lord, send thy Holy Spirit to fit and prepare me and many others, for that blessed entertainment. Lord, when thou saidst, “It is expedient for you that I go away,” thou didst add, “For if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you.” Why? It was so agreed in the council of the Trinity, that the sending of the Spirit, in his plentiful effusion, which was to be the purchase of Christ's death, should be given in an answer to his intercession, when he entered within the vail, John xiv. 16. And the Spirit was to make use of it as an argument for convincing the world of the perfection and acceptableness of Christ's sacrifice, that Christ was now received and welcomed into heaven. Likewise, the Spirit was to be given only upon Christ's ascension, to supply the want of his bodily presence to the church, as being far better for them, seeing Christ's bodily presence could be in one place only at once, but the Spirit is in every place, to animate and put life in ordinances. May the church have this fruit of Christ's ascension still more and more.

Lord, though thou hast gone away for necessary ends, yet thy marriage-contract with thy people, and the love-tokens thou givest them in the sacrament, are sure pledges of thy returning to pay them a comfortable visit at last, according to that sweet word, John xiv. 3, "If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you to myself, that where I am, there you may be also." O that I may be one of those to whom Christ's visit at his second coming will be joyful and comfortable. Let me examine myself after the sacrament, if I have the marks of such. Am I espoused to Christ? Have I a high esteem of the Bridegroom? Have I subscribed the marriage-contract, and gone into Christ's terms? Do I heartily approve the whole contrivance of redemption, through the suretyship and righteousness of Christ? Have I renounced my own righteousness, my beloved sins, and all Christ's enemies? Do I mourn for the injuries done to Christ by myself and others, and rejoice when his interest and kingdom prosper in the world? Do I mourn for Christ's departure, and the withdrawing of his Spirit from ordinances, or from my own soul? Do I thirst for more holiness in heart and life, and for greater conformity and likeness to the glorious Bridegroom? Then I may expect his visit and return will be comfortable to me, and I may rejoice in the view and expectation of it, and answer Christ, when he saith, Rev. xxii. 20, "Surely I come quickly; Amen, even so come, Lord Jesus." Is my Forerunner now gone away? Let me follow him as closely and speedily as I can: let me follow him in the way of faith, in the way of obedience, in the way of suffering, in the way of patience, prayer, resignation, deadness to the world, heavenly-mindedness, &c.

MEDITATION XXIII.—"I WILL BETROTH THEE UNTO ME FOR EVER," HOS. II. 19.

Abigail thought herself highly honoured, by David's proposing to match with her: but much more honoured are we, apostate sinners of Adam's family, by the eternal Son of God's proposing to match with us, and courting us so earnestly; when he neglected angels, that seemed to be a fitter match for him, in respect of the superior dignity of their nature. Yet all these he would pass by, and match with worms! O how amazing is this step! that the heavenly Bridegroom, whose kingdom is mighty, his riches infinite, and his beauty surpassing; that he should choose a bride naturally polluted, deformed, uncomely, and black as hell! and that he should seek her through a sea of blood, through the pains of death, the horrors of the grave, and the torments of hell! And after many slights and refusals, that he should follow her in her wanderings through the wilderness of sin, with his charming invitations, and alluring offers in the gospel, presenting her with the rings and bracelets of his precious promises and Spirit's consolations; and all to win her heart, and gain her consent to him! How astonishing is it, to see this glorious Person coming over all objections from the blackness, guilt, poverty, and unworthiness of the bride, saying, Though she be black, I will make her comely through my comeliness put upon her! Though she be mean, I will make her noble! Though a slave, I will make her free! Though a fool, I will make her wise! Though a bankrupt, I will pay all her debt! Come here, law, justice, and all her creditors, here full satisfaction of all that is due to you, take it, and write her discharge! Now, "who can lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" Christ's bride! Behold God displaying his free love here to the uttermost! He never displayed his other attributes to the utmost; infinite wisdom could have contrived ten thousand worlds more beautiful than this, and infinite power could have produced them. But here infinite love and mercy hath gone to the utmost, a greater demonstration of his love Christ could not give, than by leaving heaven, assuming a body, and giving his life for the bride; nay, wading through hell for her, and, in face of all discouragements, courting and betrothing her to himself for ever!

After many meetings, treaties, and broken appointments with some, the Bridegroom is come again to court a bride, and has sent his friends in his name to demand her consent, saying, as they did to Rebekah, Gen. xxiv. 58, "Wilt thou go with this man?" Poor woman, poor man, wilt thou yield to this glorious Emmanuel; many former treaties have been broken off by the devil, the world, unbelief, and an ill heart! O will not the long spoken of match hold at length! Ministers, the Bridegroom's friend, are doing their best to draw on another meeting between the parties. Christ, I see, is content to hold another, and it may be the last meeting he will set with many. To show his earnestness, he hath convened his friends, angels, saints, and ambassadors, to witness the sincerity of parties; he hath put on his scarlet robes, his garments dipt in blood, to win sinners' hearts; he hath brought the marriage-contract and spread it before them, saying, "What think ye of its articles and terms? Are ye pleased with them? Are you content to break with sin and all my enemies? To renounce the world, self-righteousness, and all other lovers? to fall in with the self-denying way of salvation through a borrowed righteousness? to accept of me in all my offices? to live wholly upon your Husband, borrow all of him, and be an eternal debtor to him? to make a surrender of your soul and body to him, and seal a covenant with him at his table? Are you resolved to be faithful to your Husband, cleave to him all the days of your life, and be oft looking out for his second coming? And, in the meantime, to be oft commemorating his sufferings, conflicts, conquests, and achievements, and for that end to be frequently looking on his picture in the sacrament, with a believing, penitent, and thankful heart? Now, what is your answer? Lay your hand to your heart."

Lord, unworthy as I am, I desire to go forward through all difficulties, impediments, and discouragements, and say with Rebekah, when called to answer, "I will go with the man;" And with Esther, "I will go in to the king." Though I be not worthy of him, yet he is worthy to be obeyed that calls me: though he hath no need of me, yet I have great need of him: though my distance be great, he allows me to creep near to him: though I cannot move of myself, yet he is able to draw me, be my clogs ever so great: though my motion be small, yet I will not turn back, but keep my face toward him, and fix my eye on him. As a look hath brought healing, so a look hath brought strength; yea, though he should seem to frown on me, and chide me away from him; yet, like Jonah, "I will look again towards his holy temple:" Though I have no worthiness in myself, yet he hath worthiness enough for me: though I be a black and uncomely bride, my glorious Husband can beautify me with his perfect comeliness put upon me. Therefore I do with all my heart, accept of him as my Lord and my Husband: Lord, I make choice of thee, and all that is thine; for richer, for poorer, for better, for worse; for well, for woe; for prosperity, for adversity: I make choice of thee for all times and conditions, to love, honour, and obey thee, above all. I renounce all other lords or lovers, and will have none but Christ: I renounce my own will, and take thy will for my law. I esteem thy precepts concerning all things to be right, and will hate every false way: I submit to all thy providences and dealings with me, and am content to take up thy cross and follow thee, whithersoever thou goest: I take thy Spirit for my guide, thy word for my rule, thy glory for my scope, thy testimonies for my counsellors, thy promises for my encouragement, thy sabbaths for my delight, thy people for my companions. Lord Jesus, I take thee for my life, holiness for my way, and heaven for my home. And as I accept of thee, and all that is thine; so I give up myself to thee, and all that is mine, soul and body, with all my faculties and affections, senses, and members, to be thy agents and instruments; with all my enjoyments to be employed for thy use and service.

"I will go with the man," though I see him all over wounded, mangled, and bleeding, and his visage marred with the wounds, stripes, and blows, which he got from men and devils. Nay, I see him even in this mangled condition, to be fairer than all the sons of men, and all the sons of God too; for I see him "wounded for my transgressions, and bruised for my iniquities, that by his stripes I might be healed." I see him a match every way suitable for me, that can supply all my needs: I am a poor dying worm, but he is a living head that can make me live for ever: I am a needy creature all made up of wants, but in him doth all manner of fulness dwell: I want grace, but he hath all fulness of grace suitable for me: I want grace to believe, but he is the Author of faith: I want grace to repent, but he is a Prince and Saviour, exalted to give repentance. I want grace to pray, to hear, to communicate, to mortify sin, bear the cross, resist temptation, &c. but my Husband hath all grace to bestow. O let me be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus.

O that I had the true marks of them that are divorced from the law, and married to Christ as their Husband; that I could say, I look upon all my doings in point of acceptance with God, as old rags: I live wholly and freely upon my Husband, and take all I want from him for nothing: I clothe myself with his righteousness, and essay the performance of every duty in his strength: I would desire to live entirely upon his cost. I have a heart-love to my husband, and every thing that belongs to him, and a heart-hatred to sin, and aversion to every thing that is injurious to him: I am desirous to please him in all things; and out of regard to his dying command, I go to his table, to remember his dying love, and renew my marriage-vows: I delight in my Husband's company, and press for communion with him in all ordinances. His honour is always dear to me, am I easy about my honour and interest in respect of his? "Let me decrease, but let him increase." And in regard to the devil's reign here, sin abounds, error and corruption prevail; I am well pleased with the thoughts of Christ's second coming to pull down Satan's kingdom, and to consummate the marriage with me, and all that are espoused to him, and say, "Why tarry the wheels of his chariot? Make haste my beloved; even so come, Lord Jesus." O that all the world would love him, exalt him, and submit to him. Many in different places admire him, and see matchless charms in him, his name to them is as ointment poured forth, his garments smell of aloes, myrrh, and cassia; they have beheld his stately goings in the sanctuary: O that all the world might so admire him, and submit to him also.

MEDITATION XXIV.—“FOR THE TRANSGRESSION OF MY PEOPLE WAS HE STRICKEN,” ISA. LIII. 8.

Our sins and transgressions are great and various, and therefore our Surety's sufferings for them were heavy and manifold: he endured many wounds, bruises, chastisements, and stripes, which would still endear him the more unto us: “For he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed,” ver. 5. O who can think of that verse without sorrow, or speak of it without tears? He was wounded and bruised to death, to save us from deadly wounds and bruises. And when dying, he left us his portraiture, with the marks of his wounds, that we might look upon it at his table, and mourn for our sins which gave him these wounds. O can I see my dear Saviour all wounded and mangled by my sins, and not be deeply affected for the transgressions for which my dear Jesus was stricken? Stricken he was in many ways, by many hands, by many rods, by many stripes. He was stricken by the hand of God, by the hand of men, by the hand of devils: stricken by the rod of Moses, the rod of justice, the rod of the Jews, &c. O how early was he stricken by the ill usages he met with from men; being thrust out, to be born in a foul stable and laid in a manger; and soon after was he stricken by the rod of persecution and banishment, being made to flee his native country for safety from Herod. All this he suffered for us, because we deserved to be deprived of all earthly accommodations and comforts, and to be banished from God and heaven for ever.

He was stricken by the rod of poverty and pinching straits. Though he was the king of the universe, and possessed all the riches in it, yet, “for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might become rich,” 2 Cor. viii. 5. He was not born of a rich empress, but of a poor virgin; not in his own house, but in another man's. He had no house nor foot of ground of his own, to live or lodge in: though the “foxes had holes, and the birds nests,” yet he that created them, “had not where to lay his head.” His diet was often to seek, and commonly very mean, barley-bread and small fishes. He had no money to pay his tax, but must borrow it from a fish of the sea. He travelled still on foot, except once he rode to Jerusalem to fulfil a prophecy; and then he had neither horse nor ass of his own, but must borrow another man's ass: He had no fine mounting, but the clothes of them that followed him: He had no burial place of his own, but was laid in another man's; and all this he submitted to for our sakes. He was also stricken by the rod of sore labour and toil, by working at a mechanical trade, until he was thirty years of age; therefore they said, Mark vi. 3, “Is not this the carpenter?” Man, having eaten the forbidden fruit, was doomed to sore labour, that he should eat his bread with the sweat of his brow, Gen. iii. 19, and to this doom our Surety submitted for us. Man broke God's covenant by eating of the tree, therefore his Surety must die on a tree. Man idolized a tree, and preferred its fruit to God's favour; therefore his Surety must labour in cutting and hewing trees most of his time. Man lived a life of sinning, and therefore Christ must live a life of labour and sorrow; he even became a man of sorrows, Isa. liii. 3, that we might obtain everlasting joy and consolation.

He was stricken by men's reproachful tongues, scoffs, and mockeries, being called a glutton, wine-bibber, deceiver, Samaritan, blasphemer, a devil; and one in compact with Beelzebub, the prince of devils. They derided him in all his offices; as a Prophet, by bidding him prophesy who smote him; as a Priest, bidding him save himself, since he pretended to save others; as a King, by putting on him a purple robe, a crown of thorns, and giving him a mock sceptre. Yea, he endured the most cruel mockings, and that in the midst of his sharpest sufferings and soul-agonies, when he cried out on the bloody cross, “Eli, Eli,” &c. O, say they, this man calls for Elias, playing on the word Eli. It was not out of ignorance or mistake they said so, but out of malice and derision; for they understood the Hebrew language well enough, and knew he called on God, and that “Eli” signified, My God. But, in their spite, they would represent him as an idolater; and, when dying, that he prayed not to God, but to saints for help. He was stricken by the most open affronts and indignities from men; by spitting in his face, condemning him to die for blasphemy against God, and treason against Cæsar: by preferring Barrabas, a murderer, before him, and posting him between two thieves. Thus the King of glory was despised and rejected of men for us, Isa. liii. 3.

He was stricken by the scourges of platted cords on his back, and with the thorns they drove into his head: that thorny crown was designed for torture, as well as derision; for if it had been only to mock him, a crown of straw would have served the purpose as well as one of thorns. He was stricken by the pincers that plucked the hair off his cheeks; and by the heavy cross-tree laid on his bleeding shoulders, which he must carry to Calvary. He was stricken with four big iron nails through his hands and feet, on which his whole weight must hang. He was stricken with a burning heat and thirst, which the wrath of God, for our sins, created in him, and dried him up like a potsherd: this made him cry out, "I thirst;" yet no wine, no fountain, no creature that he made, must relieve him at this time. He was stricken by a spear thrust into his side, to let out his heart-blood, to be sure that no life remained. Well, said our dying Lamb, let my dearest blood, my heart-blood, go for these lost sinners, that their souls may live and sing for ever.

He was stricken by the ungrateful behaviour of his own disciples to him: by Judas' betraying and selling him for a small sum, the price of a slave: by Peter's denying him, and swearing he knew him not, at the temptation of a poor damsel: by all of them forsaking him, and leaving him in the midst of his enemies. Besides all this, he was stricken in his soul by the terrible glittering sword of justice, by the curses of the law, by desertion from God, by the vials of his wrath poured out on him, which made fearful bruises, deep wounds, and wide gashes in his soul. O our dear Surety was stricken till he fell to the ground; was overwhelmed with wrath, and covered with blood. With these strokes our mighty Redeemer was thrown down, and broken with breach upon breach, till all the sea-billows of divine vengeance went over him. O never was there any sorrow like my dear Saviour's sorrow, which he suffered when stricken for my sins!

Lord, I am ashamed at the hardness and unconcernedness of my heart at this moving spectacle! O! did the dead earth tremble, the hard rocks rend, the graves open, the heavens turn black at the sight of a dying Jesus stricken by the sword of justice; and shall not my rocky heart tremble and quake, rend and melt for my sins, that were the cause of it? Shall the history of Joseph in the pit move me more than that of Christ upon the cross? Shall the news of the tragical death of a friend, or the sufferings of an acquaintance among the Turks, move me more than the death and sufferings of the innocent Son of God on my account? Alas! my heart of stone will neither break nor melt, till Christ turn and look on me, as he did on backsliding Peter. Lord, one look from thee can turn "the rock into a standing water, and the flint into a fountain of water." One blink of the Sun of righteousness can melt the most frozen and icy heart in the world.

O how lovely is my stricken and bleeding Jesus! Even when bleeding and mangled by my sins, I see him to be white and ruddy, and "the chief among ten thousand." Every wound and stroke he got, doth still beautify him the more to me, and make my soul to cry, O my loving and lovely Jesus! O how can I see him substituting himself in my room, and making himself the butt of the envenomed arrows of justice, and not be ravished with his love to me, and with the warmest affection to him? And at the same time filled with sorrow for my sins, which brought on all his strokes and wounds? O! my sins were the thorns that pierced his head, the nails that pierced his hands, and the spear that pierced his heart. My sins pressed him down, and made him sweat blood in the garden. My soul being exceeding sinful, made his soul exceeding sorrowful. May I always hate sin, and sorrow for it.

MEDITATION XXV.—"I LIVE BY THE FAITH OF THE SON OF GOD, WHO LOVED ME, AND GAVE HIMSELF FOR ME," GAL. II. 20.

O how desirable an attainment is the exercise of true faith upon the great Saviour, Jesus Christ, with an appropriating persuasion, or special application to a man himself, so as to say, "I believe and admire his love to the elect in general, and to me in particular: I trust him with my soul, and my eternal salvation: I embrace him, and put my whole confidence in him "who loved me, and gave himself for me!" Surely this is the faith that every one that desires to obey that great commandment, 1 John iii. 23, should aim at, and press for, as a thing of the last moment and consequence; "O Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief."

Lord, I will not rest in a general belief and persuasion of the mercy of God in Christ, and of Christ's ability and willingness to save all that come unto him; but I will apply his blood and righteousness to myself in particular, and rest on him as one that "loved me, and gave himself for me." This appropriating faith is necessary to my justification; for every justified person applies Christ's righteousness to himself, saying, as in Isa. xlv. 24, "Surely in the Lord have I righteousness." As the church in general calls him "the Lord our righteousness;" so I, in particular, call him "the Lord my righteousness." I make it my daily practice to wrap up my naked soul in this robe, and live by faith upon it. I make personal and particular application of the remedy to my soul's maladies, and draw virtue from it. This particular appropriation in the actings of faith, is most needful for clearing up a believer's evidences, and for filling the soul with joy and peace in believing; for overcoming the fears of death, and giving comfort at a dying hour. And, particularly, it contributes greatly to the soul's comfortable approach to the holy table of the Lord, when it can say, "I receive a crucified Christ as my Saviour; I go to him as one 'who loved me, and gave himself for me;' I take the symbols, and feed upon his body as broken for me, and on his blood as shed for me; and I accept of these as an earnest and pledge of my living and feasting with my Saviour for ever."

A crucified Christ, with all his purchase, is offered to all the hearers of the gospel. For Christ in the word, and by his ministers in the gospel-offer, speaks to all and every one of them; yea, speaks to every sinner, man and woman, in particular, as though he called them by name and surname. And every man is bound to take the call and offer home to himself, as if he were so named, and believe that Christ stands at his door and knocks, saying, If you, or any man, will open to me, I will come in. "The promise is to you, and to all that are afar off," even to all the ends of the earth, and to the stout-hearted: to all the sons of men, to every creature, to them that have no money, to the poor, maimed, blind, naked, wretched, and miserable, and to whosoever will come: "To you is the word of this salvation sent." Christ doth beseech you to be reconciled, and to beware of coming short of the promise by unbelief; such a promise as that, "Whosoever believeth on the Son shall not perish, but have eternal life:" and that, "Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out:" besides many others; John iii. 16; vi. 37; Rev. iii. 17, 18, 20; xxii. 17; Prov. viii. 4; Isa. xlv. 22; xlv. 12; lv. 1; Mark xvi. 15; Luke xiv. 21—23; Acts ii. 39; iii. 26; xiii. 26, 47; 2 Cor. v. 20; Heb. iv. 1.

Now, seeing the gospel-call and offer is given to every one, faith, which is the echo of the gospel-call, must needs receive an offered Christ, and salvation through him, with particular application to the soul that believes. As Christ offers himself and his purchase to every soul in particular; so faith appropriates Christ to the soul itself in particular. And indeed the life and sweetness of faith lies in this appropriation and applicatory act, when the soul is helped to say with Thomas, "Thou art my Lord and my God;" and with the spouse, "My beloved is mine, and I am his;" and with David, "Thou art my Rock, and the God of my salvation." Unbelief would tempt me to put away the gospel-offer from me, saying, It doth not belong to me, I am not elected, nor designed to share of Christ's purchase; he did not love, nor die for me. But in regard secret things belong to God, my salvation is at the stake, my need of a Saviour is unspeakable, and the offer is made to me; I have no time to lose in disputing with the devil and unbelief, but I will go to Christ on the ground I have. He tells me he came to save sinners, I am sure that is my name; he loved enemies, that is my name; he received gifts for the rebellious, that is my name; and now I hear the Master calling and inviting me in particular: therefore, in spite of the devil and unbelief, and all my guilt, I will go forward and accept of Christ as "my Saviour and my King;" I will trust him with my salvation, and believe "he loved me, and gave himself for me, vile and guilty as I am." This essay to believe, Lord, I make in thy strength, and in obedience to thy command. But O, my attempts are weak and powerless; it is only thy Spirit enlightening my mind, and opening up the gospel-call and promise to me, saying, "To you is the word of this salvation sent;" that determines me to make particular application of thy love-offer, by an acceptable appropriating faith. Let my help come from thee.

O Lord, my sins are great and numerous; but should I add to them the sin of refusing the remedy, and putting away Christ's love and blood offered to me in the gospel, this would be greater than all the rest; for so I would bring not only my own blood, but the guilt of the blood of Christ upon my head. This I dare not do; now my soul is at the stake; now the remedy is in my offer; my need of it is great; I cannot delay closing with it; yet a little while and my opportunity is gone, and I must change my dwelling for ever; and how can I go any where without my Saviour? Christ I must have to teach me, to justify and sanctify me, none else can do it, on him all my help is laid. How shall I go to a communion table without him? How will I go to death without him? How will I go to a judgment-seat without him? Lord, my case is desperate without thee; wherefore I accept of thy offer, I believe thy love, I trust in thy merits, I apply thy blood, I appropriate thy purchase, and cry, "My Lord and my God." I confide in a sin-pardoning God, and rest on his promise to me, through Christ's blood and merits, for life and salvation; and though clouds arise, and he should threaten even to slay me, yet will I trust in him as one "that loved me, and gave himself for me."

OBJECT. But doth not the calling sinners to such appropriating acts of faith, encourage the presumptuous confidence of hypocrites to call God their God, like Balaam, Num. xxii. 18, and to continue in sin?

ANS. No: these gospel-calls do encourage sinners to love God, to repent and leave their sins; for till we believe, and taste something of God's love to us, we cannot love him, nor turn to him, 1 John iv. 19, "We love him, because he first loved us." And the abuse or presumption of hypocrites must not hinder the publishing of free gospel-offers and promises. Again, the appropriating faith of believers humbles the creature, destroys self-confidence, purifies the heart, draws forth the soul in love to God, and hatred to sin; whereas the presumption of hypocrites hath no such effects.

It is the duty then of every man that hath Christ's love-offers tendered to him, to repent and believe the gospel, to see his lost state in Adam, and his need of Christ, to be well-pleased with the gospel-device, receive Christ in all his offices, to trust in him as his Saviour, and thereupon believe that his sins are forgiven through Christ's blood; and so persuade and assure himself that Christ is his, that he died for him, and that he shall have life and salvation through him. This persuasion and assurance being most necessary to the spiritual life, it is the great duty of every one to press forward, in the acts of faith, until they attain it, faith being still weak and lame without it. But seeing many believers have it not always, through prevailing doubts and unbelief, it must surely belong more to the perfection of faith than to the essence of it. Their case is like that of a shipwrecked man that hath got hold of a plank; he believes the plank is sufficient to bear him up, and keep him from sinking; but the blowing storm, and his own weakness, make him doubt if his grasp be strong enough to hold by it. Indeed, Lord, if thou didst not take stronger hold of me than I do of thee, my weak and slippery fingered faith would soon let thee go; but I trust not in my faith, but in thy faithfulness; I trust not in my promises to thee, but in thine to me; that thou "wilt never leave me, nor forsake me." Lord, do as thou hast said; be it to me according to thy word.

MEDITATION XXVI.—"WE LOVE HIM, BECAUSE HE FIRST LOVED US," 1 JOHN IV. 19.

No reason can be given why God loved any of Adam's race, but only because he loved us. But good reasons can be given why we love God, both because he is infinitely lovely in himself, and because he first loved us, and before we had any thoughts of love to him. O what is our love, but a small stream that flows from and returns again to the ocean of his love! God's love to us is the source, the incentive, the motive, and moral cause of our love to him. We can never love God until some rays of his everlasting love break out to us; for consciousness of guilt, and fears of wrath, rather incline us to hate him, and flee from him as an enemy, than to love him, and draw near to him. But the breaking out of the beams of God's ancient and preventing love to us in Jesus Christ, makes way for breaking the enmity of our hearts, and bringing in the heavenly fire of love to him. The serious consideration of God's eternal free love to us, poor, wretched, and unlovely creatures, and his loving us at such a rate, as to seek and court our love at the expense of his Son's blood, is the most powerful motive in the world to engage and draw out our love to him; and the more we have of the faith or feeling of this love, the warmer still will our love to him be. God's redeeming love, displayed to men, obscures all the seeming glories of this world, as much as the meridian sun darkens candles or smaller fires; and soon convinces us that there is nothing that deserves our affections but God and Christ. No man that ever tasted the sweetness of God's love, but finds his heart warmed with love to him again. A forgiven soul cannot read his pardon but with tears of love and joy, and still there is much love where much is forgiven. "We love him, because he first loved us."

Lord, at thy call, I go to thy table, to admire and give thanks for God's preventing love published to man in the council of peace, the covenant of redemption, in the incarnation, the death, the blood, and righteousness of our God-Redeemer. O amazing love! I admire it in the antiquity of it; God's love is from all eternity; his thoughts were long set upon man before he had a being. I admire the freeness and undeservedness of love; there was nothing in man to engage his love; he saw nothing in him but poverty, debt, impotency, and deformity; yea, man was so far from deserving any love from God, that he deserved all hatred, as being loathesome and full of enmity; having razed out the image of God, and got Satan's set up in its room; yet, even then, God loved him so as to give his dearly beloved Son to die for him. O! did God love man when utterly unworthy of his love; and shall we not love God, who infinitely deserves all our affection, as being in himself entirely amiable, and altogether lovely; and likewise as affectionate to us, as he is lovely in himself? Lord Jesus, I admire the strength and ardency of thy love! Many waters of affliction did not quench it; and the floods of wrath, that went over thee, could not drown it! Strong was that love that made thee engage, and carried thee through in suffering the pains both of the first and second death in our stead! O I am ashamed and afflicted for my little love to thee! I marvel at the constancy and steadfastness of thy love; that it continues firm to thy people from everlasting to everlasting; and that it is never altered by all the unkind returns, provocations, and ingratitude thou meetest with from them! I wonder at the fruits and effects of thy love! O how great! how sweet! how numerous! Who can value or set them forth? Such as, "Quenching the fire of justice, disarming the law of its curses, bruising the serpent's head, paying believers' debts, obtaining for them regeneration, pardon of sin, peace with God, peace with conscience, peace with angels, adoption into God's family, justification, sanctification, all the graces of the Spirit, audience of prayer, growth in grace, comfort in affliction, a blessing on all providences, perseverancee in holiness, the ministry of angels, victory over death, a happy resurrection, acquittance at the tribunal, the beatific vision, and everlasting life!" Who can declare the loving-kindness of the Lord? Who can utter his mighty acts? Who can show forth all his praise? I may sooner fathom the depth of the sea, the breadth of the earth, or the height of heaven, than measure the love of God in Christ; for it passeth knowledge!

O how little do we love him, that loved us first, and loved us at such a rate! Nay, how unthankful are we for the instances and fruits of his matchless love! How unkind are the returns we make to him for it! "Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid" at the ingratitude of men! How little do we think on redeeming love, and upon the propitiation provided by God for our sins! How little do we speak of this love, or recommend it to those who know it not! How do the small trifles, and little nothings of this world, get more room in our hearts, than Christ's glorious purchase! How little pains are we at to secure an interest in the blessed fruits of his love! How unwilling are we to go into the terms of redeeming love, to renounce a covenant of works, self-righteousness, darling sins, beloved idols! &c. How averse are we to renounce the world, deny self, and to be debtors wholly to free grace! How inclinable are we to satisfy conscience after the commission of sin, by our own doings, confessions, mournings, resolutions, &c. without going to the propitiation provided by the love of God! How great is the liking we have to sin, that killed the Lamb of God! How can we say, we loved God that loved us first, when we hug his enemy in our bosom! "O that my head were waters, and my eyes a fountain of tears," that I might weep and mourn day and night for the ungrateful requitals of the sons of men, for the preventing love of God in Christ, and the amazing instances of it!

O that I could say on good grounds, and from the bottom of my heart, I love him that first loved me. Surely a sincere love to God in Christ would be a sure evidence of God's eternal love to me: O that I had the marks of this love, and could say, "My meditations of him are sweet:" I place my happiness in his favour, and the comfort of all ordinances in his presence: I rejoice in the flourishing of his kingdom, and abhor every thing that is injurious to him: I esteem Christ the Mediator and gift of God as most precious, with every thing that belongs to him: I fall heartily in with the device of redeeming love for saving sinners, and study the life of faith on the Son of God. I renounce my own righteousness and strength, and desire always to say, "In the Lord Jesus have I my righteousness and strength." Were this the language of my heart, I might appeal to himself. and say, "Thou that knowest all things, knowest that I love thee," and desire to render thee love for love.

It would be a great shame for believers, if they did not love him that first loved them, when they were enemies to him! Surely they cannot be believers without love to him. O for greater and warmer love to him that first loved us! Love is the great qualification of the saints above; the more love we have, the liker heaven we are, and the meetter to dwell in it. Were it possible there could be a man in heaven without love, he would reckon the place a hell, and the work a torment to him. It is love that makes spiritual and heavenly work delightful; hence love is said to be the fulfilling of the law. If the love of God be in the heart, the law of God is there also, and the soul is inclined to all holy obedience. O may the love of God in Christ constrain me to live to him that died for me. Have I seen the astonishing love of God in parting with his dear Son to save me? O let that love constrain me to part with all my sins and idols for him. Have I seen the dear Son's amazing love in bleeding to death on the cursed tree, to save me from lying in hell for ever? O let me never again wittingly walk in the road that leads to it. Have I seen him struggling in an agony to open heaven's gates for me? O let me never turn my back on heaven, and tell him whereby he might have saved his labour. O let his boundless love warm my heart more and more with love to him! May the charms of his love triumph over all the charms of sin's pleasures and Satan's devices, and kindle such a fire of love in my heart, as will burn up all my lusts like stubble. Amen.

MEDITATION XXVII. "THEY THAT SOW IN TEARS, SHALL REAP IN JOY," PSAL. CXXVI. 5.

The sowing time of God's people is all here, but their reaping time is but partly here, and far more fully hereafter. Here they sow very much in tears, there is need for it; this seed-time is the most promising of any. Men love a dry seed-time, but God loves wet seed-times best: a wet sowing time doth promise a harvest of joy, whereas a dry one portends a harvest of sorrow. "Woe to them that laugh now, they shall weep." If men do not begin with tears, they shall end with them; if they weep not now, they shall weep and wail and gnash their teeth hereafter. Godly weeping is a good sign of spiritual life. If a child, when born, was heard cry, it is reckoned a legal proof of its living; but if not, it is accounted still-born or dead. Alas, the number of still-born children in the church is great! few are heard cry, or seen weep, in a godly sort, if compared with those who do not. There be many who pour out tears on worldly occasions, but few on spiritual accounts. If a child die we can mourn and weep over him, but who mourns for Christ as for an only son? Who weeps for sin that pierced him? O how little are we affected with the sufferings of our dear Redeemer! Our ears are so accustomed to the hearing of Christ's love, his agonies, his wounds, his blood, his death, that they are become words of a common sound, and make little impression on us, though they be the most awful and moving things that ever the world heard of. Thou, Lord, art present at sacraments, thou observest our tears, and comest with thy bottle to receive and preserve them; but, O how empty is it of tears, for the most part, of gospel-hearers! and how few are the tears which are dropt into it by communicants themselves!

Lord, I am ashamed of the hardness and unconcernedness of my heart, and the woful dryness of my eyes! Shall the rocks about Jerusalem rend sooner at Christ's sufferings than my rocky heart? Shall others weep and sow in tears, when Christ's wounds and blood are set before them, and I continue stupid and hardened? Shall the history of Joseph in the pit move my heart more than that of Christ upon the cross! Lord, look upon my stony heart with pity, look it into streams of penitential tears, give me such a look as thou gavest Peter when he denied thee, a look that may cause me to weep, and weep bitterly at the remembrance of my sins that pierced thee. If I have not openly denied my Saviour, surely I have shamefully forgotten him, and forsaken him in my heart: I have had a deep hand in all his sufferings. When my dear Lord was in the garden sweating blood, neither Jew nor Gentile, Judas nor Pilate, were there to cause it; but O, my unbelief, my pride, my carnality, my hypocrisy, my sinful words and actions were there, and with their weight pressed him to the ground, and brought that fearful agony and sweat upon him. My dissimulation was the traitor's kiss, my ambition the thorny crown, my drinking up iniquity like water the portion of gall and vinegar; my want of tears caused him shed both tears and blood; my forsaking God made him to be forsaken of God; my soul's being exceeding guilty made his soul exceeding heavy! O what means then the hardness of my heart, and dryness of my eyes, when these things are set before me! Is it that weeping is designed for me hereafter, where tears shall never be dried up! Lord, save me, for Christ's sake, from hell's tears, and give grace to prevent them, by sowing in tears now in the proper season.

So long as I am in the valley of tears, there are many reasons for sowing the seed of tears. I see many grounds for them; may a glance of them be the means of melting my heart, and filling my eyes with tears. Tears for my woful apostasy from God in Adam, whereby I am banished from God, have lost his image and countenance, and am fallen under his wrath and curse. Tears for the woful corruption of my nature, my enmity against God, and the manifold plagues of my heart; as atheism, ignorance, pride, unbelief, hardness, hypocrisy, formality, &c. Tears for the sins of my life, open and secret, of omission and commission, of light and ignorance, which are more in number than the hairs of my head, and many of them very heinous, because of several aggravations; of all which I may have an affecting view, by reading our Larger Catechism upon the ten commandments. Tears upon the remembrance of Christ's love, in suffering and dying in my room, to wash away my sins, and save me from hell. Surely the thoughts of this love may inflame the coldest breast, melt the hardest heart, and make the driest constitution run down with tears. It was this that made Mary Magdalene's eyes gush out so plentifully with tears of love and joy, as were enough to wash her Saviour's feet. Tears for the abuse of God's fatherly goodness, mercy, and patience towards me a sinful hell-deserving creature: this consideration melted the prodigal's heart, and made him cry, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." David's undeserved kindness made even the hard-hearted Saul to lift up his voice and weep, and will not God's kindness, which is infinitely greater and freer, make me drop some silent tears at his holy table? Tears, because of the frowns of my heavenly Father, the tokens of his displeasure, his chastisements, and even his chidings and shaking the rod at me: these will melt the heart of a child whose nature is kindly and ingenuous, while the stubborn will stand it against many strokes. David, though a man of the greatest valour against his enemies, yet when he saw God was angry with him in Absalom's rebellion, he wept like a child before the enemy while going up Olivet, 2 Sam. xv. 36, and seemed to have no courage at all. Again, I ought to sow in tears for the dishonours done to God by the sins of others; and especially when damnable heresies and blasphemies are vented against God. And likewise tears for the miseries and perishing condition of others. And especially tears of sympathy with God's people in affliction. For I read of Christ himself, David, Hezekiah, Josiah, Jeremiah, and other saints sowing such tears. Well then may this world be called a valley of tears.

Besides all these, it is well pleasing to God when Christians sow tears of tenderness in renewing covenant with him, in prayer, in hearing the word, in communicating and commemorating the death and sufferings of Christ for their sins. This last is a special season for sowing tears, according to Zech. xii. 10. O shall Christians be more sparing of their tears for Christ, than Christ was of his blood for them? We cry out against the Jews and Romans as hard-hearted men for piercing Christ, and being unconcerned at his sufferings. But what softer are our hearts, if we can see how our sins put him to death, and not be grieved nor weep? Lord, send thy Spirit to touch my heart, and then it will melt into a stream of tears for sin, that cursed thing that killed the Lamb of God. O let this be my weeping time, and seed-time of tears, that hereafter I may reap in joy. Alas, my seed-time is short and insignificant, O let not my harvest be proportioned to it. Lord, though I have not tears enough with Mary to wash thy feet, yet thou hast blood enough to wash my feet, my heart, my hands, my tears, and all my duties, and to make me and them acceptable and savoury to God, so that I may reap in joy with his people above, and stand there as a monument of free grace for ever.

Many, after sowing the precious seed of tears at communion-seasons, have even had their reaping times here below, as an earnest and first-fruits of the full harvest above. Lord, make me acquainted both with the sowing and reaping of penitent believers in this world, that I may have good hope through grace, of sharing with them in the harvest of glory hereafter, even the full enjoyment of God in heaven, eternal communion with the glorious Trinity, with the saints and holy angels. Let me know what it is, after a seed-time of tears, to reap, even in ordinances here below, the clearing of my evidences of grace, and the evidences of my interest in Christ, and in the well-ordered covenant. Let me reap the lifting up of the light of thy countenance upon me, which will put more joy in my heart than worldlings have when they reap corn and wine in the greatest plenty. Let me see my name written in heaven before I go thither, that my passage may be joyful in the midst of tears. Let me reap even here new supplies of grace, strength to bear crosses, and resist temptations; give me gracious returns of prayer, and victory over my corruptions, that I may sing with the psalmist, Psal. cxxxviii. 3, "In the day when I cried, thou answeredst me; and strengthenedst me with strength in my soul."

MECITATION XXVIII.—"UNTO HIM THAT LOVED US, AND WASHED US FROM OUR SINS IN HIS OWN BLOOD," REV. I. 5.

The love of Christ in becoming man, and shedding his blood to ransom and save sinners of mankind, will be the eternal song of the redeemed above, and why should not they begin this song here below? Never was there such matter for songs of praise as the unfathomable love of Jesus; his name is love, and therefore it is to me as ointment poured forth. I will remember his love more than wine. His nature is love; his words and actions were love; he preached and practised love; he lived in love, was sick of love, and died for love. O what thoughts should I have of this free and undeserved love of the glorious Son of God, who was entreated by no man, and even hated of all men; yet in his free love entreats and undertakes for man, saying, Though he be my enemy, I will be both his Surety and Sacrifice, I will drink the cup of wrath, be made sin and a curse for him, I will pour out all my blood, and die for him. O how shall I speak of this astonishing love to thy enemies? To have spared our lives had been great mercy, but to give thy life for ours, is love unspeakable. O Lord, thou hast found me in my enmity, and yet loved me! When my hand was lifted up against thee, thy arms were open to embrace me! Nay, thou hast opened thy loving heart to shelter rebels, who trod thee under foot! Thy heart burned with love to them who cruelly pierced it! Thy bowels yearned toward those that raked in them with bloody hands! Surely eternity itself will be short enough to celebrate the praises of our glorious Emmanuel, who loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood. Worthy is our slain bleeding Lamb, of eternal hallelujahs from men and angels. Lord, fit my heart for these new songs.

O never was there such a miracle of condescending love to the sons of men, as this of the eternal Son of God, his becoming man to suffer hell for them, and pour out his blood to wash them from sin that kindles hell-fire against them. Glory to the Lamb for his fire-quenching blood, and for his preventing love, that kept me from feeling of this fire! O how would this love have affected me, if justice had sent me to hell, and kept me there one year, or one month, or but one day! Surely, one day in hell would have made me prize and praise redeeming love and redeeming blood at another rate than now I do. Or had I seen the damned in their misery, despairing and without hope! Or, had I seen my agonizing Saviour in the garden sweating blood for me; or seen him dying on the cross pouring it out at five large wounds to the very last drop, to wash away sin! O would not I then have valued the great remedy and salvation he now tenders to me? And is not all this which now I hear in the word, and see represented in the sacrament, as true, as real and certain, as if I had seen it with my eyes?

And now when I go to behold Christ dying and bleeding in this holy representation, even the Lamb of God sacrificed and slaughtered for my sins; Lord, touch my heart that it may be suitably affected with the sight, so as intensely to love my blessed Saviour, and to hate my cursed sins. O how should I, at this occasion, be covered with shame and loathe myself, who have both procured the death of Christ by sin, and sinned against his death, by slighting his blood and neglecting his great salvation! Oh! I am chargeable both with the guilt of Christ's blood, and of murdering my own soul. O pardon and "deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation."

My sins have indeed shed the blood of Christ, but, Lord, impute not the guilt, but the merit of this blood to me. Lord, what profit is there in my blood? Surely the least drop of thy dear Son's blood is of more value than a sea of mine. A whole sea of it cannot wash away one sin, but Lord, thou callest me to look unto the Lamb's blood that takes away the sins of the world. O, is not this blood more powerful to wash me, than my sins are to defile me? Is not its virtue as fresh still as when it dropped from his wounds on the tree, or in the day when it cleansed three thousand at once? Is not thy Son's blood a sufficient satisfaction for all my sins, a full price for my redemption? O my soul, thou art now near the blessed remedy for thy guilt and pollution, this is the only well of salvation and fountain of life! O canst thou see Christ's blood running, and not desire to be bathed in it! Now the cleansing and healing streams run on both sides of the table, now let me apply and live, let me bring all my plagues and sores to the streams, my blind eyes, my deaf ears, my weak hands, my feeble knees, my hard heart, my cold affections, my unbelieving and doubting mind, my leprous and unclean soul. Lord, this blood has washed away the plagues, spots, and stains of many thousands, who are now praising the Lamb for it: O let me be joined to the number, that I may also sing to him that loved and washed me.

O bleeding Lamb, "if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." O let that blood, which gushed from thy heart and side, drop on my soul, and it will cleanse me from all sin. And when thou art pleased to come to me in the sacrament in streams of blood, O raise me up, that I may meet thee with streams of tears, tears of repentance, love, and gratitude. O let me not be more sparing of my tears for Christ, than he was of his blood for me. David's kindness made even a hard-hearted Saul lift up his voice and weep, and will not Christ's kindness, which is infinitely greater, make me drop at least some silent tears?

O how dreadful a thing must it be to reject this remedy! Surely justice will not spare them that trample under foot the blood of the Son of God. If justice was inexorable, when he himself prayed, "If it be possible let this cup pass:"—how will he spare me, or hear the cry of those who reject his blood and sacrifice? How is it possible that the cup of wrath can pass from them who do it? No: they must drink it for ever themselves! Lord, save me from rejecting this blood. "I believe, Lord, help my unbelief."

MEDITATION XXIX.—"FATHER, I HAVE SINNED AGAINST HEAVEN, AND BEFORE THEE, AND AM NO MORE WORTHY TO BE CALLED THY SON; MAKE ME AS ONE," &c. LUKE XV. 18, 19.

Father:—Ah! I may be ashamed to call thee so, considering what a disobedient and unthankful child I have been. I am a most wretched prodigal: I left thy house and presence, and went into a far country; far from thee, my bliss and happiness. But now, Father, behold me, desiring to come back, as a poor penitent, mourning, and returning prodigal. I come from a far country indeed; I come from the land of sin and darkness; I come from the frontiers of hell, from the very borders of the burning lake! Ah, foolish creature that I am! how have I forsaken thee, the Fountain of living waters! How fond have I been of broken cisterns, and in love with filthy streams. O the baseness, the disingenuity, the ingratitude that I have been guilty of! I have resisted thy power, despised thy wisdom, undervalued thy goodness! Father of mercies, I now see what an evil thing and bitter it is to forsake the Lord. Holy Lord Jesus, I now see what indignities I have done against thee! Thy blessed body was dreadfully torn with nails upon the cross, and thy precious blood inhumanly spilt by thy crucifiers! But O have not I occasioned more grief and sorrow to thee by my manifold sins against light and love? They crucified thee but once, but I have crucified thee day by day! They crucified thee, because they knew thee not; but I have known thee, what thou art in thyself, the Lord of glory; and what thou art to me, a tender and merciful Father. Yet I have continued to crucify thee afresh. O Holy Spirit, I have resisted thy strivings, quenched thy motions, demolished thy work, and put thee away grieved. But, Lord, I condemn my folly, and see my misery. O what have I gained by offending thee? Nothing but shame and confusion, fear, trembling, and horror! O what fruit have I in these things whereof I am now ashamed!

But, Father, I have heard of thy compassions to the guilty, when they confess and forsake, and turn to thee: wherefore, though I am ashamed like the publican to lift up my eyes to heaven; yet let me, with humble Magdalene, come behind thee weeping, and wash thy feet with my tears, and kiss them. And let me hear the news of pardon from thy mouth. Thou earnest, Lord, not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance; and of these I am chief. Lord, I am full of diseases, full of wounds, full of plague sores, full of weakness and infirmities, full of sins and pollutions. Here, Lord, is work for thy strong hand, work for thy wonder-working blood: O stretch forth thy hand, and save. Father, "I am no more worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants." And thou knowest no hire, no wages will satisfy me but thyself; Lord, give me thyself, be thou my exceeding great reward.

Lord, I am so vile a creature, that I may fear to come and present a petition to thee upon the knee, and far more to come and sit down with thee at thy holy table: if John Baptist, a saint of the first magnitude, thought himself not worthy to stoop down and loose the latchet of thy shoes, shall I, who am laden with sins, adventure to that holy feast, where angels wait as ministering spirits? But, Lord, in thy compassion receive me, that come not to excuse, but to accuse myself, with eyes cast down, smiting on my breast, with the publican, "Lord, be merciful to me a sinner." Thou didst graciously accept of the publican's prayer, of Mary Magdalene's tears, the faith of the thief on the cross, the repentance of Peter, and of those that crucified thee. By these instances of thy mercy, I am encouraged to draw near to thee: O send me not away empty, lest I faint by the way; but satisfy my needy soul with the food of thy heavenly banquet, that I may receive spiritual strength and nourishment to eternal life.

Lord, hear my cry, and hide not thy face from me: when Manasseh cried to thee, thou hadst respect to his prayer: when the Ninevites humbled themselves before thee, thou wast entreated: yea, thou invitest the most crimson and scarlet-coloured sinners, to come and reason with thee, and assurest them thou wilt cast out none that come. Many thousands, who have experienced the truth of thy word, are, at this hour, singing thy praises, and exalting thy free grace. Lord, do thou make me also a monument of thy free grace to all eternity.

Ah, I may be ashamed to speak of mercy and grace, who have so long abused thy grace, and trampled on the blood that should save me. O that I could mourn and weep all my life for it. O what shall I do with my stony heart, that will not break and melt for abusing God's mercy, and trampling on Christ's blood! O shall I mourn and weep for a dead corpse, or a departed friend, and not mourn for a dead heart, or for God's departing from me! Shall the dear Son of God weep, sweat, and bleed for us; and we not weep for ourselves, or for our sins that pierced his head with thorns, his hands with nails, and his side with a spear, and his heart with sorrows. Lord Jesus, I look to thee for a penitent heart, seeing thou tellest me thou art exalted for this very end, to give repentance to Israel.

"Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him?" And what am I, the unworthiest of men, that thou shouldst call me to sit with thy children at thy table, who am unworthy as a dog to creep under it; yea, callest me to eat the bread of angels, who am not worthy to eat the bread of men. Amazing love! that God should court those to obedience, whom he can peremptorily command to it; and, in case of disobedience, punish instantly in hell; that he should take poor slaves, condemned to the prison of hell, and make them crowned kings in heaven; that he should not only be willing to dwell in flesh, but also to give us his flesh for our food; that he should not only save us from hell, but even leave his throne in heaven, and lose his life on earth, to enthrone us in his kingdom! these are prodigies of love, which should engage us to love our Saviour, and mourn for sin while we live. Lord Jesus, pity a relenting, returning prodigal, take him home, and make him thy servant for ever. It is highly just, that I should offer up myself a living sacrifice to my Redeemer, who offered up himself a dying sacrifice for my redemption.

MEDITATION XXX.—"WE WILL REMEMBER THY LOVE—," SONG
1. 4.

I go, blessed Jesus, at thy call, to remember thy love at thy holy table; thy words have an awful sound in my ears, "Do this in remembrance of me." I see much in them: In obedience to them I will "do this" in remembrance of thy dwelling in the flesh; in memory of thy love that carried thee to the manger, to the garden, and to the cross for me; in memory of the infinite price of thy blood which thou didst shed; in memory of the victory obtained by it over the enemies of my soul; in memory of the deliverance from wrath, and the immortal glory thou hast purchased by it for me. Though thou didst die and lie in the grave, yet thy love shall ever live in my heart. Glory to thee, thou art now alive in heaven; O come and live with me; let never thy love be one moment out of my view. I bless thee for this lasting memorial of thy love.

I look on this sacrament as no real or proper sacrifice, as many do, but only as a representation or commemoration of the real sacrifice Christ offered on the cross. I do no more at the Lord's table, than what Christ did at it: since he offered no sacrifice at the table, neither do I. He only did commemorate that sacrifice he was going to offer; and the same, and not more, do I." If any should say that Christ offered a real sacrifice when he instituted this sacrament, then the oblation on the cross would have been superfluous, because sinners would have been redeemed by that of the supper which went before.

Now is the time for a solemn commemoration of thy love: O shall I be unmindful of thy love at this feast, when thou wast so mindful of me at it, made thy testament, put me in it, and left me precious legacies to cause me to remember thee; such as life and light, pardon and peace, righteousness and strength, grace and glory. O how heroic, how generous, and free is thy love to sinful worms! We had done nothing to oblige thee; nothing sawest thou in us to engage thy love to us; but much did thou see in us to incense thee against us. When we were without strength, ungodly, sinners, and enemies, thou lovedst us, and diedst for us. "Greater love hath no man than this, to lay down his life for his friends;" but far greater love hath God-man, who laid down his life for his enemies! O what shall I think of this love! it had been wonderful love in an angel to have stooped to be united to a lump of earth, and therein suffer for us, though it could not have paid our debt. But, O my soul, here is one more valuable than all the angels in heaven, that has stooped to do it! "The word was made flesh and dwelt among us; when I was like Isaac, bound on the altar, he freely offered himself to be made a sacrifice to satisfy justice for me. "Father," said he, "lo I come, to do thy will I take delight!"

Remember this love, O my soul, the Son of God is become the Son of man for thee, that thou mightest be raised to the dignity of a son of God! he that was infinitely rich, for my sake became poor, that I, a poor naked creature, might become rich and well clothed. How can I look on the incarnation and birth of my Redeemer, and not remember his love with wonder? Can I behold the manger his bed, and not adore the love that brought him to lie in it? O how low were the circumstances of the Heir of heaven, when he came to sojourn on earth; who had neither a house to live in, nor an estate to live upon, but must be subsisted by the hospitality of others; and frequently his fare was very mean! Amazing prodigy of divine love! God stoops to dwell in flesh, and gives us his flesh to feed upon in the sacrament! He not only pardons our sins, and saves us from hell; but leaves his throne in heaven, loses his life on earth, and wades through hell, to enthroned us in his kingdom, and make us crowned kings for ever. Blessed be the Lord that gives me a communion-sabbath to remember this love! what shall I render to thee for it? A day of glad-tidings! Thou hast often on such a day visited the earth, and watered it, and made it rich with thy showers! May thy grace and Spirit drop on us this day, like rain on the mown grass.

Lord, I am not worthy to touch the threshold of thy house, and yet thou callest me to thy table! Not worthy to stand among thy servants, and yet thou wouldst have me sit with my Redeemer! Not worthy to lie at thy footstool, and yet thou wouldst make my heart thy throne! Not worthy to eat the bread of men, and yet thou callest me to eat the bread of angels! O love worthy to be remembered to all generations! Lord, enlighten my eyes, and give me a clearer view of thy love than ever I got; and while I am musing on it, let the fire burn; O make my heart burn within me with love to him that loved us.

O my soul, consider the greatness of Christ's love in the cup he drank for thee! how legible is it in his tears and prayers, his groans and cries, his agony and sweat, his wounds and blood, and all for us. O let this matchless love beget in me the warmest love and affection to him that loved us! O let the fire of Christ's love burn up my lusts and worldly love like stubble; and remove the coldness of my heart to him! O that I could weep bitterly that I cannot bring this vile heart of mine to love the Lord Jesus more! O shall I throw away my affections upon every worthless object, and yet have none for the loveliest object in the whole creation of God; and yet one that would needs die for me, to become my Ransom, Sacrifice, and Atonement! Is it the character of those who are Christ's spouse? Is it the character of the whole army of martyrs, and of every believer, to love Christ? and shall not I love him too? O the virgins love thee, the upright love thee; and every one of them cry, "O thou whom my soul loveth;" and shall not I join these chaste lovers? Or shall I be exposed to the terrible fate of those who want love to Christ? 1 Cor. xvi. 22, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be an anathema, maranatha." O that I could express my love to him in adorations and praises, in desiring his presence, loving his members, promoting his kingdom on earth, and longing to be with him for ever.

MEDITATION XXXI.—"HE WAS WOUNDED FOR OUR TRANSGRESSIONS," ISA. LIIT. 5.

How amazing is the love of God to fallen man, in taking a body to be pierced and wounded for him!—Man did cast off the image of his Maker, and became a rebel to, and run-away from, God; and, behold, his Maker takes on him man's image to restore him again to favour: yea, assumes our nature, when at the lowest, that so he might sigh, groan, grieve, weep, sorrow, sweat, bleed, and die for undone man; and he did this, to raise him from his miserable state, to a happier condition than he was in before his fall. Had not God become man, we could not have enjoyed him so nearly, so familiarly, as we may do now. The enjoyment of God as a Redeemer, a Husband, a Brother, is another manner of enjoying him than of God as a Creator. Though we ruined ourselves, and fell under wrath, yet God, by the incarnation, has recovered us, and made us up far above all we had to lose. But ere this be done, he must not only be man, but he must be wounded for and by man's sins; yea, wounded to death, and crucified, before man could be raised up to live with God.

Many, yea, innumerable were the wounds my God-Redeemer received for me; as, by the thorns that pricked his head, by the pincers that plucked his hair, by the scourge that tore and furrowed his back; besides the five big wounds made in his hands and feet by the four nails, and in his side by the spear; and the many wounds given his soul by the curses of the law. Now, all these wounds are open as so many mouths, to call us to flee into them for safety from the sword of justice. Now those wounds were unspeakably painful, being envenomed by our sins. Crucifying, in itself, was an exceedingly painful death; the four big nails whereon the body hung, pierced the most sinewy and nervous parts of the body, and consequently most sensible of pain: and hence the Romans expressed torment by a word borrowed from the cross; and make cruciate signifying to torment. Thus was our innocent Saviour wounded on the cross, cruciate or tormented, and all to save us from eternal torments.

Astonishing sight! The eternal Son of God, whom all the angels worship, wounded to death, hung by nails on a cross, tortured and racked for several hours; and in the meantime, loaded with reproach and scorn from those he died for! Never such a sight as this! It struck terror in the whole creation. The sun hid its face, and could not behold it, the veil of the temple rent in twain, the earth quaked, the rocks rent, the dead were moved, and their graves opened: and even his enemies were struck with amazement, and made to shrink, and say, "Truly this was a righteous person, this was the Son of God." O my soul, employ all thy faculties, all thy thoughts, to study, pore, and penetrate into this awful subject, it deserves the profoundest regard and closest attention: hence the great apostle determined to study and know nothing but it.

This amazing tragedy ought to create in me the greatest abhorrence of sin, the cause of it. Never can sin appear more exceedingly sinful, and hateful, than in the wounding and crucifying of the Son of God. Our transgressions were the nails and spear that wounded his sacred body, and the sword that pierced his soul. These were the Judas that betrayed him, the soldiers that bound him, blindfolded, and mocked him, the Pilate that condemned him, the executioners that nailed him to the cursed tree: it was our sins that put the sword in his enemies' hands. He became a curse for us. All the derision, mockery, and contempt; all the pain, suffering, and sorrow he endured, proceeded from our sins; these brought him to the cross and to the grave. Let us then turn our hatred, and discharge our fiercest indignation against our sins, let them be our aversion and dread for ever; let me always look on sin, that crucified Christ, with horror and trembling. Never such an instance of the strictness and severity of God's justice, and of his abhorrence of sin, as here! He would not spare his own Son, when he stood in the room of sinners, nor spare him one stripe or wound, when he cried; but let him bleed, and die, till sin was fully atoned for! Can I see this, and not cry, O cursed sin! Murderer of the Son of God; away with it, away with it; crucify it, crucify it.

O my soul, see the evil of sin in the glass of Christ's wounds and sufferings, in his body and soul! Say, O sin, what hast thou done! Thou hast provoked the God of heaven to fiery indignation! Thou hast killed the Prince of life, turned angels into devils, filled the earth with troubles, and hell with precious souls! If any body had killed my father, would I embrace the murderer, or love the dagger that was besmeared with his blood? But what are all my relations to "my Lord, my love, that was crucified!" O that my eyes were fountains of tears, that I might weep day and night for my sins that slew my Saviour! O stony heart, for shame, become now like wax, and be melted in the midst of my bowels! Woe is me that I can grieve no more for my sins. Let me, at least, revenge my Saviour's death upon my sins, and suffer them no longer to live in me.

How dreadful must the guilt of those be who willingly harbour sin, and delight in the murder of our Lord! It is no less than to kiss the nails, or to hug the spear that pierced him. They make that their joy, which made Christ a man of sorrow! They make light of that which made his soul heavy unto death. O have I seen my Saviour bleeding to death by sin, and shall I live any longer in sin that wounded him: when a temptation to sin is represented, shall I ever dispute any more, whether Christ or Barabbas shall be preferred? my lusts denied, or my Lord crucified; whether those sins shall be all forsaken by me that made Christ to be forsaken of God? Whether that shall be sweet to me, which was so bitter and deadly to him? O was my lovely Jesus a man of sorrows all his life, and sometimes made to say, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful;" and shall not I be sorry for, and abhor those sins that caused all his sorrows?

O may the believing views of Christ's wounds and sufferings, which he endured for my sins, and to save me from that wrath which they deserved, kindle the fire of love in my soul to Christ. Lord, thou art the God that was wont to answer thy people by fire; O pity me, and answer my meditations and prayers, by kindling the holy fire of love in my heart, and let that fire put out the impure fire of my lusts and corruptions, and inspire me with holy zeal and activity in thy service. O did Christ freely give himself to be a sin-offering for me; and shall not I give myself a thank-offering to him? Surely, it is highly reasonable that I should offer up myself a living sacrifice to my Redeemer, who offered up himself a dying sacrifice for my redemption.

MEDITATION XXXII.—"I AM THE LIVING BREAD THAT CAME DOWN FROM HEAVEN: IF ANY MAN EAT OF THIS BREAD, HE SHALL LIVE FOR EVER," JOHN VI. 51.

Christ crucified is our manna, or heavenly bread, that preserves the life of the soul, and it is only by faith it must be received and eaten. Bread is a comprehensive word, including all things necessary for this life; so Christ, our spiritual bread, is a most comprehensive blessing, including all we want, seeing "he is made of God to us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." Again, bread is the most necessary thing for our life, and the want of it brings the greatest misery; so Christ is the most necessary blessing to the soul, and the want of him makes a man miserable in time, and through eternity. It is a greater misery to have no Saviour for the soul, than to have no bread for the body. Christ alone is the bread that preserves us from soul-famine, and nourisheth us to eternal life; he is the bread of life, the living bread. "Lord, give us evermore this bread."

Bread is called the staff and stay of man's life: so Christ is the staff and stay of our spiritual life, he upholds our souls in life. He is the staff that faint and weary souls must lean to, in going up through this wilderness: yea, Christ, our living bread, is a staff to defend us, and to beat off our enemies, and to put all the hellish host to flight. That was a strange dream of one of the Midianites, Judg. vii. 13, "Behold, a cake of barley bread came tumbling into the host of Midian, and smote a tent." Strange a piece of bread to overturn a tent! Behold this dream made good in the sacrament. The bread there which represents Christ, when received with faith upon him, will tumble into the host of Satan and his lusts; those Midianites who vex us with their wiles; strike down their tents and put them all to flight.

Christ is the bread that came down from heaven, of which the Israelites' manna, that God sent miraculously from heaven, was an eminent type. That manna was God's free gift to the murmuring and rebellious Israelites, to preserve them from starving in the desert where bread could not be had. This manna was a curious grain, that made fine bread, with which God furnished them plentifully every morning from the clouds, sufficient to satisfy six hundred thousand men. But Christ, our spiritual manna, greatly excels theirs, though he was resembled by theirs in some things. Manna was first grinded and beaten, and baked in ovens, before it was made bread for them; and so the grain which makes our ordinary bread must be threshed, and grinded betwixt two millstones, and baked by the force of fire before we eat it. So Christ, the Antitype, was threshed and bruised, and grinded betwixt the millstones of divine justice and our sins, and also roasted by the fire of wrath, that he might be fit bread for saving the lives of our souls, and all this we should call to mind, when we see and make use of the bread in the holy supper.

The Israelites' manna came down to them with the dew; so Christ, with the benefits of his purchase, comes to us by the dews and influences of the Holy Spirit. Their manna fell round about their tents, and every man was free to gather it; so every man is free to gather our heavenly manna. The Israelites behoved to go out of their tents to gather theirs; so God will have us go forth, and be at pains to get our spiritual food. God, who rained manna about their tents, could have rained it into their mouths; but he loves not to encourage sloth in his people, but would have them at all pains to make sure of Christ for their portion. As the Israelites gathered daily; so we must be daily going to Christ, and making use of him. As they gathered early in the morning; so God would have us seeking after Christ in the morning of our lives.

O how far doth our heavenly manna excel that of the Israelites! Theirs but fed the body, and could not preserve them from death at last; but our manna feeds the soul, and nourishes to eternal life, and preserves all that eat of it from eternal death. Theirs fell not on the sabbath-day; nor durst they go to seek it on that day; but ours falls every day, and double on the sabbath; and therefore God calls us to double our diligence, in gathering it on the sabbath. Their manna continued only in the wilderness, and ceased when they came to Canaan; but ours continueth for ever and our fullest enjoyment of it is in the heavenly Canaan; therefore all the true Israelites long to be there.

O how lamentable is their folly, who spend all their time and thoughts in seeking bread to their bodies, and careless and indifferent about the bread of life to their souls! All their care is to support the clay house, but let the soul starve that inhabits it. O it is but short time they can enjoy the bread they are so concerned for; the bodies they mind so much, must soon be meat for worms, and the souls they neglect, a prey for devils!

But, whatever others do, may I be wise to provide the living bread for my soul, and learn to eat it, and make use of it by faith, and especially when I go to the Lord's table: for without faith we can get no nourishment, no life, nor strength from this heavenly bread. Faith is the mouth that eats the bread of life, and sucks honey out of this Rock. Now, the Spirit of God calls faith or believing, an eating, because by it we taste the sweetness and excellency of Christ, and have great satisfaction in partaking of Christ and his benefits. As by eating, our bodies increase in strength and stature; so by believing, our souls grow in grace and spiritual strength, to run in God's ways. As by eating, the bread incorporates and becomes one with us; so, by our receiving and applying Christ's broken body by faith, he is made one with us, and we one with him. As by eating bread, men live upon it, and get support and strength for working or journeying; so believers, by looking to, and trusting wholly in the righteousness of Christ, and the merit of his blood, feed and receive spiritual nourishment and strength for their work and warfare, and so make progress in their journey to Canaan.

O that I had a spiritual hunger and sharp appetite for this bread of life, and were desiring and longing for it, for the support and nourishment of my soul, more than a hungry man doth for bread to his body. A hungry man, perishing for want of bread, would prefer a piece of bread before many bags of gold, if both were set before him, and he allowed to make his choice; so the awakened soul, that sees his need of Christ, prefers him to a whole world; give him never so much of the world's comforts, he is still dissatisfied without Christ, and says, What will all these things avail me, if my starving soul perish without Christ the bread of life?

I have many arguments to plead with God for this bread: Lord, do not thy free calls and promises bind thee to give it me? Thou hast said, "The needy shall not be forgotten." Is not Christ, the bread from heaven, the free gift of God to perishing souls? And dost not thou invite those to come and eat of it, that have no money or price to give for it? Lord, thou hadst compassion on the bodies of men when they had no bread to eat, and didst provide bread for five thousand of them by a miracle; and hast thou not as much compassion to starving souls, that are more precious? Lord, thou givest natural affections to earthly parents, and makest them pitiful to their children when they cry for bread, so that they cannot shut up their bowels against them when hungry, nor will they give them a stone instead of bread. And will my heavenly Father, who is infinitely more compassionate than the most tender parents, refuse the bread of life to starving souls who cry earnestly for it! Lord, I trust in thy mercy, and depend on thy promise, I believe thou wilt not let a poor hungry beggar starve and fall down at thy door, when there is bread enough in thy house and to spare. O cause me sing with the psalmist, Psal. xiii. 5, "But I have trusted in thy mercy, my heart shall rejoice in thy salvation."

APPENDIX.

CONTAINING,

I. A LECTURE ON 1 COR. XI. 17. TO THE END.—II. A PREPARATION SERMON FROM JOS. III. 5. —III. AN ACTION SERMON FROM CANT. III. 4.

A LECTURE ON 1 COR. XI. 17. TO THE END, CONCERNING THE INSTITUTION OF THE LORD'S SUPPER.

Verses 17—19. Now in this that I declare unto you, I praise you not, that you come together, not for the better but for the worse. For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear that there be divisions among you; and I partly believe it. For there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you.

In this passage, the apostle takes occasion to reprove the great disorders and abuses crept in among them in administrating and partaking of the Lord's supper, which, as the ancients tell us, was commonly administrated with a love-feast annexed to it, which gave occasion to the scandalous disorders here reprehended.

Ver. 17. We have the manner of his introducing the charge, "Now in this that I declare unto you, I praise you not," &c. Which shows his willingness to commend them so far as he could. But such scandalous disorders as they were guilty of in so sacred an institution, he could not pass without a sharp reproof. Why? they inverted the very end and design of the ordinance, which was intended to make them better, or to promote their spiritual interest, but it really made them worse. Wherefore he says, "they come together not for the better but for the worse."

Observe 1. That Christ's ordinances, if they do not make us better, they are apt to make us worse. If they do us no good, they may do us harm; if they do not melt and mend, they will harden; and that corruptions will be confirmed in us, if the proper means do not work a cure of them. 2. It concerns us all to inquire into the success of ordinances and solemn meetings. O it is sad, if our meetings tend to increase our sin, instead of the increase of our grace. Let us earnestly deprecate this.

Ver. 18. "For first of all, when ye come together in the church, I hear there be divisions among you," &c. They fell into divisions, sects, parties, and factions, in their celebrating of this ordinance; they fell a quarrelling with one another about meats and drinks in the love-feast, or about the order of their down-sitting, or the time when they should begin, or the not staying till they all came up. The whole church did not join together, but they ate it separately; there was also uncharitableness, alienation of affections, discord and contentions among them, which very much marred their edification, and the success of the gospel.

Quest. Seeing schisms are mentioned here, what is meant thereby? Who are guilty of schism, and who are schismatics? Ans. In scripture the word is variously taken: 1. It is taken for a difference in opinions and sentiments about some points, when there is no heat of contention, or breach of communion. Such a division or schism was among the Pharisees, about Christ's curing the blind man, John ix. 16, it is said, "there was a division among them," originally schisma. And such schisms may be among orthodox divines about lesser points, and yet managed without giving offence. 2. The general sense of the word is a dividing and breaking off from the communion of the church in public ordinances, without cause; like those, Heb. x. 25, "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is." And in this sense, the ancients took schism as distinguished from heresy. Augustine saith, "It is not a different faith which makes schismatics but a broken bond of communion." 3. In this place, and commonly in other places of scripture, as 1 Cor. i. 10; 1 Cor. iii. 4; 1 Cor. xii. 25, the word schisma is take for uncharitable, contentious, and divisive practices among the professors of the gospel, without breaking off from the communion of the church; when people are chargeable with uncharitable contentions and disorders, and alienation of affections from their brethren; for here they came together, and yet were schismatics.

Observe. There may be schism, where there is no separation of communion. Persons may attend ordinances together, and sit together at the Lord's table, and yet be schismatics in scripture sense, by reason of their uncharitable contentions, and alienation of affections. Whereas Christians may separate from each other's communion, and yet be charitable to one another; and this is not so much schism in a scripture sense, as to be uncharitable and contentious.

The apostle had had a report of these divisions, which he did the more easily believe, because he knew there behoved not only to be divisions but heresies also; that is, false doctrines, more dangerous than schisms; for heresies are corrupt opinions, which strike at the fundamentals of Christianity and all sound religion. Heresy, according to the modern sense of the word, is an error in the fundamentals of religion maintained with obstinacy; though we cannot say the word necessarily imports such a strong sense in this place, heresy and schism sometimes being synonymous terms.

Observe, 1. We have no cause to wonder that there should be breaches of Christian love in the church, when we know such offences will come as shall make shipwreck of faith and good conscience.

Quest. How says the apostle, "Heresies must come?" What necessity is there for them? Ans. There is no necessity of force upon any man to broach them, any further than his own corruption, pride, vain-glory, envy, or contentious spirit, or Satan's temptations, prompt him to it. But the event is certain, because of God's decree permitting them, who by his wisdom orders them for wise ends, that they "who are approved may be made manifest," by their constant adhering to the truth against all these temptations of seducers.

Observe, 2. A time of temptation and seduction is a time of trial and discovery, who are sincere and constant adherers to the truths and ways of God, and who not.

Observe, 3. The wisdom of God can make the errors and wickedness of others a foil to the piety and integrity of the saints.

Verses 20, 21. When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's supper,

For in eating every one taketh before other his own supper; and one is hungry, and another is drunken.

The heathens used to eat and drink plentifully at their feasts upon their sacrifices; and this profane custom was creeping in among the wealthier Corinthians. Many think that the apostle was pointing here at their agapai, or love-feasts, that in those times either preceded or followed the Lord's supper; and they are called love-feasts, because they were designed to manifest their love to their fellow-Christians, both poor and rich, and the poor carried away what was left at them: and also they had them to represent our Lord's last supper, in which he eat the paschal lamb, before he instituted that ordinance now called the Lord's supper. These love-feasts were founded on no command of Christ, but came in by custom, and by the Jews who became Christians. These would needs have an appendix or appurtenance of the Lord's supper; and, in imitation of Christ's eating the paschal lamb before the Lord's supper, would have a feast or supper of their own to precede the Lord's supper; and having provided it at home, would needs bring it to the place where the church met. To this feast all the poor were invited at the charges of the rich, as an expression of their perfect love and charity one towards another. But in this church great abuses crept in, in this practice: the poor Christians were neglected and despised. The rich did either not invite them or did not wait for them; but the rich hastened to eat what they had brought with them, and some of them eat and drank to excess, so that "one was hungry, another was drunken." The apostle protests against this practice, as turning a feast of charity into a debauch, and as that which made them incapable to partake of the Lord's supper. This was a scandalous irregularity, a profaning a sacred institution, and corrupting a divine ordinance to the last degree. What should have been a bond of mutual amity and affection, was made an instrument of discord and disunion.

Observe, 1. Duties not done as they ought, are not done at all in Christ's account. Or a careless eating and drinking of the Lord's supper is as good as none, yea, worse than not eating. So prayers may be made, yet not made; sacraments received, yet not received; alms given, yet not given, because not done in the form and manner required by God.

Observe, 2. A sincere soul must and will look not only to the matter of the duty, but also to the manner of performing it.

Observe, 3. It is a heinous evil for Christians to treat their fellow-Christians with contempt and insolence, especially at the Lord's table: for the rich to despise the poor, this is a great evil.

Observe, 4. That even in the apostolical and primitive times, great disorders and irregularities had crept into the church; and that there is no church without spot in this imperfect state.

Observe, 5. That the apostle, notwithstanding of these, doth not direct the one part of the Corinthians to separate from the other; but he only reproveth and rectifies their abuses. He does not say, Withdraw from such persons, for they will pollute the ordinance to you. No, if they be polluted, it is to themselves, and not to others. He eats and drinks damnation "to himself." Every man shall bear his own burden. "Wherefore," says he, "Let a man examine himself," not his neighbour. The apostle doth not encourage separation on that ground, that there were scandalous persons admitted in Corinth, even some drunk about the time of partaking, which might be the occasion of their divided way of communicating. But he reproveth their divided communicating, and charges them to come together to the Lord's supper, and tarry for one another. He indeed sharply reproveth their scandalous practice, and tells them that it was most hazardous to themselves to communicate unworthily, but speaks of no danger to others. He commands them to examine themselves, and so to eat, but not to examine their fellow-communicants, which certainly he had done, if their joining with them had made them partakers of their sin and danger.

Verse 22. What, have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? or despise ye the church of God, and shame them that have not? What shall I say to you? shall I praise you in this? I praise you not?

The apostle here doth condemn both the abuses of those feasts, and also their keeping them in the place where the church met. Some understand the church, of the house where the church met, and call their feasting there a profaning or unhallowing the place set apart for divine worship. Others understand it of the people or poor members there met. Why do ye despise them? by excluding them from your company, because of their poverty; and so ye put them to shame, whom God has adopted, and admitted into his family. This feast was originally designed for the poor's relief, and ye exclude them from it.

Observe, 1. The despising of the poor members of the church, is a despising of the church itself, yea, Christ, the Head of the Church, as he that pincheth the little toe, paineth the whole body, and the head too.

Observe, 2. With what lenity and mildness the apostle reproveth these great disorders, "Shall I praise you?" It was the first time he had told them of their faults, in hopes of amendment, and therefore doth it gently; and some think this gentle way of reproof had the due effect, because no fault is taxed in the second epistle that was reproved in the first.

Verses 23—26. For I have received of the Lord that which I also delivered unto you, that the Lord Jesus, the same night in which he was betrayed, took bread. And when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, Take, eat; this is my body, which is broken for you. This do in remembrance of me. After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood; this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me. For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do shew the Lord's death till he come.

After reproving their disorders, he reduces them to the primitive institution, and tells them how he came by the knowledge of it, seeing he was not among the apostles at the first institution. It was by revelation from Christ: and what he had received of the Lord, he communicated to them, without varying from the truth in the least, without adding or diminishing. As if he had said, "As for these love-feasts preceding the Lord's supper, I received nothing from the Lord; you have borrowed them from Jews or heathens. But all that I received from the Lord concerning the Lord's supper, I here set before you." And indeed he gives a more particular account of the institution than we meet with elsewhere.

1. We have the Author of it, the Lord Jesus Christ. It is an act of Christ's royal power and authority, as King and Head of the Church, to institute sacraments. The church had no power to appoint such, but only to execute and administer what Christ appoints: and as it is Christ's ordinance, we should have a special regard to it, and not profane or neglect it.

2. We have the time of the institution, the same night in which he was betrayed; when he was entering on his soul-sufferings in the garden, and going next day to the cross; a night much to be remembered, being the last night before Christ's death: the night wherein he began his bitter agonies, and swate the bloody sweat for us; a night wherein he saw heaven, earth, and hell, even justice men, and devils, drawn up in battle-array against him. A wondrous instance of his love, in spending so much of that little time he had in the world (when he seemed to have more need to mind himself) in settling an ordinance for the confirmation and consolation of his people, to the end of the world. Whatever comes of himself, his people must not be forgot.—Observe from the time of the institution, the night before his suffering, that it is very necessary, when sufferings are approaching, to have recourse to the Lord's table, which affords both an antidote against fear, and a restorative and cordial to faith.

Wherefore Christ, for our example, communicated with his disciples the night before he suffered.

3. We have the sacramental elements, or the memorative, significative, and instructive signs, bread and wine.

4. The things signified thereby, the body and blood of Christ, his body broke and blood shed, together with all the benefits which flow from his death and sacrifice.

Observe, 1. There is no transubstantiation as the Papists absurdly imagine. Why, Paul calls that which is eaten bread, five times over in this passage: and even after what the Papists call consecration. A plain argument that the apostle knew nothing of their monstrous doctrine, which makes the bread, by the words of consecration, to be changed into the substance of Christ's body, only the accidents of bread remaining; which affronts and destroys the nature of a sacrament, and gives the lie to our senses. It is called his body, because it was a sign and representation of it, not his real body to be sure; for then it would follow that Christ eat his own body while alive, and that his disciples did the same; yea, that they devoured that body over night which hung upon the cross next morning, with a thousand such like absurdities. But whether the Papists will or not, they must admit of a figurative expression in this passage; for when Christ says, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood," they must mean that which was in the cup, and not the vessel that held it: and this is the ordinary sacramental dialect, concerning circumcision and the passover. Circumcision is called God's covenant, Gen. xvii. 28. i. e. the sign of it. Also the Lamb is called the passover, Exod. xii. 11. i. e. the sign of it. It is true the heathens laid it to the charge of the primitive Christians, that they ate human flesh; but falsely, as appears by the apology made for the primitive Christians, by Tertullian and others; which apology had been false, had they daily eaten the flesh of Christ in the sacrament. It hath been always reckoned a most detestable thing to eat human flesh, and much more is it to eat the God we worship, and devour him whom we pretend to adore.

Observe, 2. That both bread and cup are used together, which shows the unwarrantable usurpation of the Papists, in depriving the laity of the cup. It is directly contrary to Christ's institution; for our Saviour, as it were, foreseeing the Papists' encroachment in this matter, is more express in his injunction concerning the cup, than the bread, in these words, Mat. xxvi. 27, "Drink ye all of it;" and their obedience is recorded of the cup, and not of the bread, Mark xiv. 27, "And they all drank of it." Now, why is Christ so express in this? Surely it was, because he foresaw in the after ages this ordinance would be dismembered, by the prohibition of the cup to the laity, and that by the Popish councils and canons, with an express non obstante to the command of Christ.

5. We have the sacramental actions, both on the minister's and people's part.

For the first. Our Lord took the bread, he blessed it, he brake it, he gave it to his disciples.—The taking of bread signifies God's choosing, setting apart, and appointing Christ to be a surety and sacrifice, and laying on him the sins of his people.—The blessing signifies his qualifying and furnishing Christ with all gifts and graces needful for the discharge of his mediatory offices, and for answering his people's exigencies.—The breaking signifies all Christ's breakings, bruising, and woundings, both in soul and body, which were for our sins, in order to satisfy divine justice, and procure salvation for us.—The giving signifies his offering, giving, and actually bestowing Christ and all his benefits on us. There is no promise reserved, no blessings excepted or kept back; all is theirs. And for the second:

The actions on the communicants' part are to take, to eat, and drink in remembrance of Christ.

Quest. What is meant by taking this bread.

Ans. It is the accepting of Christ as he is offered to us; a receiving the atonement, approving of it, consenting to it, coming up to the terms on which the benefit is proposed to us. It is an accepting of Christ's grace, and submitting to his government. Believing on Christ is expressed by taking or receiving of him. Well, then, when we are bid take this bread, we are bid take Christ, and all the benefits of his purchase; and that sincerely and honestly, without dissimulation; entirely, fully, and without exception; with close and particular application, saying, "My Lord, and my God;" with thankfulness and praise for such a glorious Surety, such a rich purchase, such a free covenant, and such suitable promises; with humility and self-denial, renouncing all confidence in our own preparations, or qualifications of any sort, saying, "In the Lord only have I righteousness and strength;" and with full assurance of faith, looking on the bread, as the Lord's seal and pledge of our interest in and title to the blessings of the covenant; and as a token from Christ that his body was broken for us; believing that Christ and all the blessings of the covenant are herewith given to us, as really as Christ gives the bread into our hands.

Quest. What is meant by eating this bread?

Ans. It signifies our feeding by faith upon Christ and his benefits, which is done by our believing the report concerning Christ and his purchase, and making a particular application of Christ and his benefits unto our souls, and their various necessities and exigencies: and particularly this eating signifies,—Our union with Christ.—Our satisfaction and complacency in him.—Our receiving strength and increase of grace from Christ.—Our taking infeetment and possession of Christ and his purchase as our inheritance, and receiving this outward sign as a pledge of the whole.

As to the words concerning the cup, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood, shed for many, for the remission of sins;" it is a figurative speech, signifying that the wine in the cup, as representing the shedding of Christ's blood, is a sign and seal of Christ's Testament or covenant of grace, confirmed by his blood. From which we may observe,—That every worthy communicant doth here get a copy of Christ's Testament put into his hands, with all the legacies and blessings it contains, such as pardon of sin, peace with God, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, redemption, grace, and glory. Which Testament, if we take hold of, and acquiesce in the method of salvation contained in it, and can prove our relation to the Testator by faith and regeneration, we are children and heirs, and have an interest therein.—Observe next, what it was that purchased the New Testament to us, even Christ's blood; there is never a time we read or hear of the New Testament, but we should mind the blood of Christ. Had it not been for the blood of Christ, we had never had the New Testament written, and had it not been for the New Testament, we had never known the meaning of Christ's blood shed.

6. We have the ends of the institution: 1st. To keep up the "remembrance of Christ." Christ knew how apt our base hearts would be to forget him amidst a throng of sensible objects as we here converse with; and how much our forgetfulness of Christ would be to our prejudice and disadvantage; and therefore he appoints this ordinance, to bring Christ, his death, and love, to our believing, affectionate, and thankful remembrance. 2d. "To show forth his death," i. e. to declare, publish, and proclaim it. It is not barely in remembrance of Christ, of what he hath done and suffered, but also to celebrate, publish, and proclaim his gracious condescension, his love and favour to lost sinners. We declare his death to be our life, and the spring of all our comforts and hopes. We glory in this atonement and sacrifice, and spread it before God as our only ransom. We set it in the view of our faith for our quickening and comfort. We own it before the world, as the only ground of our hope; and that we are the disciples of a crucified Christ, who trust in him alone for salvation and acceptance with God.

7. We have a mandate or charge given for the celebration of this ordinance, and for doing it frequently. Our Lord's command is twice repeated for security, "This do; this do ye." It was our Lord's will that we should celebrate the memorial of his death and passion. It is the will of our sovereign Lord and Lawgiver, the express command of a Saviour; yea, of a dying Saviour. A command of love; and it is such a command as, if we duly observe it, will be a blessed means to enable us to observe all the commands of God the better. It is such a command as whosoever lives in the wilful neglect of it, cannot be called a Christian, but will be treated by Christ at the great day as an enemy, and despiser of his dying love. Wherefore it is our duty not only to communicate and partake of this ordinance, but we must do it often. We cannot maintain bodily health and strength without frequent meals, so neither can we maintain soul-health and strength without this spiritual diet frequently taken and received. The ancient churches celebrated this ordinance every Lord's day. Let us be thankful that we have this spiritual meal more frequently tendered to us than formerly. O for sharpened appetites for our food!

8. We have the perpetuity of the ordinance. It is to be celebrated till the Lord come the second time, without sin, for the salvation of them that believe, and to judge the world. Observe,—That the Lord's supper is not a temporary, but a standing and perpetual ordinance.—That there is no need of sacraments in heaven; for Christ is there bodily present. Faith is then changed into vision, and hope into fruition. Here we hold communion with him by signs and symbols: but above, we will see him as he is, and enjoy him perfectly. The day will then break, and all the shadows will flee away.

Verses 27—29. Wherefore, whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord, unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body.

The apostle having declared the original institution of the Lord's supper; he comes now to instruct the Corinthians in the right use of it, and to beware of profaning and abusing this ordinance, as they had done.

Observe, 1. The sin which he warns them of, viz. "Eating and drinking unworthily." Quest. What is this? Ans. It is not a weak faith, or weakness in knowledge, or want of perfect holiness, or freedom from sin, that will denominate a person an unworthy receiver; for this ordinance was not instituted for angels, but for men who are imperfect and sinful: but it is to come ignorant, without due preparation, without faith, without repentance, self-examination; without resolution against sin, and without reconciliation to God, or to our neighbour.

Observe, 2. The guilt and heinousness of this sin, they are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, i. e. It is an accession to the guilt of shedding the innocent blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.—It is an implicit approbation of the Jews' act in crucifying Christ.—It is a trampling Christ's blood under our feet.—It is a crucifying Christ afresh and harbouring the traitors and enemies of Christ in our bosom.

Observe, 3. The danger of it, eating and drinking damnation to ourselves, i. e. They provoke God to inflict sore judgments on them, temporal and spiritual judgments here, and eternal judgments hereafter. The meaning is not, that this sin is unpardonable, but that it deserves damnation, and will bring it on, without repentance, and flying to the blood of Christ for cleansing. Every sin is in its own nature damning, and therefore such a heinous sin, as profaning this holy ordinance, must surely be so. But timorous and fearful believers should not be discouraged from attending this holy ordinance by the sound of this word, as if they bound upon themselves the sentence of damnation, by coming to the Lord's table unprepared. For hearing and praying unworthily, incurs damnation, as well as communicating unworthily. But this sin, as well as others, leaves room for forgiveness upon repentance.

Observe, 4. That unworthy receivers of the Lord's supper contract great guilt, and also incur great danger to themselves. And therefore they should be much concerned to guard against this heinous and dangerous sin; and cry with the Psalmist, "Lord, deliver us from blood-guiltiness."

Observe, 5. It is only judgment to himself, it is not to another that receives with him. For if a wicked man's presence at the sacrament should pollute the ordinance to a worthy receiver, then Christ and his eleven apostles were defiled by the company of Judas at the passover, at which he certainly was, and, as many think, at the Lord's supper also. Which is absurd.

We have in verse 26th, the duty required for preventing the sin and danger of unworthy communicating, and that is, the great and necessary duty of self-examination. It is a metaphor taken from goldsmiths, who try the truth of their gold by the touchstone, the purity of their gold by the fire, and the weight of it by the scale. We have here,—The person examining, "Let a man examine;" and the person examined, it is himself; he is to call himself to the bar of conscience, and put questions to himself,—Concerning his state, whether he has a right to come or not.—His sins and short-comings.—His wants and necessities.—His ends and designs; whether it be to obey the charge of his dying Saviour, to show forth his death, renew and seal his covenant with God, get nearness and communion with him, nourishment to his soul, and to supply his wants. And, Concerning his graces and qualifications, particularly as to knowledge, faith, repentance, fear, love, thankfulness, holy desires, and new obedience.

Observe, 1. It is not enough that a minister examine us before partaking. We must examine ourselves, for we only can try our own hearts and thoughts, which a minister cannot.

Observe, 2. Our main concern before partaking is about ourselves.—It is not about examining others, but about examining ourselves that we are to be employed. It is not what he or she is that is to communicate with us; but what I am myself.

Observe, 3. It should therefore be our singular care, before communicating, to examine ourselves, and commune with our own hearts, as to our right to, and fitness for the Lord's table.

We have in verse 29th, the true cause of unworthy communicating, "Not discerning the Lord's body;" i. e. not making a distinction between this bread and common bread; betwixt the Lord's body and the body of a mere man;—not prizing nor esteeming the body of a crucified Jesus as the meritorious ground of our justification.

Verse 30. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep.

Some were punished with sickness and weakness, and some with death, for their irreverence in approaching to the Lord's table.

Observe, 1. That careless and irreverent partaking brings on temporal judgments, as well as spiritual and eternal.

Observe, 2. That God may punish his own people with temporal judgments: for several of these so punished were in a state of favour with God, as appears from the word sleep, the death of the wicked being hardly called sleep in any place of scripture; and from verse 32, "they were chastened of the Lord, that they might not be condemned with the world." Now, divine chastening is a sign of divine love.

Observe, 3. That the holiness of an ordinance, or the habitual holiness of a person, will not exempt him from God's displeasure and the infliction of temporal judgments here in this life, if he do not by actual preparations sanctify the name of God in the duty and ordinances of his worship.

Observe, 4. That God punishes his people now to prevent their eternal woe.

Verse 31. For if we would judge ourselves we should not be judged.

If we would examine, try, censure, and sentence ourselves, and so come to the Lord's table, we should escape the castigatory punishment, and condemnatory sentence of God. Observe, 1. That as it is our duty often to examine and judge ourselves, so self-judging will preserve us from the condemnation and judgment of God. 2. That those who through weakness of understanding are not capable to examine themselves, are by no means fit to partake of this ordinance.

Verse 32. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world.

The nature of these judgments, or afflictive evils, which befall the children of God in this life, they are chastenings; "we are chastened of the Lord." To be chastened has a double aspect; first upon our privilege, it denotes our relation, as children to God our Father. Chastenings are a part of his children's portion; yet in that we are chastened, it taxes us with weakness; we are foolish and unruly, and therefore so long as we are here, must always go with a rod at our back. Christ, who was also a Son, was chastened, "The chastisement of our peace was upon him;" but his were judiciary chastisements, not as a child; but as an enemy, a malefactor, in our stead. Observe, The merciful design of God in chastening his children, is to prevent their condemnation. When therefore at any time we are under chastisement, let us justify God, and condemn ourselves, seeing his chastisements are designed to prevent our condemnation.

Verses 33, 34. Wherefore, my brethren, when ye come together to eat, tarry one for another. And if any man hunger, let him eat at home, that we come not together unto condemnation. And the rest will I set in order when I come.

The apostle closes all with a caution to beware of the irregularities they had been guilty of, and to rectify them, that they come not together to condemnation. Observe, 1. That our holy duties through our own abuse may prove matter of condemnation. Christians may keep sabbaths, hear sermons, perform prayers, attend sacraments, and only aggravate their guilt, and bring on a heavier doom on themselves. Observe, 2. We have great need to see that we come to God in due order.

Lastly, He tells them, that as to the other points of church order, he would determine them when he came among them: "The rest will I set in order when I come." Such unchristian disorders may arise in the church, as will require the presence and coming of an apostle to correct and reform them.

A PREPARATION SERMON BEFORE THE SACRAMENT.

"SANCTIFY YOURSELVES, FOR TO-MORROW THE LORD WILL DO WONDERS AMONG YOU," JOS. III. 5.

In this chapter we have the history of Israel's passing through Jordan to Canaan; and a very memorable history it is; for long after they are bid to remember what God did for them between Shittim and Gilgal, Micah vi. 5, "that they may know the righteousness of the Lord." Shittim was the place where they decamped, and Gilgal where they next pitched, see Joshua iii. 1, compared with Joshua iv. 19. He orders them to march up to the river side, where they came and lodged, though they were unprovided of the means to pass in the ordinary way. Though they had neither boats nor bridges, yet they go forward in faith, trusting God's power and promise. It was told them, Joshua i. 11, that they should pass it. We must go in the way of our duty, though we foresee difficulties, trusting God to help us through them when we come to them. The people are directed to follow the ark, ver. 3. when borne by the priests and Levites, to teach us closely to attend ordinances, if we would have the marks of God's favour and special presence.

In the next we have two things, 1. A command. 2. Reasons given for it.

As to the first, "Sanctify yourselves." The word sanctify has several acceptations in scripture. Sometimes it is applied to God, we are commanded to sanctify the Lord, i. e. to think and speak reverently of him, or humbly to worship him. At other times we are commanded to sanctify ourselves, and then it imports several things:—Our separating or setting ourselves apart to some holy use.—Our cleansing ourselves from all ceremonial pollution.—Our preparing ourselves for some solemn or sacred action, by the use of some sacred rites or ceremonies, such as legal washing, &c.—Our putting ourselves in a suitable frame for attending on God's worship.—Our purifying ourselves inwardly from sin, and adorning ourselves with holiness. I might cite scripture for all the significations of the word, as Exod. xix. 22; Josh. vii. 13; 1 Chron. xv. 12; 2 Chron. v. 11; xxix. 5; xxx. 3, &c. I shall take it here as comprehending something of all these senses, especially the people's preparing themselves to attend the ark, and the discovering of God's power, glory, and goodness, with a suitable sorrow and awful frame of spirit, befitting such a great occasion.

II. We have the reasons for it, "For to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you." See how magnificently he speaks of God's works, he calls them wonders; and indeed these were so; the dividing of the waters of Jordan, the making them to stand upon a heap, and then to run back, turning fluids into solids, and causing the Israelites to walk through the rapid river upon solid dry ground. All these were great wonders of God's power and goodness toward Israel. Now, says Joshua, since God is about to give you such uncommon instances of his power and favour, sanctify yourselves, compose your minds by meditation, prayer, and abstractedness from the world, that ye may be fitted for a careful and religious observation of his wonderful works, and to receive the discovery of his glory, and the communications of his goodness, that so ye may give God all the glory, and take to yourselves the comfort of his wondrous works and gracious appearances.

Doctrine. When God is about to make wonderful discoveries of his glory and goodness to his people, then they should make solemn preparation for observing and receiving of the same. For confirmation thereof, see Exod. xix. 10, 11, "And the Lord said unto Moses, Go unto the people, and sanctify them to-day and to-morrow, and let them wash their clothes; and be ready against the third day: for the third day the Lord will come down in the sight of all the people upon mount Sinai." Or, 2. When God appoints meetings with a people, they should prepare themselves to attend him, 1 Sam. xvi. 4, 5, "And Samuel did that which the Lord spake, and came to Bethlehem; and the elders of the town trembled at his coming, and said, Comest thou peaceably? And he said, Peaceably: I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord; sanctify yourselves, and come with me to the sacrifice.

Method. I. When it is that the Lord makes such wonderful discoveries of himself to his people.

II. Wherein the preparation for waiting on this wonder-working God doth lie.

III. The properties of this preparation.

IV. The necessity of it.

V. And lastly, I shall make application.

I. As to the first head, When it is that the Lord makes glorious and wondrous discoveries of himself to a people.—1. When, notwithstanding of grievous sins and provocations, he averts threatened and impending judgments; and comes to them in a way of mercy; as, when he threatens famine and scarcity, he sends fruitful seasons and plenty of bread; when he threatens the noisome pestilence, he removes it and sends health: when he threatens a bloody sword, he sheaths it up, and sends peace and safety.

2. When he is pleased to quell the church's enemies and persecutors, to deliver his people from their oppressions, and give them the freedom of their assemblies, and of observing God's institutions in purity.

3. When he pours out a spirit of reformation on all ranks and degrees, so that people generally turn to the Lord, prize ordinances, prayer, family-worship, and appear against vice.

4. When God pours out his Spirit on the assemblies of his people, so that the preaching of the gospel is attended with life, power, and success, to the melting of hearts, and converting of souls.

5. When he discovers a Redeemer to a lost sinking soul; when a poor self-condemned sinner, that was at his wit's end, gets a sight of the possibility of salvation through the satisfaction of Christ.

6. When he sets forth Christ crucified before our eyes in the sacrament; when he displays therein the wisdom, justice, love, and goodness of God to sinners, in a most lively manner.

7. When he returns and makes his people's sky break after a long night of desertion; when he makes light to arise and shine to them that were in darkness, and opens the door of his presence-chamber.

8. When he gives them the victory over Satan's temptations and assaults after long-sufferings and conflicts, and speaks to them as to Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 9, "My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness."

9. When he meets with them in ordinances, looses their bonds, frees them from their straitenings in duty, and enlarges their hearts in prayer, and enables them to pour forth their complaints and requests before the Lord.

10. When he comes with a return to their prayers; particularly,—By lifting on them the light of his countenance; or,—By giving them a view of their covenant-relation to God; a well-grounded hope of heaven; and new strength to grapple with sin, perform duties, and bear trials.

11. When he comes and gives a glorious discovery of his greatness and majesty, so as to fill them with awful fear and reverence of God, and makes them cry, "Lord, what is man, that thou art mindful of him?" O the unspeakable distance that is between God and us! God is glorious, and the creature is nothing.

12. When he comes and gives the soul a glorious discovery of the holiness and purity of God, in his nature, his law, and his works, as he did to Job, making him cry, "Behold I am vile:" and to Isaiah, "Woe is me, for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips."

13. When he gives a glorious discovery of the goodness and mercy of God; particularly in these instances:—The glorious contrivance of our redemption, by sending Christ to save us.—In pardoning guilty sinners so many crimes, and making them cry, as Micah vii. 18, "Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage? he retaineth not his anger for ever, because he delighteth in mercy."—In taking rebellious traitors and enemies to God to be children of God, and favourites of heaven. In exalting them above angels that never sinned, and providing glorious mansions for them.

14. When he comes in the ordinances, and quickens the dead and languishing graces of his people; as,—When he melts their hard hearts into the exercise of repentance and mourning for sin.—When he comes and actuates their faith, enables the weak sinner to go out to Christ, cast his soul and lay his burden on him, and wholly to look to him, and lean on him for pardon and salvation.—When he comes and makes their hearts burn with love to himself, and to precious Christ the Mediator, while he talks to them, and opens up the scriptures.—When he draws out the desires and pantings of the soul towards himself.—When he quickens the spirit of prayer, and elevates the heart for praise, and enables the soul for every duty.

II. As to the second head, Wherein this preparation and sanctifying of the heart for waiting on God in ordinances lies. First, It supposes,—That we are naturally unfit and unprepared for approaching to God.—It supposes a work of God's grace and Spirit on the heart: he only fits the soul for spiritual things. "It is God that worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure. The preparation of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord," Prov. xvi. 1.

Secondly, It directly imports these things: 1. The soul's being in a gracious state, translated from nature to grace by the Spirit of God, and that the soul is reconciled to God by the blood of Christ, and a work of sanctification begun; without this we cannot be accepted

2. It lies in bringing our hearts with us, and engaging all the powers and faculties of our souls to attend God in duty, Psal. lxxxvi. 11, "Unite my heart to fear thy name;" and, Psal. cxix. 10, "With my whole heart have I sought thee."

3. It lies in our having right thoughts and up-takings of that gracious God whom we approach to:—That we believe that God is, and is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.—That he is incomprehensibly great and glorious, fills the heaven and the earth with his presence, and that great fear and reverence is due to him.—That he is glorious in holiness, and of purer eyes than that he can behold iniquity.—That he is spotless in justice, and will by no means clear the guilty.—That he is omnipotent in power, for protecting his people, and destroying his enemies.—That he is matchless in clemency and mercy, easy to be entreated, and ready to forgive through Christ.—That he is faithful, and keeps covenant for ever.

4. It lies in having humble and low thoughts of ourselves, as unworthy to approach to God, or receive any token of his favour. The soul that is sanctified and prepared for approaching to God, hath a deep sense of former sins and miscarriages, wonders at God's patience, that the earth has not opened its mouth to swallow it up ere now.

5. It lies in cleansing and purifying ourselves, by searching for and throwing out all these sins and evils that unfit us for converse with God. If we would have God to accept us, we must regard no iniquity in our hearts: particularly,—We must cast out pride and self-conceit. If we have a good opinion of ourselves, our duties and performances, God will not accept us; we must count all but loss and dung for Christ.—Worldliness, and thoughts about earthly things.—Unbelief and doubtings concerning the truths of God.—Malice and revenge.—Vain and wandering thoughts; and seek to have our hearts fixed, Psal. lvi.

6. It lies in our retiredness and abstractedness from the world and earthly thoughts. In the temple, for as much flesh as was used there for the sacrifice, not one fly was seen stirring; which teacheth us to drive away the flies of worldly thoughts in God's presence, that they do not spoil nor corrupt the sacrifice, as that grievous swarm of flies did every thing in the land of Egypt, Exod. viii. 24. Do as Abraham, when he went to approach God and do sacrifice on Mount Moriah, Gen. xxii. 4, 5, "When he saw the place afar off, he said to his young men, abide you here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship." He knew that if they had gone along with him, they would so distract him with their clamour, that he could not offer sacrifice with that freedom and tranquillity of spirit requisite.

7. It lies in examining the principles from which you act, and ends to which you move in duty. The principles must be faith and love; the belief of God's command, and the love of Christ, must constrain you to duty. Your ends must be, to glorify God and enjoy him; not as the Pharisees, to be seen of men; not legal ends, to get a reward. Selfish and legal ends are as a dead fly to spoil the ointment, and make duties unsavoury to God. O for right principles, pure and spiritual ends!

8. It consists in labouring to get the heart in a suitable frame for converse with God; as,—In a humble and self-denied frame.—In a spiritual and heavenly frame.—In a fixed and stayed frame, calling in all straying and wandering thoughts, breathing out that prayer, Psal. lxxxvi. 11.—In a loving and affectionate frame; for God is love, and love is the cement between God and the soul in duty.—In a cautious and watching frame; guarding always against every thing that may creep in, to indispose you for communion with God, and mar your access to him.—In an active and lively frame; all the spices should flow out, all the graces should be in exercise.

9. It lies in wakening our souls, which are naturally dull and drowsy, to activity and liveliness in duty, as David, Psal. lvii. 8, 9, "Awake up, my glory, awake psaltery and harp: I myself will awake early;" Psal. ciii. 1, "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me bless his holy name." Be stirred up, all that is within me; there must be a stirring up our souls to take hold of God, Isa. lxiv. 7. Put forth your spiritual strength to the utmost; pray with the most fervent importunity; praise with spiritual elevation of heart; love God with the most sublime affections, and do all in some proportion to the greatness of that God with whom you have to do, as Psal. cl. 2, "Praise him according to his excellent greatness."

10. It lies in our earnest prayers to God to sanctify us, for we must put it back on him, and pray for the sanctifying influences of his Spirit, for the subduing of sin, quickening grace, and perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

III. As to the third head, The properties of this preparation: 1. It must be timeous preparation. The Jews took time to prepare for approaching God in the passover; they had the lamb four days before in their houses, tied to their bed posts, that, hearing constantly its bleating, they might look back to Egypt, and remember the sorrows and bondage they endured there, and be thankful for their redemption; and especially for their deliverance from the destroying angel that night he passed over their houses, which were sprinkled with the blood of the lamb; and that they might look forward to the Messiah, and remember the bitter agonies and sufferings he was to endure for their sins.

2. Inward preparation. It must lie mainly in the heart; a grave decent carriage is needful indeed, but God looks to more than the outward appearance, even to the heart.

3. Conscientious preparation, doing all as in the sight of God, before whom all things are naked and bare. Study to have single ends and aims, to glorify God, and obey our Lord and Saviour's call.

4. Diligent preparation, not dealing with a slack hand, but applying your souls with the greatest activity to the work in hand, believing that your salvation depends on it.

5. Humble and self-denied preparation, trusting in nothing in yourselves but in Christ: depending on God that he would fit and prepare your hearts, and accept graciously for Christ's sake.

6. Universal preparation, be mindful of all the parts of it, especially of examining yourselves with respect to your state, your sins, your wants, your knowledge, faith, repentance, love, and new obedience.

IV. As to the fourth head, The necessity of this preparation. 1. Because of the falseness, sluggishness, and deceitfulness of our hearts; they love to wander from God, and are bent to backslide in duty, as the wise man says, Eccl. x. 10, "If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge, then must be put to more strength." Labour to heat the iron, seeing a blunt iron, if hot, will pierce more easily than a sharper, if cold. Warm your hearts with the love and sufferings of Christ.

2. Because it is the heart God mainly seeks in duty, Prov. xxiii. 26, "My son, give me thine heart;" he says, as Joseph concerning Benjamin, "Except your brother be with you, I will not see your face." If the heart be not brought to him, there can be no acceptance.

3. Because God is well pleased with them that do so, as with Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xix, "Nevertheless there are good things found in thee, that thou hast taken away the groves out of the land, and hast prepared thine heart to seek God." And he is highly displeased with those that do it not, as with Rehoboam, 2 Chron. xii. 14, "And he did evil, because he prepared not his heart to seek God."

4. Because God, whom we approach to, is an infinitely holy and pure Spirit, and will be worshipped in spirit and in truth.

IMPROVEMENT.

See hence the cause why so few get discoveries of God's glory, and wonders of mercy, in the ordinance, but meet with a hiding God; they do not sanctify themselves, and prepare their hearts in a suitable manner.

I. Use of reproof to severals: 1. To those who approach God under the power of wandering and roving thoughts, their minds are not fixed, sanctified, and prepared. 2. To those whose minds are going after their covetousness, when their bodies only are presented before God. 3. To those who are hypocritical and formal in their approaches to God. 4. To those whose hearts are dull and drowsy in God's service.

II. Use of trial. It concerns you upon this occasion to examine if your hearts be sanctified and prepared for approaching God to-morrow. It is highly necessary now to examine your souls, "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat." I fear there are many unsanctified and unprepared hearts among us. And in order to assist you therein, I shall give some remarks, both negatively and positively.

1. Negative marks of unsanctified hearts.—The ignorant heart that knows not Christ, nor has any uptaking of the way of salvation through his righteousness. Such are unprepared, and incapable of gracious communion with God. See how the promise runs, Jer. xxiv. 7, "I will give them a heart to know me, that I am the Lord, and they shall be my people, and I will be their God; for they shall return unto me with their whole heart."—The unbelieving heart is unprepared. —The impenitent heart. —The heart that harbours Christ's enemy. —The heart that hath no love to the friends of Christ. —No hungering and thirsting after Christ and his righteousness. —That hath slight thoughts of his ordinances. —That hath difference about the success of the ordinances. —That resists the motions of the Spirit. —The heart that is drowsy, and at no pains to waken itself. —That is a stranger to itself, and to self-examination. Such hearts are unsanctified and unprepared for approaching to God to-morrow. 2. Positive marks of hearts in some measure sanctified and prepared. —Hearts sensible of their depravity and sinfulness. —That are sensible of their need of Christ. —Hearts filled with revenge against sin. —That are humble and lowly. —Hearts troubled for heart-plagues and sins. —Hearts that consent to the well-ordered covenant in all its articles. —Hearts that aim at communion and fellowship with God in every duty. —Hearts that hold on in close pursuit after Christ, notwithstanding discouragements and disappointments, as Mary Magdalene, who would not leave the sepulchre, when others left it. —Hearts that are unsatisfied with the best means and ordinances, if God be not found in them. —Hearts that are applying themselves to every duty, in Christ's strength, saying, Without Christ I can do nothing. —Hearts that are troubled when they drive heavily in duty, and are weary of their remissness. —Hearts tender of the peace of God, afraid of sin, and grieving the Spirit. —Hearts concerned about the success of this ordinance, both with respect to themselves and others. —Hearts concerned for want of sufficient preparation, praying, with Hezekiah, for pardon and acceptance, though not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary, 2 Chron. xxx. 18, 19.

III. Use of exhortation. O communicants, sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, that the Lord may come down and do wonders among you, wonders of mercy for your souls.

Motive, 1. Consider that the near approach you are to make to God at his table to-morrow, is the nearest approach you can possibly make on this side of death. Consider what preparation God required of the Israelites for receiving the fiery law at mount Sinai, Exod. xix. 10, 11, "God commanded them to sanctify themselves, wash their clothes, and be ready against the third day, for upon that day the Lord would come down upon mount Sinai, in sight of all the people." What awful fear and trembling do you imagine was there among them, when God came down in a thick cloud, when the trumpet began to sound, the thunder to crack, the mountain to smoke, and the earth to tremble under the weight of the great God descending on it. Well, ye should be under the same awe of God in this solemn ordinance as they were. It is true, he comes not down with such terror, to give a fiery law as on mount Sinai, but to deliver the gospel of peace from mount Sion. But mind, it is the same God that speaks, hath the same majesty, the same authority; and therefore you should prepare as carefully, and be as humble before him, as the Israelites were. Were God to come down among you to-morrow in terrible majesty, should a thick cloud fill this house, and lightning break out, and should you hear the thunder of his voice, "I am the Lord, thou shalt have no other gods before me," certainly such a dreadful glory would make your hearts tremble within you, and the earth tremble beneath you. Well, then, God is come down as really among you as among the Israelites, hear him with the same reverence, and be as intent upon adoration as they were. Let not his gracious and familiar way of condescending to deal with you, tempt you to come with less preparation and reverence.

2. Consider the nature of that God you are to approach to.—A great and mighty God, Psal. lxxxix. 7, 8, "God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about him. O Lord, God of hosts, who is a strong Lord like unto thee, or to thy faithfulness round about thee?" Would we feast with a great king with filthy hands and garments? Joseph prepared himself, by shaving himself and changing his raiment, before he went in to Pharaoh; and wilt thou not prepare thyself, by putting thy soul in the holiest dress and humblest posture, when thou art to go to the King of heaven and earth?—He is a jealous and omniscient God, most jealous of his honour, and will come in to see the guests, Matt. xxii. 11, and then he will spy every unprepared and unsanctified guest; he notices the state of your souls, the frame of your hearts, the ends of your communicating, and your preparation before hand. O then sanctify yourselves, before you come to the feast.—He is a pure and holy God; he cannot hold communion with unholy persons, he will be sanctified in them that come nigh him, Lev. x. 3, he will be attended as a holy God, in a holy manner. Did a holy angel appoint to meet with you at a certain place, against such an hour, would you not prepare with all seriousness and solemnity to attend him? Oh! but it is the God of angels that meets with you here, even the God before whom the angels adore, and cover their faces and feet with their wings, and cry, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God almighty." If the linen on the communion table, or vessels that hold the elements, were foul, you would be ready to exclaim against it; and no doubt there ought to be observed an outward decency in this respect;

Christ would have the very room in good order where he was to eat the passover. But O it is a small crime to have a foul cloth or vessel for outward elements in respect of what it is to have a foul heart, or an unprepared soul to entertain a holy God, and to receive the body and blood of Christ.

3. Consider that God's people used always great preparation before their solemn approaches to him, Gen. xxxv. 1.—5; where we see how solemnly Jacob prepared himself and his family, when by God's command he was going up to Bethel to sacrifice unto the Lord. "They change their garment, wash and make themselves clean, and put away their strange gods." How much more ought we to prepare, when we go not only to Bethel, God's house, but to God's table, by changing our garments of sin, and putting on Christ's righteousness by faith, and putting away and mortifying our lusts and idols of jealousy! We see also the Psalmist's preparation for approaching to God, Psal. xvi. 6, "I will wash my hands in innocency, so will I compass thine altar, O Lord." The Jews had great preparation for the passover, and so should we for the Lord's supper, that is come in its room. Wherefore we find the primitive Christians used to sit up whole nights at prayer before the Lord's supper, which they called vigiliae, vigils or watchings.

4. Consider that the matter of this sacrament requires solemn preparation. Solomon directs us, when we are to eat with a ruler, to consider what is set before us, Prov. xxiii. 1. There are here the symbols of Christ's body and blood, rare food! It is a great sin to abuse common meat and drink, or to partake of these without some serious thought beforehand. We would have vessels clean to hold our ordinary food; but here is soul-food, heaven's dainties, the jewel of heaven. Christ's body in the sacrament must be wrapt in a clean soul, as well as his body by Joseph of Arimathea was wrapt in clean linen, and laid in a new tomb.

5. The duties to be performed at the Lord's table require preparation; viz. covenanting with God, renewing our baptismal vow, expressing our love to Christ, feasting on a broken Christ.

6. You are naturally unfit for this ordinance; naturally you have neither habitual nor actual preparation, being dead in sins and trespasses, leprous, loathsome, carnal, and earthly-minded. Wherefore we must be quickened and purified, before we can hold communion with a holy God.

7. Because communion with God would be altogether disagreeable to an unsanctified soul; he would weary of it, and take no pleasure in it.

8. Because of the great advantage of this preparation, God will come to-morrow, and work wonders of mercy for such as sincerely aim at preparation. O then sanctify yourselves. Quest. What are these wonders of mercy? Ans. He will raise dead souls out of the grave, and put life in them.—He will warm cold hearts, and put spiritual heat in them.—He will soften hard rocky hearts, and make them tender and sensible.—He will cleave the rock, and make waters gush out of it, the waters of penitential tears.—He will cure the paralytic trembling hand, that could hardly be stretched out, or grasp at any thing. He will enable the weak soul to hold fast to Christ, and subscribe his name to the marriage-contract.—He will strengthen the feeble knees and lame feet, and make the soul to run on in the way of his commandments with an enlarged heart.—He will kill strong Goliaths and lusts, that defiled the armies of the God of Israel.—He will fix a wandering heart, and fix it on God and things above.—He will heal a wounded conscience by the balm of Gilcad.—He will brighten a dark cloudy mind, and resolve all the doubts and fears of a believer.—He will give a sight of the king in his beauty, a view of the smiles of Christ's lovely face.—He will give a seal of the pardon of all your sins.—He will give a Pisgah-view of Canaan, a sight of the promised land.—He will feast the hungry, and fill them with the dainties of heaven. O these are rare wonders of grace that Christ will work for the prepared soul. O, preparation is your seed time, receiving is your harvest. Now, as a man soweth so shall he reap; "he that soweth sparingly, shall reap sparingly, and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully," 2 Cor. ix. 6. It is in the duty of partaking, as in the duty of praying; the more prepared a man's heart is to pray, the greater is his return from heaven, Psal. x. 17, "Thou wilt prepare their hearts, thou wilt cause thine ear to hear." So it may be said in the case of receiving, thou wilt prepare the heart, thou wilt cause thine hand to give. When God prepares a man's heart for duty, it is a token he hath a hand prepared for mercy. Hence the Lord makes that gracious promise, Psal. lxxxi. 10, "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it." q. d. I will enlarge my hand, as you enlarge your heart. He saith, as Joseph to his steward, Gen. xlv. 1, "Fill the men's sacks as much as they can carry." So as Joseph's brethren prepared sacks in number and largeness, so did they carry corn away; and as you bring prepared hearts to the ordinance, so shall you reap benefit thereby.

6. Because of the great danger in coming unprepared. If you do not sanctify and prepare yourselves, God will come and do wonders of judgment, wonders of wrath among you.—He may inflict bodily diseases; as, 1 Cor. xi. 30.—He may send untimely death.—He may smite with desertion from God.—He may send darkness on the mind.—He may smite with deadness and impenitency on the heart.—With decaying and withering on the gifts and graces.—He may send leanness and barrenness on the soul.—He may smite with formality and lifelessness in duty.—With searedness on the conscience, so as it shall challenge for no sin.—He may send horror and terror on the conscience, so as to make it a Magor-Missabih.—He may let Satan loose against you with temptations, atheistical and blasphemous thoughts.—He may send you to hell from the communion-table, as Mat. xxii. 12, 13, "And he said unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having on a wedding-garment? And he was speechless. Then said the king to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into utter darkness."

Quest. 1. How shall I get my heart sanctified and prepared so as I may expect the Lord will come and do wonders of grace for me to-morrow? Ans. There is a twofold preparation, habitual and actual; you must study both, and habitual preparation in the first place. Quest. 2. What is habitual preparation? Ans. It hath several ingredients in it.—A covenant relation to God in Christ.—A principle of spiritual life.—A state of peace with God.—The imputation of Christ's righteousness.—A universal change by regenerating grace.—The inhabitation of the Spirit.—A holy conversation.—The lamp of a profession. Quest. 3. What is actual preparation for the Lord's supper? Ans. Separating ourselves from the world.—Self-examination.—Humiliation for sin.—Renewing of our personal covenant with God in Christ.—Reformation of what is amiss.—Exciting of all the graces to a lively exercise.—Meditation on the death and sufferings of Christ.—Earnest prayer to God for preparation and assistance in the work; and, after your utmost preparation, you must lay no stress thereon, but cast yourself wholly on Christ for assistance, saying, "It is only in the Lord I have righteousness and strength." We ought to be denied to ourselves, and to look with David to the Lord both for assistance and acceptance, Psal. lxxi. 16, "I will go in strength of the Lord, I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only." You ought to imitate king Asa, who though he had a great army to fight against the Ethiopians, yet cried to the Lord, and trusted in him alone for help, as you have it recorded, 2 Chron. xiv. 11, "And Asa cried unto the Lord his God, and said, Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power; help us, O Lord our God; for we rest on thee, and in thy name we go out against this multitude." So let every communicant say, "Lord, all my strength and preparations are nought, I have no power for celebrating this feast, help me, O Lord my God, for I rest on thee, and in thy name I go to this great and weighty ordinance." And if you come forward to-morrow in this self-denied and sanctified frame, you have ground to expect that the Lord will do wonders of grace and mercy for you.

ACTION SERMON.

"HE BROUGHT ME TO THE BANQUETING HOUSE, AND HIS BANNER OVER ME WAS LOVE."—CANT. II. 4.

THE whole of this song is an allegorical description of the mysterious union and communion betwixt Christ and his Church, under the persons of a bridegroom and bride, which is a frequent metaphor made use of in Scripture. The forty-fifth psalm is an abridgement of this song. In this chapter Christ and the church seem to strive who shall outvie each other in their commendations. Christ first commends the church, and then the church extels Christ. She compares him to the "apple-tree among the trees of the wood," verse 3. Christ is a fruit-bearing tree, but the children of men are barren-trees. And O but his shadow is refreshing, and his fruit sweet to a believer. But as if the shadow and fruits of an apple-tree were too low a simile, to set forth his excellency and goodness, she tells us of the entertainment he gives her in the banqueting-house, in the text.

Where we have, 1. The place which the spouse was brought to, "the banqueting-house," or house of wine, i. e. of feasting, because wine is a principal part of feasts; by which we are to understand the order, or means, whereby Christ conveys his graces and blessings to believers; and there is none of all the ordinances of the gospel that may more fitly be called the banqueting or feasting-house, than this of the Lord's supper, which is the great gospel-feast wherewith Christ entertains his people on earth. Ordinances are called his banqueting-house, because of the great plenty, variety, and riches of the blessings he thereby communicates to his people.

2. We have the person that brings her into this banqueting-house, and that is Christ, "He brought me;" which shows,—Our want of right to these blessings of ourselves. All our right is in Christ.—Our impotency to come to the feasting-house; he must give us both strength and preparation of soul.—The freeness of his grace in bestowing these blessings on us.

3. The manner how she is brought in, and that is under a banner, standard, or ensign. It is a military word; banners or ensigns are used in camps and armies. Psal. xx. 5, "We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God will set up our banners." Her march or entry into this feasting-house was joyful and triumphant, such as that of people under a displayed banner, or colours lifted up. Colours are useful to draw, invite, engage, and lead people after their captain; and the lifting up or displaying of colours is a sign to invite and direct those of such a party or side to come to such a place, or march such a way. Now, what is the device or motto of Christ's banner? not like those of other generals, a lion, an eagle, &c. but love. The love of a crucified Jesus is like a banner lifted up and displayed in the gospel for inviting and engaging sinners to come to him. Love is the banner that Christ lifts up and displays this day to engage you to come to him, and enlist yourselves under his banner. Love is that which leads to the banqueting-house, and furnishes provision and entertainment for us there.

Observe I. That Christ has rich feasts in the ordinances for entertaining his people's souls.

II. That the banner which Christ displays for drawing us to him is love.

As to the first, I shall show, 1. That Christ in the ordinances provideth feasts for his people's souls. 2. That the Lord's supper in particular is one principal feast that he prepares for them. 3. Why he prepares such a feast. 4. Application.

As to the first, it is evident, 1. From God's promise to his people, Psal. xxxi. 8, "They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house, and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures." Isa. xxv. 6, "And in this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined." This promise is concerning the gospel-times. From Prov. ix. 2, where Wisdom, i. e. Christ, is said to have "killed her beasts, mingled her wine, and furnished her table." And to name no more, from Luke xv., where the father prepares the fatted calf for his penitent prodigal.

2. From the experience of God's people, as of David, Psal. iv. 6; lxiii. 5; lxxv. 4; and particularly from the experience of the church in the text, God's people can set their seal to this truth.

As to the second head, that the Lord's supper is one principal feast which the Lord prepares for his people. Wherefore it is called "the table of the Lord," 1 Cor. x. 21; it is called "a feast on the sacrifice of Christ," 1 Cor. v. 7, 8; "a wedding-feast," Matt. xxiii. 4. In these places the Lord's supper is principally pointed at. I shall here show wherein the Lord's supper resembles a feast; yea, it is not an ordinary feast, it is a rich, royal, and magnificent feast.

1. At a feast there is rich and noble provision.

So here there is more than bread and wine, even the body and blood of Christ. "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed," John vi. 55. What bread and wine affords to the body, viz. strength, comfort, and nourishment, the same doth the body and blood of Christ, received by faith, yield to the soul. Here is spiritual food to the hungry soul, bread that strengthens man's heart, and wine that cheers the fainting spirits. Behold here is wisdom's gates, and wisdom's feasts. It is good for us to be here, good to wait at her door-posts. Here the breasts of consolation are drawn forth, here we may suck and be satisfied. Here the fountain of life and the wells of salvation are opened, the stone rolled from the well's mouth. Here is the hidden manna, angels' food, bread from heaven, yea, the fruits of the tree of life, that grow in the midst of the paradise of God. Here is the water of life that springs from beneath the throne of God and the Lamb, clear as crystal; if you get but one drop of it, it shall be an everlasting spring to your soul, so that you need not thirst after carnal comforts and enjoyments. Here are the grapes of Canaan, the fruits that grow in the land of promise; yea, clusters of these grapes are at this feast, the first-fruits of heaven. In a word, there is at this spiritual feast for the soul to feed on, Christ crucified, and all his benefits and purchase. And are there not many dishes and delicacies here?

(1.) Here is pardon of sin sealed to a believer. O! is not this a rare feast and excellent cheer, Matt. ix. 2, "Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee." Here you get Christ's blood, which was shed for many for the remission of sins. Here we clasp about a crucified Christ as the great propitiatory sacrifice for our sins, and accept of him as the Lord our righteousness; and thus we receive the remission of sins. Here God saith to a believer, as Nathan to David, 2 Sam. xii. 13, "The Lord hath put away thy sins; thou shalt not die." Here we hear the voice of joy and gladness, which hath made many a broken bone to rejoice. Is there any thing more sweet than pardon to a condemned man near the place of execution? And what can give more joy than a free discharge to a sinner arrested by justice, and drawn to hell's door to be cast into that prison for debt, out of which there is no redemption.

(2.) We have peace and friendship with God. O rare dish! not only to be freed of a burden of debt, that would have weighed us down to hell; and for which millions already have been carried thither, and are roaring under it without hope; but also to be received into special favour with God: for in this sacrament a covenant of peace and friendship is sealed and confirmed. O must it not be a sweet cordial for an enemy, a rebel, to be owned as a special favourite of the King of heaven, so that the soul may send a challenge to hell and earth, and bid defiance to men and devils, Rom. viii. 33, 34, "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea, rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." And you may say with David, Psal. iv. 8, I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep: for thou, Lord, only makest me to dwell in safety." Come life, come death, I am safe; my conscience is disburdened, and I am at ease.

(3.) Adoption is another of the dishes at this feast. You are not only made a friend, but a son and heir; and in this sacrament you get sashine and infusement of the children's privileges, relation, and inheritance. And here God saith, I will be a Father to thee; and, son, thou shalt be ever with me, and all that I have is thine. Thou shalt have my blessing and love, the smiles of my face, the kisses of my mouth, and the arms of my grace to support and preserve thee. Thou shalt have my Son for thy elder Brother, thy Priest and Advocate; my angels to be thy guards; my providence to be thy protector and manager. Thou shalt have manna in the wilderness, and water out of the rock. Thou shalt be my heir, and joint heir with my eternal Son and First-born. Thou shalt have heaven for thy home, Christ's throne for thy seat, and a kingdom for thy portion; an honourable maintenance while here, and an incorruptible inheritance hereafter.

(4.) Another dish is peace of conscience. This is one of the precious legacies which Christ leaves in his testament, which is here sealed, John xiv. 27. It is here Christ speaks peace to his people and to his saints; here he breathes peace upon them, as in Luke xxiv. 36. Do doubts and fears arise within you, that hinder you to believe the good news, as with the disciples; so there is that in this sacrament which may check all these fears, Luke xxiv. 38, 39, "Why are ye troubled, and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me and see," &c. O but the prints of the nails may calm the doubting conscience, and quiet thy fears.

(5.) Supplies and strength to our weak and decayed graces. Here Christ's store-house is opened, and we may get grace for grace out of his fulness; here the smoking flax may be kindled into a flame, and the bruised reed find support; here you may get weak faith strengthened, cold love inflamed, weak desire kindled, repentance renewed, hope made lively, the soul fitted and fortified for trials and sufferings, and prepared for passing through the valley of the shadow of death: yea, in a word, you may get all your wants supplied, all your grievances redressed, and maladies remedied. Here you may get a meal that will both satisfy and beget a stomach in you, that will prove life to your souls, and poison to your lusts. It is here the empty soul is filled, the starving creature fed, the poor beggar enriched, the hard heart softened, the cold heart warmed, the dead soul quickened, the paralytic hand cured, the blind eye enlightened, the thirsty heart satisfied, the feeble knee strengthened, the straitened heart enlarged, the wandering heart fixed, the creeping desires elevated, the cloudy soul brightened, and the doubting soul resolved. O are not these gracious and blessed changes! Here you may get strength against your strong lusts and temptations, and furniture for every duty, so as you may pray with enlargement, hear with comfort, praise with elevation of mind, and meditate with delight.

(6.) Here is Christ's gracious presence, and a sight of his countenance. That is a rare delicacy in this feast, that satisfies the soul, Psal. xvi. ult., "In thy presence is fulness of joy," that was the psalmist's heaven upon earth. It is here Christ meets with his people, here he walks with them, and is held by them in the galleries; here he visits them, and holds communion with them, intimates his love, and kisses them with the kisses of his mouth. Here they see the King in his beauty, here the saints have beheld the beauty of the Lord, Psal. xxvii. 4. O this is worth our while. O let it be our errand this day to meet with Christ, and see his blessed face. God's people in all ages have placed their happiness here. Abraham rejoiced in a sight of Christ, though afar off, at 1900 years distance. The wise men thought it worth their while to undertake a long journey from the east to see him, though but new born. Old Simeon desires to see no more on earth, after he gets a sight of him though a child. Zaccheus ran and climbed up a tree to see him, though despised of men. O now he is shining in glory, shall we not desire a sight of him? David desired it as his "one thing," Psal. xxvii., though he then wanted his throne and kingdom. The spouse seeks it as her one thing, Cant. iii. 3, "Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?" O but a sight of him would make your face to shine, a sight of him in his love, in his dyed garments, treading out the wine-press alone.

(7.) Another dish is the comfort of his Spirit, and the clearing up your interest in Christ and glory, a sight of heaven and your names written in the book of life, so that all your fears may be scattered, objections answered, doubts resolved, and likewise the evidences of your graces cleared up to you, so that, though you doubted before if you had faith, yet now you may be enabled to say with the poor man, "Lord, I believe." You doubted before of your love, but now you may say with Peter, "Lord, thou that knowest all things, knowest that I love thee." You doubted before of your interest in Christ, but now you can say with Thomas, "My Lord, and my God;" with Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" and with Paul, "I know in whom I have believed."

Thus I have shown you some of the rich provision and noble entertainment prepared in this banquet before you: yea, you see it is not only rich provision, but there are choice rarities here, hidden manna, angels' food; yea, not only choice, but plenty and variety, food adapted to our souls, nature, and faculties; food to nourish, strengthen, delight, and refresh the soul. Here is food suitable to all the faculties, light to the mind, peace to the conscience, satisfaction to the will, and food for all the affections. Here love may satisfy itself in clasping the Desire of all nations. Delight may here bathe itself in the rivers of pleasure. In a word, what can the soul need but is here? For Christ is made of God to us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. Here is precious blood to purge away our deep guilt; here is perfect righteousness to cover our naked soul; here all things are given us richly to enjoy; here hope may feed on the great and precious promises.

2. At feasts there used to be lavers for the guests to wash in, as at the marriage-feast in Cana of Galilee, where were six water-pots set for purification, John ii. 6. Doth sense of defilement scare you from partaking? Behold here is a fountain opened, Zech. xiii. 1. O come and wash in it, that ye may be fit to compass God's altar, and sit down at his table.

3. At banquets there uses to be mirth and cheerfulness; so here, when prodigal sinners first return to their Father, he hath mirth and music to entertain them: see Luke xv. 24. The tidings of Christ's purchase, and the promises, are the best music and melody in the world. The news of what he hath done and suffered ought to fill your hearts and lips with the high praises of God, and thankful admiration of Christ and redeeming love. O believers, consider you are not come like mourners to a funeral, but like children to your father's feast, a royal feast, "I will bring them to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer, saith the Lord." So that ye may eat this bread with joy, and drink this wine with a merry heart, in hopes of God's accepting you and your sacrifice, Eccl. ix. 7.

4. At feasts there is the master of the feast, to bid the guests welcome; as ready is the Father to welcome the prodigal child. Christ is the Master of this feast; he hath sent forth his servants, to call and invite you to the feast, and now he is come to the table to bid you welcome, as Cant. v. 1, "Eat, O friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved."

5. At feasts there are servants to attend the guests; here the ministers are stewards and servants to attend Christ's guests at this feast: and their work is to direct you to the table, to give every one their portion of meat in due season. God grant we give not the children's bread to dogs, and them that have no right to it. We know not the heart; ye all have professed yourselves to be children, O do not mock God and his servants.

6. Here is a blessing craved by the Master of this feast; yea, he is commanded, and will command the blessings, and his servants are to pray for the virtue of that blessing to this table.

7. At a feast there is good company. O there is rare company at this feast. "The King sits at this table," Cant. i. 12, even the King of glory; Christ himself is there present, the Father also; for in this feast we have fellowship with the Father and the Son, through the Holy Spirit. Here the children of God, yea, the glorious saints above, sit at this table, and share with us in this feast. It is true, they sit at the upper end of the table, and we at the lower end. They have better appetites, better music; they feed on a naked Christ, we by signs and symbols; but we have all the same cheer. O what a great and good company is here! We read of Belshazzar that made a feast for a thousand of his lords, Dan. v. 1. But here is a feast for many thousands, yea, to all believers, Jews and Gentiles, an open free feast, Isa. xxv. And we read that Ahasuerus made a feast to all his princes and servants, which lasted one hundred and eighty days, Esth. i. 4. But here is a feast which lasts to all eternity.

III. As to the third head, why he prepares such a feast for his people? Ans. 1. To be a solemn memorial of his love to sinners, in suffering and dying for them; and this memorial is to be kept up through all generations till Christ's second coming. Just so the passover was a commemorating feast to the Israelites of their protection and deliverance from the bondage of Egypt.

2. To discover his infinite riches and goodness to poor sinners. So Ahasuerus, Esth. i. 3, 4, "made a feast to all his princes and servants, to show them the riches of his excellent majesty."

3. To express the joy and satisfaction he hath in the believer's coming to him. The father of the prodigal evidenced his joy for the return of his son, who was dead and now alive, lost and found, by a feast of music. O believers, this is the day of the gladness of Christ's heart; glad is he to see his prodigals returning, and this feast is the welcome home.

4. To express his love to believers, and that he might have opportunity of nearer communion and fellowship with them. At feasts, people have great freedom and familiarity with one another, mutual expressions of kindness, communicating of secrets, rejoicing in one another. O but many a poor soul has been ravished with Christ's love here, and with the wine of his consolation; he hath made rare discoveries of his love to them.

5. To ratify and confirm the covenant between God and us. It was usual in the eastern countries to ratify contracts and covenants, by eating and drinking together. So was it in the covenant made between Isaac and Abimelech, see Gen. xxvi. 28—30. And so it was a federal rite between Laban and Jacob, Gen. xxxi. 46, between the Israelites and Gibeonites, Josh. ix. 14, between David and Abner, 2 Sam. iii. 20. Consider then, this is a covenanting feast, here a solemn bargain between God and us is sealed and ratified. What is the bargain? See the tenor of the covenant, Acts xvi. 31, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Here we engage to believe in Christ, and Christ engages to save us. Here God promises to be to us a God, and we promise to be to him a people. Here God promises and seals the benefits of the covenant on his part, and we promise and seal the duties of the covenant on our part. Here God's giving the signs is as a seal on his part, and our taking them is a seal on ours. Here Christ gives us his soul and body to save us, and we give our souls and bodies to serve him. Here God binds himself to be faithful, and we bind ourselves to be constant. Yea, we here swear allegiance to Christ over his broken body and shed blood.

6. To be a cordial to his poor fainting ones, and for strengthening the weak and feeble of his people. Many of his people are sorely cast down, and have dwelt long with fears and horrors; and this is relief to them, here Christ smiles, and speaks peace. Others are weak in grace, here he brings them supplies; here the decayed have renewed their strength; here the lame have been made to leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb to sing.

7. To fortify and encourage against all difficulties and trials we may meet with in Christ's service. We are to look for reproaches and persecutions, if we hold fast by Christ. Satan and the world will not be idle, see Heb. x. 23. Here is a meal and cordial to hearten us for it; and some have met with that in this feast which hath made them cheerfully venture on sufferings, and resolve never to leave Christ. An hour of sealing animates the soul for an hour of suffering. If the Redeemer smile on us, and his love be shed abroad in our hearts, we can bear any thing, suffer any thing, lose any thing, and not be discouraged. O then come, and take in provision against the evil day, for ye have a wilderness to go through. Elijah was excited to take a double meal, for his journey was long. So if you would have strength for your journey, O here you may have it; here is food more subsisting, durable, and nourishing than Elijah's eake and cruise of water, of which he ate and drank, and in the strength of that meal went forty days and forty nights, unto Horeb, the mount of God, 1 Kings xix. 6—8. What bread and wine afford to the body, the same doth Christ's body and blood in the sacrament, received by faith, afford to the soul, viz. strengthening, comforting, nourishment. And who but a madman would be so cruel to himself, as to deny his faint body its stated meals and relief? O may it not hearten you, that whatever your straits, bodily wants, or necessities are, and however he may be despised, you have a great King that honours you, owns you, takes you to feast with himself here, and will shortly call you to the marriage-supper of the Lamb above.

8. To wean you from the vain pleasures and comforts of the world, and from sensual delights; and to make you long for that glorious and full feast above. This is a foretaste of it, and should stir up a hunger for it; for this feast is the first fruits of heaven.

I. Improvement. I infer what a horrid calumny it is, that is raised against the ways of Christ by the devil and the world, that they are sad and melancholy, of purpose to frighten men from them. No, you see Christ has royal feasts for his people the world knows little of. A believer would not give a crumb of this spiritual feast for many days of worldly feasts.

II. Admire his condescension, that the Lord of glory should make such a feast for beggars, see Luke xiv. 21. Poor worms, vile sinners, will he call us, that deserve not a dog's crumb beneath the table, to come and sit down with the children at the table? O what are we that he should deal so with us, sinners vile as the mire, and black as hell. You have far greater cause to wonder at this privilege than Mephibosheth, 2 Sam. ix. 7, "David said to him, I will surely show thee kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and will restore thee all the land of Saul thy father, and thou shalt eat bread at my table continually." Observe his answer, "what is thy servant, that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?"

III. How inexcusable are they who slight this feast, that has cost Christ so dear, more than ten thousand kingdoms? He has made all things ready, and has been calling on sinners to come. Consider how grievously the king took it, when he made his marriage-supper, and those that were bidden would not come, Luke xiv. 24.

IV. Exhortation. O communicants who have been preparing for this feast, come away to the marriage, all things are ready on Christ's part. Object. But how shall I get access to the banqueting-house? Ans. Employ Christ to bring you in. It is he alone that brings his spouse in. You may come to the table, and get the outward elements, but unless Christ bring you into the banqueting-house, ye will not be taken in. It is only Christ can give you appetites, and clothe you with the wedding-garment; it is only he that can quicken the dead soul, and strengthen the weak. "I can do all things through Christ strengthening me," saith Paul. He only can send the comforter, the north and south gales of the Spirit. He only can remove the burden of sin, and take away the heart of stone, dissolve doubts, and scatter clouds. O look and long for him then to bring you in, and say with those in John xi. 56, "What think ye, will he come to the feast?" Will he bring me into the banqueting-house; will he touch my heart and take me by the hand? Poor sinner, I will tell you whom he will bring in. It is true, it is not every one; many come thronging to the feast that have no ground to expect to be taken in. But there are some he will bring in and they are these:—The hungry and thirsty sinner, that is longing for a meeting with Christ, sensible of his needs and wants, and crying, O a crumb from his hand, a drop from his wounds, a seal of pardon from that table, else I die. These have a promise to be filled.—The poor broken-hearted humble soul, that has a deep sense of his own nothingness and unworthiness, saying, I am not worthy that Christ should come under my roof, and far less worthy that I should come under Christ's roof, my sins are so many and great. Is there any standing afar off with the publican, afraid to come to the holy table, saying, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Christ will come to such, Isa. lvii. 15, "He will revive the spirit of the humble, and the heart of the contrite ones."—The poor praying and wrestling soul, that has been putting up many a petition, sigh, and groan for access, saying, "O that I knew where to find him!" O when wilt thou come unto me, how long wilt thou hide thy face?

O have you been storming heaven with your cries last week, last night, and this morning? Have ye been knocking for the opening of the door of the banqueting-house? He will come and bring such in.—All the friends and lovers of Christ will be taken in. O sinner, art thou such, see thy warrant and thy welcome, Cant. vi. 1. O, say some, I cannot be a friend to Christ; but I wish him well, and his people, and interest. I cannot say I am a true lover of Christ; but I find my heart glowing and warming with desire to him, and I would give all the world I had these glowings kindled into a flame. Take courage, poor soul, Christ will not quench the smoking flax, he will blow it up into a flame, and take thee in.—All sincere covenanting souls, that have been yesternight and this morning honestly consenting to the bargain offered in the gospel, content to close with Christ as he offers himself, to renounce their idols and lusts, and to give Christ their hearts. Is there any soul willing to open to Christ? O then he will take you in, Rev. iii. 20, "If any man open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." O poor sinners, that never opened your hearts to Christ, be persuaded to open to a bountiful Lord; open your hearts to him, and he will open his banqueting-house to you. O sinner, hast thou no need of Christ's dainties? Art thou not a poor, perishing, starving soul, a famished prodigal, and needest thou not the bread of life? Christ is at the door with variety of blessings, and ready to open his banqueting-house to you, O will ye open to him? Consider that if ye do not accept of Christ, he may pass such a sentence against you as in Luke xiv. 24, "For I say unto you, that none of these men which were bidden shall taste of my supper." O! will it not be dreadful to see the saints sitting at the royal feast in heaven, and you yourselves shut out like a company of starving beggars standing about the doors where the marriage-supper is kept? They see the lights, and behold the rich dishes carried up; they hear the mirth and music of the guests, but not a bit comes to their share.

But as for you that are content to accept of Christ on his own terms, come away to the marriage supper, Christ the Master of the feast invites you, and will make you welcome. And in coming to this feast, observe the following directions.

1. Come with holy awe and reverence of God, the Master and Maker of this feast. If ye were going to a prince's table, you would have some awe upon your spirits; mind the Master of this feast is a glorious, holy, and jealous God, that will not be mocked.

2. Come with a pure heart and clean hands, wash your hearts in the tears of true repentance, cleanse them of all filth, through the blood of Jesus, which cleanseth from all sin, otherwise you will affront the Master of this feast. Should a beggar that has been wallowing in the mire, intrude himself in that condition into a prince's company, sit down at his table, and dip his besmeared hands into the same dish with him, how would he take it? O come not with filthy rags and filthy hands to this holy table, but repent of every sin, renounce every sin, and resolve against every sin.

3. Come with a holy fear and jealousy over yourselves, afraid that you be not ready. Cry, Lord, let me not wrong Christ or my own soul this day! O let me not betray the Son of God with a kiss! O let me not murder Christ or my own soul, contract blood-guiltiness, or drink damnation! O what if I want the wedding-garment when the King comes in to view the guests!

4. Come with a broken and bleeding heart to view the slain Lamb. O will not the dying groans and bleeding wounds of Christ move you? When you see him stretched out and nailed, will ye not cry, O behold my Saviour that was nailed for me, dying with love in his heart, and smiles in his face; O it was my sins drove in these nails. Remember the sun veiled his face in the time of Christ's sufferings, fainted at the sight, and could not look! O vail yours, retire inwardly, and take amends of sin, the cause of his sufferings.

5. Have on the wedding-garment; viz. faith in a Redeemer's righteousness. Come relying on him for acceptance, and look to him for strength and furniture; look up to him, O dead soul, for life and quickening. How unseemly will it be to see a company of dead corpses set down to the feast of the living God? O be exercising faith in a lively manner on Christ, for faith is the life of all. O come, reach hither thy finger, and behold Christ's hands; reach hither thy hand, and feel the prints of the nails, and mark of the spear, and cry with Thomas, "My Lord and my God; here will I rest, and here will I stay." In the clefts of his wounds my soul shall take shelter, where justice shall not reach me.

6. Come with love, for it is a love-feast. O love Christ, that is both the Master, the Maker, and matter of the feast. Christ's heart is burning and bleeding with love to you; O let yours do so to him. Without love ye have nothing to do here. Come also with love and charity to all men, be ready to forgive every one, as ye would have God to forgive you.

7. Come with panting and thirsting desires to see and meet with Christ, saying, I care not who be here, if Christ be absent. O the desire of my soul is towards him and the remembrance of his name.

8. Come with expectation, depending only on Christ's merits, God's promises and free mercy in Christ, eagerly expecting something from Christ this day, as the poor cripple man did from Peter and John, Acts iii. 4, 5, "And Peter fastening his eyes upon him, with John, said, Look on us. And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something of them." We ordinarily receive little, because we expect little. O raise your desires and expectations, for you come to a merciful and a liberal God, that will not let the expectation of the poor perish, Psal. ix. 18.

9. Come resigning yourselves to Christ. Give up your hearts to Christ, saying, Lord, I have no sacrifice to bring but my heart. O that it were a thousand times better than it is, it should be thine; Lord, accept of the poor sacrifice.

10. Come with admiration and praise. O the high praises of God shall be in our mouths: wonder and praise God for the contrivance of our redemption, and for making choice of such a Redeemer. O wonder and praise our Redeemer for leaving his throne of glory for a manger; yea, for a cross and a grave, and all for the sake of us. Say, "Lord, what am I that thou shouldst part with thy glory, yea, with thy blood and life for such a wretch as I am? O how am I ashamed that I love thee no more; my heart is cold, my tongue is slow, I cannot love, I cannot praise. O let heaven and earth, angels and men, join and extol his free grace and wondrous love." If ye come in such a frame, you will be taken into the banqueting-house, and his banner over you will be love. And this leads me to speak a word on the banner of love.

Christ upon the cross hath lifted up a banner of love, he hath declared himself willing to receive every soul that will come under his banner, and enlist himself to fight under his colours. As ye are professing to leave the devil's standard, and come to Christ, by taking your sacrament, (which used to be a military oath among the Romans,) and swearing allegiance to Christ; O mind ye are not to draw back, but to follow the Captain of your salvation, and fight against the devil, the world, and the flesh. If ye perjure yourselves, and return to your old ways, saying, Welcome, drunken cups, bloody oaths, lying, &c. ye will incur all the curses of the law, and vengeance of the gospel also. O ye will sink deeper into hell than others, and ye will be made to cry, Would to God I had been the son of a Pagan or Mahometan. Wherefore own and stand by the banner of Christ; and to encourage you to steadfastness, keep in mind that you have,—A noble General, who hath already conquered, and is ready to join you in the fight.—A noble cause; it is the Lord's battle, they are God's enemies, and enemies to your souls also.—You have noble weapons, the shield of faith, sword of the Spirit, &c.; they are impenetrable and full proof.—Noble pay, a white stone, a crown, and a new name, grace here, and glory hereafter.—Ye are sure of victory, if ye fight valiantly, for Christ will fairly bring you out of the field at length.

A banner is a sign of union; it signifies that all who resort to it are united in one company, under such a captain: O then study union among yourselves. Let the consideration of Christ's love move you all to be united and to love one another. O shun division, discord, slandering, and backbiting; ye are soldiers of one company, and under one Captain, and if you divide, enemies will reap advantage. Again, a banner is a sign of protection, and love is the banner that engages Christ to protect his people; as long as Christ loves his people, he will protect and defend them. O then mind your work in evil times, flee to Christ's love, and abide in this love; keep your souls in the love of God, clear up the evidences of Christ's love, and so you may look to him for protection and through-bearing in the worst case; men or devils shall do you no hurt, while his banner over you is love. Lastly, A banner displayed signifies victory: when conquerors won a city, they display their colours on the walls; O has Christ this day won your hearts, conquered your enemies and lusts, and displayed his banner thereupon. O it is love that engaged him to make such a conquest. Be faithful to your friendly Conqueror, and let not these enemies and rebels get into the city again. O hold out the city, and fight valiantly under Christ's banner; be not cowardly, do not basely surrender the fort that Christ hath won; he has won it, let him wear it, let him possess the throne for ever. Say to Christ, as the men of Israel said to Gideon, Judges viii. 22, "Rule thou over us, for thou hast delivered us out of the band of Midian." O but Christ has delivered you out of the hands of Satan; submit therefore kindly to his government and laws, own him as a King as well as a Priest; surrender willingly the keys of your hearts to him, and keep your heart for him.

FIVE SACRAMENTAL SERMONS.

SERMON I.—BEING A FAST-DAY'S SERMON BEFORE THE LORD'S SUPPER.—OF GOD'S WITHDRAWINGS FROM HIS PEOPLE, AND THEIR EXERCISE UNDER THEM.

O the Hope of Israel, the Saviour thereof in time of trouble; why shouldst thou be as a stranger in the land, and as a way-faring man, that turneth aside to tarry for a night?—Jer. xiv. 8.

THIS chapter was penned in the time of a great dearth in the land of Judah, occasioned by a grievous drought and want of rain, which fell out about the latter end of king Josiah's reign: which calamity the prophet pathetically laments, and takes as a token of God's withdrawing his gracious presence from them; whereupon, ver. 7. he makes a most humble confession of sin, in the name of the church, disclaims anything of worth or merit in themselves, and pleads only the glory of God's name.

The prophet's scope, in the text and context, is to deprecate God's judgments, and particularly that terrible one of his withdrawing his presence from his church and people. "Why," says he, ver. 8, "shouldst thou be as a stranger in the land?" and ver. 9, "Leave us not." So that he seems to pass from the consideration of the stroke of drought to that of God's withdrawing his presence from them. Whence we may observe, that God's people dread and deprecate the withdrawing of his gracious presence, more than the removal of all their creature-comforts, or any other judgment whatsoever.

More particularly, in the text we have, 1. The gracious titles he gives to God, as the grounds on which he pleads for his gracious favour and presence, "O the hope of Israel!" i. e. the object of Israel's hope, whose word and promise is the only foundation of their hope: "the Saviour of Israel in the time of trouble," i. e. the helper and deliverer of Israel in former times of distress. And then, from these grounds he doth, in the second place, humbly plead and expostulate the matter with God in a twofold question: (1.) "Why shouldst thou be as a stranger in the land?" i. e. Why shouldst thou behave to us at this time as a stranger, in keeping at a distance from us, and inclining, as it were, to drop all acquaintance and correspondence with us? (2.) "Why shouldst thou be as a way-faring man, that turns aside to tarry for a night?" i. e. Why shouldst thou seem unconcerned about our interest and welfare, like a traveller that comes into an inn, and never inquires into the affairs of it? Or why shouldst thou pay such short and transient visits, as if thou wast weary of us, and ready to depart for good and all?

Doctrine. That as it sometimes pleaseth God to withdraw himself, and behave as a stranger to his church and people; so there is nothing in the world that will be such matter of exercise and trouble to the serious seekers of God, as such a dispensation.

As this is plainly founded on the text, so also it is evident, from many other places of scripture, and the practice of the saints therein recorded, Job xxiii. 3—9; Psal. xiii. 1, 2; Psal. xxvii. 7.

In handling this doctrine, I shall observe the following method: I. Premise some things for the better understanding of it. II. Show when it may be said that the Lord withdraws from, and behaves as a stranger to his people. III. For what reasons and grounds he useth to do so. IV. When it may be said, that people are duly exercised about this melancholy dispensation. V. Whence it is, that this dispensation is matter of such exercise and trouble to the serious seekers of God. VI. I shall make some improvement of the whole.

I begin with the first; viz. To premise some things for the better understanding of this doctrine, and for preventing mistakes.

1. However God doth at any time withdraw from his people, yet we must remember, he never takes away his loving-kindness from them, Isa. liv. 10.

2. However God may withdraw the sensible and comforting influences of his Spirit from his people; yet he never withdraws his Spirit from them, as to his real presence and inhabitation for the preservation and support of their spiritual life, John xiv. 17.

3. God's withdrawals from his people are never either total or final, but only in part, and for a time, Heb. xiii. 5; Isa. liv. 7, 8. God never leaves his people altogether, but is still graciously present with them one way or other; if not in respect of comfort, yet he is with them in respect of grace; if not in a way of quickening, yet still in a way of support; if not in enlivening their affections, yet it may be in enlightening their understandings; if not giving sensible enjoyments, yet in giving hungry desires: so that the Lord is still with them some way or other.

4. There are various degrees of God's withdrawing himself from his people; with some of them the day is only dark and cloudy; with others it is twilight, neither dark nor light; but with many it is night: with some, neither the sun nor stars have for many days appeared; but with others (according to their apprehensions) it is a total eclipse.

5. We should distinguish betwixt God's withdrawing from his people in point of comfort, and his withdrawing in point of grace. These two do not still go together: for the first may be where the second is not. A believer may be deprived of the shinings of God's love and favour, when yet faith may be lively, desires strong, the heart tender, and grace in a vigorous condition; but oft-times God withdraws in point of grace, as well as in point of comfort: I do not mean in respect of the habit of grace, for this can never be rooted out, where it is once planted; but only in respect of the exercise and some particular degrees of grace: these may be lost, so as the soul becomes weak, and sometimes very feeble and languid in duty; the breath grows cold, the pulse beats low, "and the things that remain seem ready to die," Rev. iii. 2.

II. The second thing proposed, was to show when it may be said that the Lord withdraws; and behaves as a stranger to his people.

1. When he withholdeth his wonted acts of kindness from them; sees them in trouble, and steps not in for their relief, as in former times. Of this the church complains, Isa. lxiii. 15, "Where is thy zeal and thy strength? The sounding of thy bowels, and thy mercies toward me, are they now restrained?" He suffered their enemies to gather strength, to rise up and oppress them, and bring them very low; and did not seem to regard their cry, nor show his mercy or power in helping them; but withdrew his hand, and behaved as a stranger that was not concerned about them. It was on this account that Gideon reckoned God to be withdrawn from Israel, when the angel of the Lord appeared to him, Judg. vi. 12, and said, "The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valour." But Gideon was so much taken up with the distressed case of the church in general, that he waves the consideration of his own particular case, and says, verse 13, "O, my Lord; if the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? And where be all his miracles which our fathers told us of?" q. d. If the Lord were not withdrawn, and become as a stranger to us, surely he would not have suffered the Midianites to oppress us so sore and so long, without appearing for our help. In like manner of times reasons a poor discouraged believer, if the Lord were not withdrawn, why should my old lusts (which I once thought were both killed and buried) rise up and trouble me? Alas! I am left to struggle against them alone, and "iniquities prevail against me;" I strive to stem the tide, but it grows the more: "How long shall the enemy be exalted over me?"

2. When the Lord threatens to remove the signs and symbols of his presence from his people, viz. pure ordinances and sacraments; when he lets enemies combine, and carry on their plots for this purpose; when our springs are in hazard of being stopped or poisoned, and we put to seek our "spiritual bread with the peril of our lives, because of the sword of the wilderness," Lam. v. 9. This hath been the lot of God's people in this land; now indeed we get our bread at an easier rate, but alas! we do not prize it, nor grow by it. May not God be provoked then to withdraw it, or send us to the wilderness again to seek it?

3. When though the Lord continues pure ordinances and sacraments with his people, yet denies the wonted blessing and benefit thereof to them, yea, blasts them; according to that sad word, Mal. ii. 2, "If ye will not hear and lay it to heart, I will even curse your blessings, yea, I have cursed them already." This we fear is the case of many; they have the word and sacraments in purity and plenty, but do not find them blest; God's Spirit doth not concur with them, and their souls do not thrive under them. Surely the Lord behaves as a stranger to our assemblies, when ministers are straitened in preaching, and people are straitened in hearing; when we that are sent to you, feel much coldness on our own hearts, and have a number of cold hearts to deal with, and a live-coal is not brought from the altar to kindle the fire.

4. When the Lord frowns on his people in the course of his providence, denies them outward mercies, and denounces temporal strokes and calamities, yea, actually brings them on, whereby his people are brought very low; they look to God for pity, but no relief comes; their distress is long continued, and their trials lengthened out. So when Zion's captivity was prolonged, she cried out, Isa. xlix. 14, "The Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me."

5. The Lord behaves as a stranger to his people, when he trusts them with dumb and silent rods; trials whereof they understand not the language, and whereby they reap no benefit. This was the case of God's people, Isa. lvii. 17, "For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him: I hid me and was wroth, and he went on frowardly in the way of his heart." Though God's rod should have let him to see his sin, and lay to heart the cause of the controversy, yet he took no notice of it, but went on in his former course: many, though God's hand be lifted up, they will not see. They are not bettered by his dispensations.

6. When the Lord denies access to his people in duty, and breaks off his wonted correspondence with them: they come to God's ordinary meeting-places with his people, ordinances both public and private, but he is not there; they seek him, but still they miss him, so as they are put to cry with that holy man, Job xxiii. 3, "O that I knew where I might find him." O that I knew the place, the duty, the sermon, the sacrament, where I might find him; there I would go and seek him; I try prayer, (saith the poor soul) but that brings me not to him; "for when I cry out and shout, he shutteth out my prayer," as Lam. iii. 8. Alas! I get not access to God as formerly, he carries now to me as an alien; for when I come and knock, I find nothing but a shut door, and a silent God. In a word, the Lord withdraws, and behaves as a stranger to his people, when he withhold the manifestations of his countenance, the operations of his Spirit, and the special communications of light and life, which he useth to allow to them that love him.

III. The next thing was to inquire into the grounds and reasons, why the Lord deals so with his people. I grant, the Lord may thus withdraw from them out of his absolute sovereignty; but commonly he doth it for the correction of sin, Isa. lix. 2. As,

1. When they are guilty of gross sins and scandalous out-breakings, such as cast a reproach upon religion, and the good ways of the Lord, Isa. i. 13, 14. This is plain in David's case; see 2 Sam. xii. 14, compared with Psal. li. 11.

2. When they turn earthly-minded and prefer the delights of sense to precious Christ, then he withdraws, Isa. lvii. 17. They that have a strong relish for the flesh-pots of Egypt, are not fit to taste the hidden manna. When the Gadarenes came that length as to prefer their swine to Christ's presence, he turned his back, and departed from their coasts, Mat. viii. 28.

3. When we turn slothful and formal in duty, and do not stir up ourselves to seek God's face, then he withdraws, as is plain from Isa. lxiv. 7; Cant. iii. 1. If you put God off with bodies exercise, he will put you off with empty ordinances and dry breasts: if you serve him not with your spirits, he will deprive you of his Spirit. Wherefore, if you would have the Lord be with you, ye must shake off sloth, "Arise and be doing:" according to 1 Chron. xxii. 16.

4. When we neglect or slight the Mediator; by whom we have access and nearness to God, we provoke the Lord to withdraw and turn a stranger to us. And this we do,—When we do not look to Christ for strength to perform duty, but trust to our own strength for doing it.—When we make a saviour of our duties, and put them in Christ's room: and this we are prone to, especially when we attain to any freedom or enlargement in duty. All is well now, think we, God is well pleased, this will render us acceptable to him, and atone for former guilt; and thus the glorious Mediator is forgot, and the idol self is exalted in his place; which is most displeasing to God.

5. When we miscarry under signal manifestations and pledges of God's loving-kindness; turn unthankful, remiss, and untender in our walk, after he hath taken us into his presence-chamber, and set us under the banner of his love. We are told how Solomon sadly miscarried, "even after the Lord had appeared to him twice;" for which the Lord was provoked to withdraw from him, 1 Kings xi. 9. And has not the Lord appeared to some of you, at communion-seasons, oftener than once or twice, and yet grievously have they miscarried after all? Great cause have ye to mourn on this account, and beg that the Lord may not plead a lasting controversy with you for it.

6. When we sin under, and after great afflictions or trials appointed to reclaim us, God is provoked to leave us, Isa. lvii. 17. Has not God smitten some of you, and brought you into the furnace, so that ye melted under his hand? But when in pity he delivered you again, ye soon forgot his dealings, and turned to your old ways. Is it any wonder that he frown and behave as a stranger to you?

7. God is provoked to leave us, when we do not entertain the motions and kindly touches of his Spirit on our hearts; the spouse neglected these, so that her beloved withdrew, turned a stranger to her, and it cost her much travel and sorrow ere she got his countenance again, Cant. v. 2, 3, 6, 7.

8. When we grow hardened and impenitent under provocations, so as we have neither a due sense of our own sins, nor of the sins of the land we live in, Hos. v. 15, "I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offences, and seek my face." Ah! was there ever more guilt lying on a land, and less feeling of it, than amongst us at this day?

IV. The fourth thing was to show when it may be said that people are rightly exercised under such a dispensation, as this of the Lord's withdrawing, and behaving as a stranger to them.

1. We may be said to be rightly exercised under it, when we are truly sensible of our loss, and of our sins, as the procuring cause thereof; and hence are brought heartily to mourn and "lament after the Lord," as the prophet doth in the text and context, and as Israel did in the days of Samuel, 1 Sam. vii. 2.

2. When we place all our comfort and happiness in the favour and presence of God, and are unsatisfied with all other comforts without this; count all worldly things but loss and dung; look on sun, moon, health, wealth, honours, pleasures, houses, relations, yea, life and breath, as most empty and comfortless things without God; so did the prophet in the text, when he addresses himself with this title, "O the hope of Israel!" q. d. All our hope is in thee, and we are poor, miserable, and hopeless creatures without thee; and so did the Psalmist, when he saith, Psal. lxxiii. 25, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee."

3. When we are at pains to engage our whole hearts, and all the powers and faculties of our souls, to seek after a withdrawing God: "With my whole heart have I sought thee," saith David, Psal. cxix. 10. And because our hearts are deceitful, and ready to start aside from this work, we should be laying ties and engagements on them to be sincere and fervent about this work, for God takes special notice of such who do so; Jer. xx. 21, "Who is this that engageth his heart to approach unto me?"

4. When we diligently lay hold on all opportunities, and use all appointed means for finding an absent God; like the spouse that sought her beloved about all the city, both in the streets and broad ways, Cant. iii. 2. In all duties and ordinances, both private and public, our souls should follow hard after him, and pursue him closely, as it were, from one ordinance to another, Psal. lxxiii. 8.

5. When we wrestle with him in prayer for his gracious return to us, and fill our mouths with arguments in pleading with him, as the prophet doth in the text and context:—He pleads the glory of his name, "Do it for thy name's sake."—He pleads their hopeless and helpless case without him, who was the fountain of all help and comfort: "O the hope of Israel and Saviour thereof."—He pleads the former experiences they had of his kindness to them in their helpless condition: "O Saviour of Israel in the time of trouble."—He pleads his power; it was very easy for him to relieve them, whatever straits they were in: "Why shouldest thou be as a man astonished, as a mighty man that cannot save?"—He pleads the outward symbols and pledges of his presence he had given them, his temple, his ark, and oracles: "Thou, O Lord, art in the midst of us."—He pleads the covenant-relation they stood in to him: "We are called by thy name." Upon all which accounts, we beseech thee leave us not.

6. We are duly exercised under God's withdrawals, when we hold on in our close pursuits after him, notwithstanding of discouragements and disappointments, like Mary Magdalene, John xx. who would not leave the sepulchre when others left it, but searched it over and over again, and waited on with patience, still looking for him, till at length she found her beloved. Thus was the psalmist exercised, Psal. xxv. 15, 16, "Mine eyes are ever towards the Lord.—Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me, for I am desolate and afflicted."

7. When we are unsatisfied with the best means and ordinances, unless we find God in them: David was not content with his enjoying the tabernacle, the ark, sacrifices, the passover, and other of God's pure ordinances: but, in the midst of all, "his heart and flesh cried out for the living God," Psal. lxxxiv. 2. Hypocrites, if they have the outward means, are well satisfied; for God's presence and absence are all one to them: but sincere believers will not be put off so; if God be not in the ordinances, nothing can please them, not the most powerful sermons, though an angel were to preach them; nor the most lively communions, though a glorified apostle should come and dispense them. The absence of God is such a great want to them, that nothing in heaven or earth can fill up, but himself.

V. The fifth thing is to show, whence it is that the Lord's withdrawing and behaving as a stranger to his people, is such a matter of exercise and trouble to them.

1. Because of the incomparable sweetness and advantage they enjoy in his gracious presence, while they have it; for this is the sum and compend of all blessings, and hath all good things wrapt up in it. The divine presence brings light and life, health and strength, peace and comfort, yea, complete satisfaction to the precious soul that doth enjoy it; no wonder then, that the people of God should be so much concerned for the want of it; for then they may cry out with Micah, and with just ground too, "They have taken away my gods, and what have I more?" Judg. xviii. 24.

2. Because of the effects and consequences of God's withdrawals from the soul; which being very sad and melancholy, are matter of great exercise and trouble to God's people: as for instance, (1.) There follows usually on it, a great darkness upon the spirit; as, when the sun goes down, darkness covers the face of the earth; so when God withdraws, thick clouds veil the face of the understanding, and the whole soul; so that the poor disconsolate soul is bewildered, knows not his way, nor what course to take, but is made to complain, as in Lam. iii. 2, "He hath brought me into darkness, and not into light." Alas! saith he, I know not where I am, nor how it is with me; I know not God's mind nor will towards me; I see not any comfortable sign, neither know I the time how long; I meet with many dark providences, dark ordinances, dark communions, all is dark to me.

(2.) Not only darkness, but much deadness and stupidity also seizes upon the deserted soul. Why are our spirits so dead in prayer, in hearing, and so dead in communicating? Is it not because the Lord is withdrawn? What these two sisters said to Christ, John xi, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died;" may be well said by such a poor soul, Lord, if thou hadst been here present in such a duty, in such a sermon or communion, my heart had not been so dead; for why, as Moses saith, Deut. xxx. 22, "He is thy life;" so when our life withdraws, we are dead, and all things are dead to us.

(3.) There follows also an unspiritedness and disability for duty: the soul hath neither heart nor hand for prayer, for reading, hearing, communicating, meditation, self-examination, or any duty. Deserted Heman saith, "I am as a man that hath no strength," Psal. lxxxviii. 4. David's complaint is much the same Psal. xl. 12, "Mine iniquities have taken hold on me, I am not able to look up." His spiritual strength was so wasted, that he was scarce able either to speak or look to God. Now, what is the cause of all our weakness or incapacity for duty? Oh! the Lord is withdrawn. It is a true word our Saviour saith, John xv. 5, "Without me ye can do nothing." It were happy for us, that we were most sensible of this truth, for we are most apt to trust to our own strength, and think still we can do well enough for ourselves: like Samson, when he had sinned away both his God and his strength, yet he went forth to shake himself as at other times, "but wist not that the Lord had departed from him." So many are insensible of the Lord's departure, they go to communions, and think to shake themselves, as at other times; but Oh! there is a benumbedness and weakness that has seized on their spirits, they cannot now lift up their souls at his table.

(4.) There usually follows, on God's withdrawing, great witheredness and barrenness on the souls of his people; their leaf fades, their fruit drops, and they quickly turn like the mountains of Gilboa, "on which there is neither dew nor rain," John xv. 6, "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered." It is his gracious presence only that can make us "fat and flourishing in the courts of our God."

(5.) We become exposed and liable to manifold dangers and enemies; for when God withdraws, our defence withdraws too. Hence Moses comforts Israel against their enemies, Num. xiv. 9, "Ye need not fear them," saith he, "for their defence is departed from them, the Lord is with us." The Lord's presence is his people's defence against all the assaults of their enemies, whether from within or from without, against the power of their lusts, the policy of the devil, and cruelty of the wicked: but if their fence be removed, they are exposed to them all.

(6.) Another effect, which is matter of sad exercise, is, great trouble and anxiety of mind for former unkindness and ingratitude to God. Hence the psalmist saith, Psal. lxxvii. 3, "I remembered God, and was troubled." Formerly he had remembered God, and was comforted; his meditation of him was sweet, but now it was far otherwise: Oh! says he, I now remember my unkindness to him that was so good to me; my conscience upbraids me for my unsuitable carriage: "Is this thy kindness to thy friend?" Where are all thy former purposes and resolutions? Thy promises and vows made at sacraments? Are they all come to this? Oh! thou hast sinned thy God and friend away from thee! It was the thoughts thereof that broke Peter's heart, and made him weep so bitterly.

(7.) There follows on it very melancholy and unwelcome thoughts of death and judgment. When God is present with the believer, he can say as in Psal. xxiii. 4, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me." But O! it is melancholy to think of going through that valley without him, and of appearing before him while he frowns and behaves as a stranger or enemy to us.

(8.) Sometimes there follows a revived sense of wrath, old wounds begin to open and bleed afresh; the deserted soul is driven back to the foot of mount Sinai, and begins to hear its thunders and curses renewed, though he once thought they had been all silenced by the blood of Christ. Thus it was with Heman, Psal. lxxxviii. 7, "Thy wrath lieth hard upon me," &c.

Lastly, The fears of utter rejection is another consequence, that oft proves matter of sad exercise to the deserted soul. Alas! I fear my cause shall never be better, that my sky shall never break, nor my clouds dissipate; that I shall never recover God's presence again, but be banished eternally from it; so with the psalmist, Psal. lxxvii. 9, 10, "Has God forgotten to be gracious? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?" And Psal. cxix. 8, "O forsake me not utterly."

APPLICATION.

Use I. Of Information. 1. Hence we may be informed, that there are but few true seekers of God among us, seeing there are few to whom God's withdrawing is matter of much exercise or trouble; few mourning on this account, like the prophet, and crying, "Why art thou such a stranger to my soul?" Many are troubled for other trifling losses, but few that can say with David, Psal. xxx. 7, "Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled."

2. We may see the misery of those who are far from God now, and are like to be deprived of his presence for ever, Psal. lxxiii. 27. Unrenewed persons desire not God's presence here, but say to him, "Depart from us," John xxi. 14, and alas! their choice is their judgment, and shall be so for ever; for the judge's sentence against them will be, "Depart from me," &c. If the Ephesians sorrowed most of all for that parting word of Paul to them, "Ye shall see my face no more," Acts xx. 38, how much more will such a word from Christ's mouth at the last day be piercing and heart-breaking to the ungodly for ever?

3. How sad must the case of those be, from whom God withdraws, not to return again! The Spirit of God comes, and strives for a time with many; but, when resisted and grieved, he goes away from an unconverted soul, he seldom returns to strive any more. When the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, he came not again, but an evil spirit in his place, 1 Sam. xvi. 14.

4. Believers should not conclude that God has cast them off, because he is a stranger to them for a time; for this hath been the lot of the dearest of God's children, yea, even of his own beloved Son himself, when in this world.

Use II. Of Reproof. 1. To those who are so great strangers to religion, and the state of their own souls, that they know not what God's presence or absence is; and so indifferent are many about this matter, they never inquired to this day, whether God be a stranger or a friend to their souls.

2. To those believers, towards whom God may be behaving as a stranger, and yet they are insensible of it. They are become so unwatchful, and so much charmed with the delights of sense, and their spiritual senses so dull, that they are fallen into Samson's condition, Judg. xvi. 20, "He wist not that the Lord had departed from him."

3. To those who, though they be sensible of the Lord's withdrawals, yet are not duly affected therewith. It is not matter of serious soul-exercise to them, as it was to Jeremiah in the text, and to Job, Job xxiii. 3—9, and to the Israelites, 1 Sam. vii. 2, "Who lamented after the Lord."

4. To those who are so far from being suitably exercised and affected with the Lord's withdraw-ings from them, that they are still sinning him farther away; by their formality in duty, untenderness of walk, slighting of the Spirit's motions, and venturing on sins against light. O believer! "is this thy kindness to thy friend? Dost thou thus requite the Lord?" We do not marvel to see persecutors, and haters of God, driving him away, or to see Christ receiving wounds from his enemies: but O! it is sad, that precious Christ should get such wounds in the house of his friends.

Use III. Of exhortation, to two sorts of persons. 1. To those who are strangers to God, and know nothing of his presence. 2. To those who have known it, but he is become a stranger to them.

As to the first sort, I exhort you, in the name of the Lord, to bethink yourselves, and consider your misery in this state; for "lo, they that are far from God shall perish." It is the character of those who are in a lost state, to be "without God in the world." Now, your misery, while such, is inexpressible.—You are utterly unfit to come to the Lord's table; for "what communion can there be between light and darkness!" Or, between those that have hitherto been strangers and enemies to one another. Remember, it is only a feast for friends: strangers to God are debarred.—Your state is most uncomfortable; the sun hath never risen upon you; God's face hath never shined upon you; it is still dark night with you, and you sit "in the region and shadow of death."—You are under the dominion of Satan, the prince and ruler of darkness.—You are under the heavy clouds of God's wrath and indignation.—You sit constantly on the very borders of hell.—O sinner! consider what a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness, a dying hour will prove to thee. When thy soul is stepping forth into another world, how ready will it be to shrink back, and say, How shall I appear before that God, who has always been a stranger to me, and with whom I never had the least acquaintance! Can I look for any thing but a frowning Judge, and a fearful sentence? O strangers, come and "acquaint yourselves with God now," accept of his offers of mercy, and "be at peace" with him through Christ; and "thereby shall good come unto you."

As to the second sort, viz. those who have had acquaintance with God, but he is become a stranger to them. O poor soul, be suitably affected with this dispensation; let it be matter of exercise to thee on a fast-day before the communion: it will be a heartless and fruitless communion if God continue as a stranger to thee; therefore be not easy under his withdrawals.

Consideration 1. Your soul's grievances can never be removed while God keeps at a distance from you; but they will still be growing greater; as for instance, while he is a stranger, you cannot have light for your darkness, but darkness will be increasing; you cannot have life for your deadness, but you will still be growing deader in spiritual things; you cannot have appetite for your food, but you will always be turning the more indifferent about it; you cannot have protection from your enemies, but you will still be brought the more under their power. Things will still be growing worse, the longer God is a stranger to thy soul.

2. Ordinances can neither be pleasant nor profitable to thee, while God is a stranger to thy soul; you cannot see any beauty in them, while God is absent; for without the Lord's presence, ordinances are dead, and a dead thing can have no beauty. It is his presence that puts a lustre on ordinances, and makes them shine, so as to confirm the friends of the gospel, and make enemies ashamed of their opposition. It is his presence that puts life in communions, and life in communicants, and causes them to prefer a day in "God's courts to a thousand elsewhere." It is his presence that makes ordinance fruitful, and his people's souls to thrive under them. O! why have you such lean souls and barren hearts under ordinances? It is because the Lord is a stranger to them. Would you have your food blest, gospel-seasons fruitful, and your souls under the influence thereof, like watered gardens? Then seek the Lord's presence, 1 Cor. iii. 7, "It is not he that planteth, nor he that watereth, but God that gives the increase."

QUEST. Seeing God is setting a solemn appointment to meet with us at this occasion, and it highly concerneth us to make ready to meet with him: How shall we be exercised on this fast-day, so as to get distance removed, and breaches made up, that God may not be a stranger to us on the fast-day?

Ans. I shall give you some advices, and draw to a close.

1. Make no harsh construction of God's dealings with your souls, whatever they be, but justify him; leave your complaints upon yourselves, and blame your sins, that separate betwixt you and your God, Isa. lix. 2. We have a challenge from God that may soon silence all our murmuring, Jer. ii. 17, "Hast thou not procured this to thyself, in that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God?"

2. Be still restless, dissatisfied, and uneasy in your minds, till the distance and estrangement be removed: and be expressing your uneasiness by frequent sighs, complaints, and lamentations after God; sit as a widow in his absence, and let none have your love but him alone; refuse all other comforters, till he himself return; imitate the church's practice, Lam. i. 16, "For these things I weep, mine eye, mine eye runneth down with water, because the comforter that should relieve my soul, is far from me."

3. Search diligently for the cause of the Lord's estrangement from you, as the psalmist did, Psal. lxxvii. 6, "I communed with mine own heart, my spirit made diligent search." Oh! where is the idol? What is the sin that hath been the Achan in the camp, and provoked God to turn his back? And as soon as you find it out, see that you cast out the accursed thing. Let not thine eye pity, neither do thou spare it; for it has taken thy Lord away from thee. If thou canst not find it, then go humbly to God, and cry with Job, "Show me wherefore thou contendedst with me," Job x. 2. Lord, what is the evil, the sin, or lust which thou rebukest, and for which thou pleadest the controversy? Have I quenched thy Spirit? Have I neglected duty? Was I formal in communicating, or unthankful for former intimations of thy love? "Lord, what I see not, teach thou me; make me to know my transgressions, and my sin."

4. Seek to be deeply humbled for every evil and sin that you are convinced of; and particularly, for the heinous aggravations of them; say, O Lord! I am guilty in thy sight; I have sinned against more light, more mercies, more vows, and more proofs of thy loving-kindness, than others: I have gratified Satan, hardened the wicked, reproached religion, and dishonoured God more by my sins, than others do; so that thou mayest justly frown on me, and make the solemn day, which will be a day of feasting, rejoicing, and gladness to thy children, a day of darkness, gloominess, and distress to me.

5. Plead by faith the Redeemer's blood, for removing the estrangement, and bringing thy soul nigh to God; for nothing else can do it, according to Eph. ii. 13. Say, Lord, though I deserve not to taste of thy supper, but to meet with a frown instead of a smile, a breach instead of a blessing, a cup of wrath instead of the cup of the New Testament; yet behold the blood of my Surety, and be merciful to me. Lord! I have broken all thy commands; but has not my Surety fulfilled them all? I have indeed affronted thy justice; but has not my Surety satisfied it? I have deserved thy wrath; but he has endured it. Remember not what I have done against thee, but what he hath done and suffered for me; and let me be accepted in him who is thy beloved Son.

6. While God carries as a stranger to thee, be not thou a stranger to the throne of grace, but continue instant in prayer for the return of his gracious presence; plead the great need you have of it, and the helpless case you are in without it. Beg, however he deal with you now, that he may not be a stranger to you on the feast-day. Say, "Lord, if thy presence go not with me, carry me not hence." What will a communion feast avail me without communion with thyself in it? I go not there for bread and wine, but I go to see Jesus: and what wilt thou give me, if I go from thy table Christless? O let Christ appear and be made known to me in the breaking of bread. Let me enjoy thy lightsome and reviving company in this state of pilgrimage and trouble. Descend into my heart by the influences of thy grace, and quickenings of thy Spirit, and let me ascend unto thee, by the breathings of faith, love, and desire. Lord, grant the request of an importunate petitioner, and come over the mountains of my guilt. Lord, stand not at a distance behind the wall, but show thyself through the lattice of thy ordinance, and let me see the goings of my God and my King in the sanctuary. Oh! let me not go away empty from an inexhaustible treasure, cold from the sun, dry from the fountain, hungry, sad, and comfortless from a feast of love. But Oh! let me meet with my Saviour there, see his face, and hear his voice; and let me come from his table with my pardon sealed, my corruptions subdued, my graces quickened, my heart enlarged, and my soul refreshed and encouraged to run in the ways of thy commandments, and so inseparably united to thee, that no temptation may be ever able to dissolve the union."

OBJECT. Oh! saith some poor soul, I fear all my endeavours will be in vain; for I have communicated unworthily before; I have shed the blood of Christ, and sinned against light; so that I doubt and fear that my day of grace is past, and I am cast out of God's sight.

ANS. However dark your case be, yet surely it is no darker than Jonah's was in the whale's belly; who, though he never read or heard of any in such distress: yet when he is concluding, I am cast out of God's sight, he aims at a believing look to God in Christ, "Yet will I look again toward the holy temple," Jonah ii. 4. Mind also Abraham's case, though he was an hundred years old, and his body as good as dead, yet he believed in God that raised the dead; yea, he believed and hoped against hope. Lord, help us to imitate him. Amen.

SERMON II.—A PREPARATION-SERMON BEFORE THE LORD'S SUPPER.—THE HAPPINESS OF BEING IN COVENANT WITH GOD.

Happy is that people whose God is the Lord.

Psal. cxliv. 15.

There is nothing in the world that is so much talked of, and less understood, than the business of a happy life. All the world is in quest of happiness, some expecting to find it in this, and some in the other thing. The worldling looks for it in riches, the philosopher in knowledge, the ambitious man in honours, and the voluptuous man in pleasures. But how miserably are they mistaken! they seek happiness from the wrong source; from things that can never suit the wants, nor satisfy the vast desires of the immortal soul. True Christians are the only wise men in the world, for they seek happiness where indeed it is to be found, viz. in the enjoyment of God, who is the centre of bliss. And they who attain to this, must surely be the happy men, for the Spirit of God declares them so in my text: "Happy is that people whose God is the Lord."

In this psalm, the royal psalmist doth bless and magnify the Lord for the signal favours and mercies he had received from him; and from his former gracious experiences, he is encouraged to address God for future mercies, both to himself and his kingdom: particularly, he prays for deliverance from public enemies, and the manifold calamities of war; for the establishing of peace and tranquillity, and for the prosperity of the nation; for the flourishing of their families and children, and for the increase of their flocks and cattle; and, in a word, that his people might abound in peace and plenty. Then he pauses, and makes a reflection upon the nation's prosperous circumstances, which he had prayed for: "Happy is the people that is in such a case;" happy they, who have such temporal prosperity and abundance, who have no want in their families, nor complaining in their streets. This is the judgment of the flesh, and the opinion of most men. But the psalmist presently corrects himself, and retracts his former judgment, and prefers the judgment of faith to that of sense: yea, rather, "Happy is that people whose God is the Lord." As if he said, "The former estate is indeed very desirable for a nation or people; but Israel or the people of God, their true happiness doth not consist in these things that are common to others with them; but only in this peculiar privilege, that the great Jehovah, who is the Lord of heaven and earth, is their God by covenant and special relation. That this God is their God, and they have a special interest in his love and favour, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace. Whatever portion such have in the world's good things, surely they are happy; and let others have what they will if they want this covenant-relation, they are certainly unhappy and miserable; which they can never be that have it, want what they will; seeing they have an interest in God as theirs, makes up the want of all other things; for the blessedness and happiness is included here. "Blessed and happy is that people whose God is the Lord."

Doctrine. That it is the greatest happiness we can possibly attain unto, to be in covenant with God, and to have God for our God.

David was still of this opinion through the whole course of his life, Psal. xvi. 5, 6; xxiii. 1, 2. And he sees no cause to alter it at his death; for, among his last words, he declares that this sweet covenant-religion was "all his salvation, and all his desire," 2 Sam. xxiii. 5.

The method I purpose for handling this subject, shall be,

I. To inquire when it may be said that a person or people are in covenant with God, and have a special interest in him as theirs.

II. What is imported in this great privilege, to have God for our God.

III. How this privilege appears to be the top of our happiness.

IV. Make improvement of the whole.

I begin with the first, When it may be said that a person or people are in covenant with God, &c.

And for clearing this point the more, I shall, first, consider it negatively, and show what it is not; and, secondly, positively, wherein it really consists.

1. Negatively, To stand in a covenant-relation to God is not to be understood here,

(1.) Of our being under the bond and engagement of the covenant of works. Though it is most certain that all Adam's posterity, by virtue hereof, are engaged to God, to perform perfect obedience, and fulfil the whole law; yea, and by breaking it, are obliged to pay the penalty thereof, bear God's curse, undergo death, and satisfy God's infinite justice; and so all of us are naturally in covenant with God in this respect. But O! we have no happiness, no comfort, by being so; seeing we have broken the covenant of works, and incurred the penalty thereof; for though we still stand under engagements to God by it, yet he is loosed from all obligations to us, to make us happy: yea, by our breaking it, he is under engagement to destroy us. O! we cannot, by this covenant, plead any interest in God as our God, or Father: no, we can only look on him as our Lawgiver, our Judge, our Punisher, and Enemy. That is all the relation that God stands in now to us, by virtue of the covenant of works.

(2.) There is more requisite to make up this covenant-relation to God, than that blessed covenant of redemption, which God entered into from eternity with his Son, Jesus Christ, as our head and representative, for saving the elect. That glorious transaction is indeed the foundation and rise of our covenant-relation to God; but doth not formally constitute and make it up. For an elect person cannot be said to be in covenant with God from eternity, unless by God's appointment and designation: he is never formally in it till he believe, and thereby ratify and approve what Christ did from eternity engage for him, and personally consent to take God for his God, in and through Jesus Christ the Mediator. So that you see the covenant of redemption will not save you, nor instate you in covenant with God, if ye can say no more; there must be something done in and by you, to entitle you to that covenant of redemption, and to infest and possess you of the privileges and blessings therein promised to Christ our Head; and this is only done by the subsequent ratification of that covenant and treaty, made with the elect in time by the preaching of the gospel, which is called the covenant of grace.

(3.) There is more in this covenant-relation to God which makes us happy than our being visibly and externally in covenant with God by an outward profession of Christianity, and subjection to gospel-ordinances: for thus, every church that hath the word and sacraments is in covenant with God. Hence the Lord says to the church of the Jews, Ezek. xvi. 8. "I entered into covenant with thee, and thou becamest mine." They were visibly and externally in covenant with God by their subjection to his ordinances and institutions. They all partook of the seal of his covenant, viz. circumcision: and hence, when a visible church makes defection from God, he threatens to come and "avenge the quarrel of his covenant," Lev. xxvi. 15. All the members of a visible church are federally in covenant with God by their profession of Christ, and being baptized in his name; but such an external covenant-relation to God will not make us happy: therefore, let us beware of resting on it; and let us seek earnestly to be really and internally in covenant with God.

(4.) There is more in it than being nationally in covenant with God by virtue of a solemn transaction entered into, and subscribed by, the rulers, nobles, ministers, and representatives of a land; whereby they, with consent of the whole nation, bind and engage themselves and their posterity to the Lord. This did the nation of the Jews, and so they were God's covenanted people above all other nations of the world; but yet this national covenant did not entitle them to saving blessings, or give them an interest in God as their God in a saving way: for many were in that national covenant that never came to be in a gracious state, though yet they received many special favours and deliverances upon the account of it. Some in this land have the honour of being nationally in covenant with God, which indeed is our glory, and perhaps the ground of many national mercies and deliverances; though it is not the spring of saving mercies, nor that which entitles us to God as our God in a saving way. Many may profess to own this national covenant, that never took hold of the covenant of grace, and gave themselves to God according to the tenor thereof.

(5.) There is more in this than the drawing up the form of a personal covenant with God, professing to consent thereto, and subscribing it with the hand. For all this may be done in such a manner as will not entitle us to God as our God in a saving way. This work, though good in itself, and profitable to many; yet it may be performed by some in such an hypocritical, formal, or legal manner, as makes it an abomination to a holy God, that looks for truth in the inward parts.

But, 2. Positively, we come to be in covenant with God in a saving way, when we are taken within the bond of the covenant of grace, and consent sincerely to the gracious terms of it; for it is only by virtue of our coming into this covenant that we have ground to claim this happiness of having God for our God. Now for us to come into the bond of this covenant of grace, is by faith to "take hold of God's covenant," as it is called, Isa. lvi. 4. And this we do, when we are thoroughly convinced of our sin, misery, and undone state under a covenant of works, and hence betake ourselves to the new covenant, or gracious method of salvation proposed to us in the gospel, through Jesus Christ and his righteousness; and cordially acquiesce in, and approve of, this noble contrivance, and accept of Jesus Christ as our only Mediator, Surety, and Peace-maker with God: and in him sincerely make choice of God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, to be our God and portion; and also give ourselves, soul and body, to be the Lord's, engaging, in the strength of our great Surety, to abandon sin, live for God, and walk with him in newness of life, as becomes his covenanted people. Now when our souls are helped and determined by the Spirit of grace, to do all this heartily and sincerely, then we enter among that "happy people, whose God is the Lord."

II. The second thing in the method is to inquire into the import of this great privilege, to have God for our God. "I will be your God," is the greatest promise and substance of the covenant of grace, being the great thing stipulated on God's part therein, Jer. xxxi. 33, and indeed it is the sum and compend of all his other promises. And imports these things:

1. Reconciliation and friendship with God. "I will be your God," that is, I will be no longer an angry judge, but a gracious, reconciled God to you; my justice is appeased, wrath pacified, fury is not in me; I have found a ransom in Christ; he is the propitiation for your sins.

2. A near relation between God and you; yea, nearer than any relation among creatures. "I will be your God," implies, I will be to you instead of all relations.—I will be a Father in Christ to you, adopt you for my children, take you into my family, I will pity and provide for you, I will bequeath to you a rich inheritance, you are heirs of God, and co-heirs with my eternal Son.—I will be a Husband to you, "your Maker is your husband,"

Isa. liv. 5. I will marry you to myself, I will love you, clothe you, enrich you, and provide a noble dowry for you.—I will be your King. I will take you for my subjects, I will govern you, protect, and defend you from all your enemies. Yea, I will be your physician, your shepherd, your guide, and instead of all relations to you.

3. "I will be your God," imports a right and title to God, and all that is in him; intimate communion with him, and a communication of all good things from him. Nay, there is still more in this expression than can be unfolded by words; there is more in it than, I will be father, friend, husband, benefactor, &c. to you: more in it than I will give you heaven and everlasting life, or all the blessings of heaven and earth, time and eternity: no, I will give you more, I will give you myself, a Jehovah, a whole Deity, that is, all that is in me, all I am, all I have, all I can do, is thine. O the magnificent bounty of God! for when he had no greater, no better thing to bestow on his people, he bestows himself on them.

You may say, How can this be? An infinite God, so great, so glorious, we are not capable of receiving, comprehending, or enjoying him. Ans. So far as you are capable to receive and enjoy him, he is yours; all that is in him is given to you for your benefit.

1. All he is personally, that is, the three persons of the glorious Trinity are yours, God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.—God the Father is yours to love you, to elect you, and contrive redemption for you, John xvi. 27, "The Father himself loveth you."—God the Son is yours to be a ransom for you, to satisfy justice for you; yours to be born for you, to live, to die for you, to rise again for you, to ascend into heaven for you, to sit at God's right hand for you, &c. All this is plain from Isa. ix. 6, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given." And Cant. ii. 16, "My beloved is mine."—The Holy Ghost is yours, to apply this redemption to you, to change your hearts, to teach you, sanctify you, work in you, dwell in you, to conduct and guide you to glory, 1 Cor. iii. 16, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you." So you see, O believer, whatever God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost is, and can do for your salvation and happiness, they are yours, and made over to you in the covenant of grace.

2. All he is essentially, his infinite essence is yours, that is, all his glorious attributes and perfections.—My mercy is yours, O believer, to pardon your sins and deliver you from guilt, to sympathize with, and comfort you in all your trials and afflictions.—My wisdom is yours to provide for you, to counsel and direct you, and to turn all things about for your good.—My omnipotence is yours, to guard and protect you from all your enemies, to support and preserve you to salvation.—My goodness is yours, to enrich you, bestow grace and glory, and all good things on you.—My omniscience is your overseer, to watch over and warn you against approaching dangers.—My holiness is your fountain of grace, to sanctify and make you holy.—My omnipresence is your companion, to attend and solace you in all places and conditions.—My justice is your rewarder, to bestow heaven on you; and also your avenger to punish those that wrong you.—My all-sufficiency is your inheritance, for giving you complete and perfect happiness. My unchangeableness is the rock of your security. My faithfulness your pledge and surety for the accomplishment of all my promises to you: and my eternity is the date of your happiness. So that, O believer, you see all God's essential perfections are made over to thee in the covenant of grace, and therein thou hast an unsearchable treasure. In God's attributes there is a suitable remedy for all these maladies and miseries which sin has brought on you: his wisdom cures your ignorance, his grace your guilt, his power your weakness, his mercy your misery, his goodness your evil, his faithfulness your inconstancy, his holiness your impurity, his riches your poverty, and his fulness your wants.

Lastly, "I will be your God," imports that all that God hath shall be made over to you, 1 Cor. iii. 21, "All things are yours." All mine are thine. As for instance,

(1.) All my promises are yours; the promises both of this life, and that which is to come; my promises of pardon, my promises of healing, my promises of sanctification, my promises of quickening and strength, my promises of through-bearing and comfort in trouble, my promises of grace and glory; they are your inheritance.

(2.) My gifts and graces are yours, faith, love, hope, fear, humility, patience, and all the fulness that is in Christ is yours; all these graces are yours, as armour to defend you, jewels to enrich you, and cordials to refresh you while you sojourn in the wilderness.

(3.) My creatures are yours. My creatures on earth are yours, to serve and sustain you; my angels in heaven are yours, to guard and encamp about you. The earth is your walking and sojourning place, the heavens your country and inheritance. In a word, O believer! my ordinances and sacraments are yours, to strengthen and feed you; my providence is yours, to make all things work for your good; my rod is yours; my people is yours; my kingdom is yours; nay, my eternal Son, Christ, is yours; all he has done and suffered, even his whole purchase is yours: both things present and to come, life and death, this world and heaven, "all are yours," 1 Cor. iii. 22. Behold, when there was a covenant made between Jehoshaphat and the king of Israel, Jehoshaphat promised Ahab whatever he had or could do, 1 Kings xxii. 4, "I am," says he, "as thou art, my people as thy people, my horses as thy horses;" so in the covenant of grace, whatever God hath or can do, is made over to you. But what do I speak? For no created mind can conceive, nor the tongues of men and angels show forth the full import of this word, "I will be your God."

III. The third thing proposed was, to show how this privilege of having God for our God, in covenant, appears to be the top of our happiness. And this doth evidently appear from these things.

I. From the vastness of the portion, which believers have in a covenanted God as above described. There is more comprehended here "than eye hath seen, ear hath heard, or the heart of man can conceive." In this covenant of grace you have all that is good, all that is great, and all that can make you happy. You have covenant presence, covenant provision, covenant conduct, covenant protection, covenant support, and covenant strength for all duties, trials, and performances in this world. And you have eternal glory covenanted to you for the world to come. Now, can any thing be so satisfying to the renewed mind, as to review this vast portion? It is pleasant for a man to view his temporal interests, to walk about his buildings, plantings, gardens, flocks, fields, &c. But what are these to this portion of the believer? It was a ravishing prospect that Moses got of Canaan from mount Nebo. How pleasant was it to view the lovely hills, the fruitful valleys, the winding rivers, the beautiful gardens, and flourishing trees, in that incomparable land! But all that was nothing to the believer's covenanted inheritance. View the covenant, and see who can number the promises and blessings contained in it; time would fail to mention them: read the scriptures from the beginning to the end, and behold a dazzling and glorious sight! As the heavens are bespangled with stars in a winter night, so is God's word and covenant with shining promises. We may allude to that passage in God's covenanting with Abraham, Gen. xv. 5. God brought him forth abroad, and said, "Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: so shall thy seed be." Look, O believer, to the firmament of the covenant, and tell the stars of the promises, if thou be able to number or weigh them; so shall also the blessings and benefits be, which thou hast to inherit.

II. To be in covenant with God, must be the top of our happiness, if we consider the suitability of the promises, and blessings of his covenant to all our wants and exigencies. All that we stand in need of, and all we can desire, is fully provided for here. O believers, what want ye?

What fear ye? What are ye troubled with? Here it may be suitably answered and remedied. Is sin and guilt your trouble? In this covenant there is pardon and redemption. Are your sins great? Here is the Redeemer's "blood that cleanseth from all sin." Are ye condemned by the law's sentence? Here is a sufficient righteousness for your justification and acquittance. Are you poor? Here is fine gold. Are you blind? Here is eye salve. Are you naked? Here is white raiment. Are you starving? Here is the manna and the fatted calf. Are you diseased? Here is the balm of Gilead. Are you chained prisoners? Here is deliverance for the captives. Are you drowned in debt? Here is an all-sufficient surety. Are you dead? Here is the resurrection and the life. Is pollution and filthiness your trouble? Here is a deep and open fountain that runs continually. Art thou weak and unable for duty? Here is covenanted grace and strength, which shall be sufficient for thee. This covenant contains all necessary and suitable supplies for thy wants; so that if God be your God, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace, your needs shall be richly supplied, according to that promise, Phil. iv. 19, "My God shall supply all your needs, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus."

III. This covenant-relation to God is our greatest happiness, in regard it doth take the terror out of every thing that is terrible to the believer.

1. This covenant-relation removes all terror from our thoughts of God's holiness and justice. The wicked cannot think of a just and holy God without horror, and therefore, they banish the thoughts of God out of their minds; hence it is said, Psal. x. 4, "God is not in all their thoughts." For as many thoughts as are in their hearts, God is in none of them. But believers may have pleasant and delightful thoughts of God as their reconciled Father in Christ: his holiness is a fountain of grace to them, and his justice the security of their happiness. The covenant-relation takes all terror out of justice, though the most terrible attribute of God unto a sinner, and makes it, that before was an enemy, become a friend, and enter into a strict alliance with the believer. Before it stood as a flaming sword at the door of paradise to keep them out: but now it stands as an advocate pleading for their entrance, 1 John i. 9, "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." O believer, thy happiness is certain; for justice is come over to thy side, and pleads for thy pardon, because the debt is paid, and for the crown of glory, seeing the price is laid down.

2. This covenant-relation takes all terror out of afflictions; Why? It alters the very nature of them to believers, and makes them become good and medicinal to them, Psal. cxix. 71; Isa. xxvii.

9. Yea, they are changed into covenanted mercies, Psal. lxxxix. 32; cxix. 75. Christ hath shed his blood to purchase sanctified crosses to his people. So believers, whatever trials you meet with, though they be sharp and smarting, you may make such a reflection as this, the Lord sees I want this, otherwise I should not be exercised with it: my covenanted God knows that this, and no less than this, is needful for me.

3. It takes the terror out of the alarming judgments of God, that come on the wicked and ungodly. When God rises to take vengeance on his enemies, and punish sinful nations with his desolating plagues, you may say, These are the mighty acts of my God and King: these things display my Father's power and glory: but, in the midst of all, his children are safe.

4. It will take the terror out of death: for though death strip you of other comforts, it cannot dissolve your covenant-relation to God. You may sing that swan-song, Psal. xlviii. 14, "For this God is our God for ever and ever, and he will be our guide even unto death." It is this that gives a believer peace in his latter end: it made David to triumph in the view of approaching death, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5. Death must surely be the king of terrors to an unbeliever. Why? It is terrible to think, "I am going to appear before that God I do not know, I have no interest in, nor acquaintance with. How can I expect help from him now, whom I never loved, nor sought unto before?" But a covenanted soul may say, "I will not fear, for I know whither I am going, the place I know, and the way I know, and the God of that land I know. Why should I be unwilling to go to my covenanted God and friend, with whom I have had sweet converse, whose presence I have earnestly longed for? Is not death my Father's servant, sent to bring me home to my Father's house, where I will be put in full possession of all the blessings of the covenant? Surely then the day of my death will be better to me than the day of my birth."

5. This covenant-relation takes the terror out of the great judgment day. Why? O believer, it is the day of your covenanted Redeemer's coming to take you home to dwell eternally with him. Doth not a chaste wife long for the return of her husband? And will not a believing soul, betrothed to Christ, long for the glorious bridegroom's return to consummate the happy marriage? Let others tremble at his coming, and cry to the "rocks to hide them from the face of the Lamb;" but surely you have cause to "lift up your head with joy, for the day of your redemption draweth nigh."

IV. This covenant-relation to God is our greatest happiness: for it exceedingly sweetens every thing that is comfortable.

1. It sweetens the thoughts of Christ to a believer. When the word brings the news of his glory to your ears, or the sacrament sets him forth as crucified before your eyes, your hearts may presently warm to him, and cry, with Thomas, "My Lord and my God!" and with Paul, "It is the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me;" and with the spouse, "My beloved is mine, and I am his." All he did and suffered was for me; his bloody sweat, his painful wounds, his dying groans were for me. He thought on me when he was on the cross: my name is this day on his breast-plate: he still thinks on me, and pleads for me, as his covenanted spouse. "I know my Redeemer liveth; and because he lives, I shall live also." Good ground have ye to say with the psalmist, Psal. civ. 34, "My meditation of him shall be sweet; I will be glad in the Lord."

2. It will make gospel ordinances very sweet: As for instance, (1.) Prayer may be sweet to a covenanted soul. Is it not sweet to come into God's presence and call him our Father, and speak to him as such? "Father, grant me this, and the other good thing which I want." An uncovenanted soul comes before God as his judge: but O! it is comfortable to draw nigh to him as our reconciled God and Father in Christ, and with a holy confidence spread our wants before him. (2.) It will make the word sweet; a covenanted soul may read, and hear it as a love-letter come from his friend and husband, and may sweetly apply the promise of it to himself, and say, This is mine; this was God's gracious unchangeable purpose to me in Christ: and O, but that would make the word as a lovely song in our ears! (3.) It will make the Lord's supper sweet. O covenanted souls, you can come to this holy table as to a precious feast provided for you; you can come as God's friends and invited guests, and expect a kindly welcome from him: It is to you he saith, "Eat, O friends; drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved," Cant. v. 1. This is your Father's table covered for you; many presume thither who have no right; but you have no ground to question your right, nor doubt your welcome: a communion day may be a pleasant day to you, and you may rejoice at the intimation and approach of it, and look on it as a foretaste of heaven, and a pledge of your eternal communion with God.

3. This covenant-relation will sweeten your thoughts of God's works, both of creation and providence. When you walk through the fields, you may say, I walk on my Father's footstool, which he hath given me to sojourn upon while I am here below. When you view the structure of the heavens, you may say, Behold my Father's palace, where he dwells, and where I will dwell with him ere long. If the floor and pavement of it be so glorious, what must its roof, walls, gates, and furniture be? Yet it is my home and dwelling place, prepared by Christ my forerunner. When you consider the dispensations of providence, and God's various dealings towards you, you may say, how great pains is he at with me to promote my welfare, and prepare me for heaven? Though dispensations be sometimes mysterious now, yet how wise and beautiful will the whole scheme of providence concerning me appear in the issue?

4. It will sweeten all your outward mercies: why? you may receive them as love-tokens from heaven, and pledges of God's fatherly good will to you in Christ. Art thou raised from a sick bed, or delivered from any trouble? you may say of it as Hezekiah did, Isa. xxxviii. 17, "Thou hast, in love to my soul, delivered it from the pit of corruption." Again, every meal of meat, or morsel of bread thou eatest, may be doubly sweet to you; for it is the fruit of Christ's purchase; it is dipt in his blood, and comes through the covenant channel to thy hand: thou mayest spy covenant-love in every common mercy; thou enjoyest it not as a creature, but as an heir: thy Father sends it from his own table to thee, as an earnest of greater and better things laid up for thee hereafter. That word belongs to thee, which we have in Eccl. ix. 7, "Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works."

Lastly, This covenant-relation to God is our greatest happiness in regard of the sure and indissoluble nature of it, Isa. liv. 10. Mutable creatures alter their purposes, and break their leagues and covenants which they made; but God will never break his covenant of grace with his people. A covenant with a nation may be dissolved, as with the people of the Jews, because it is not built on the eternal purpose of God, to put his fear in their hearts; but it hath a respect to their obedience. But his covenant with the elect is indissoluble, seeing it depends on God's eternal purpose, to make them persevere in his ways. The covenant of grace doth not run thus, "I will be their God, if they will be my people;" but "I will be their God, and they shall be my people." He puts a condition indeed in his covenant of grace; but he has resolved and decreed from eternity, to work that condition in their hearts, Jer. xxxii. 40, "I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me." There we see that God is on both sides in this covenant; he engages not only for his own part, but for ours, that we shall fear him, and shall not depart from him. How happy then are believers who are in covenant with God! They are a happy people; and nothing can deprive them of their happiness. Adultery may dissolve the marriage-covenant among men, but not so here; for God saith to his covenanted people, "Thou hast played the harlot with many lovers, yet return again unto me: Turn, ye backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you," Jer. iii. 1, 14. Again, death cannot dissolve this covenant-relation, as it doth among men; but brings us the nearer to our covenanted God; so that a covenanted soul, when he finds death begin to assault his clay-tabernacle, he may even rejoice and sing with the Psalmist, Psal. lxxiii. 26, "My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever." What though my eye and heart-strings be ready to break, and the lamp of my life be like a candle burned to the socket, and near the going out; yet still God is my God, and portion for ever. Thus Olevian, a dying saint, comforted himself, "My hearing is gone, my smelling is gone, and my sight is going: my speech and feeling are almost gone; but the loving-kindness of God is still the same, and will never depart from me."

APPLICATION.

Use I. Of Information. We may hence see, 1. How far mistaken the world is about a believer's lot; they many times reckon them poor and despicable, and the off-scouring of all things; but certainly they are, of all persons in the world, the wisest; for they make the wisest choice, and the best bargain: nay, they are the richest too, for all things are theirs; though they oft seem to the world to have nothing, 2 Cor. vi. 10.

2. We may hence infer, that believers have no ground to envy the worldling of his portion, but rather to pity him; for he hath no more than what is seen by all, and that but for a short time, Psal. xvii. 14; Luke vi. 24. A carnal man may say, This house, this estate, this money is mine; but a Christian can say, This God is mine. And a covenanted God is more than ten thousand kingdoms.

Use II. Of Terror, to those that are out of the bond of this covenant; for if the people be so happy whose God is the Lord, how unhappy and miserable must they be, whose God is not the Lord: nay, your case is unspeakably sad and dismal; and O! that God would send a wakening word to all such, and sound an alarm in your ears this day.

1. You have neither art nor part in the God of Israel, Eph. ii. 12. He stands in no relation to you but that of Creator, and so stands he to the devils: but what comfort can they draw from that? for "he that made them, will not have mercy on them; and he that formed them, will show them no favour."

2. You are under a covenant of works, and under its fearful curse and sentence for the breach thereof. It is terrible to be under sentence of death by an earthly judge, and to be looking every hour to be taken forth to the scaffold; but your case is far worse; you are doomed to eternal death, and you may be looking every moment to be led forth to execution. When you awake in the morning, you may say, Shall this be the day of my execution? Shall I be taken to the scaffold of divine vengeance before night? Every headache or sick heart, every pain or stitch in back or breast, may put you to say, Is this the messenger that the Judge is to send to bring me forth? Sad is your case, O uncovenanted soul, you may sleep and wake in continual fear: for you are still tottering on the brink of hell and ridge of destruction. O! tremble then to lie down another night in this condition. In the name of God, I beseech you to awake from sleep, and find no rest for the sole of your foot, till, like Noah's dove, ye come into the ark of the covenant.

Use III. Of Examination. O communicants, try if ye be within this covenant; remember, if you be not, you have no right to the seals of it; no right to sit down at the Lord's table. "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat." And examine yourselves by these marks.

1. Know you any thing of a change of your state? Can you say, "Once I was a bond-slave to Satan, and an enemy to God; once I loved sin, and hated holiness; but now God hath opened my eyes, and humbled my heart for sin, and made me cast down the weapons of my rebellion at his feet: once I was at peace without Christ the Mediator; but now I see nothing but fire and wrath out of him: once I thought little of sin; but now I see it to be the most black and bloody thing in the world." Then this is a good sign.

2. If you be in covenant with God, you will certainly love God with your hearts, and love the Mediator, who brought you into the covenant. Can you say then with Peter, "Lord, thou that knowest all things, knowest that I love thee?" Lord, though I cannot hear, pray, praise, or communicate as I ought, yet thou knowest I love thee; yea, I love thee above all things. And though all the riches, honours, and pleasures of the world were in my offer or possession, and Christ would say, you must either part with these, or part with me; my heart would answer, Lord, abide thou with me, and let them all begone.

3. Those that are in covenant with God, have certainly made choice of God, as their God and portion. Can you say you have done this. O doubting communicant? Though you cannot say that God hath chosen you, yet doth your heart truly choose him? And are you resolved never to be satisfied without him? And whatever offers be made to you, yet you will be put off with nothing besides God. Then this may give you comfort.

4. Can you say you have made a resignation of yourselves, and of all you have to God, and you resolve to renew it again this night in secret, and to-morrow before men and angels? Then it is a token for good. It may be, doubting soul, thou art afraid to say, Lord, thou art my God; but canst thou venture to say, "Lord, I am thine, I resolve to be thine, and thine only; I will not be mine own, I will not be the devil's, I will not be the world's, I will not be my lust's; Lord, I am resolved to be no one's but thine." Well, let this comfort you when other marks cannot. For if once you come the length to say, "Lord, I am thine," you may say in the next place, "Lord, thou art mine;" for the relation is always reciprocal: and this is the reasoning of the spouse, Cant. vi. 3, "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine."

5. Are you mightily pleased with the contrivement and design of this covenant, which is to debase self, and exalt free grace? And would you desire heaven, though it were for no more than to stand eternal monuments of free grace, and join your note with the redeemed, eternally to cry, "Not unto us, not unto us, but to thee be the glory?"

And, Lastly, Are you inclined to perform covenanted-duties conscientiously, and that in a covenant-way, relying on covenant strength, and from a principle of love and gratitude to your covenanted God, and with an eye to glorify his name: then fear not to come forward to take the seal of the covenant, for you belong to it.

Use IV. Of Exhortation. And this I shall direct to all that hear the gospel, especially communicants. O come take hold of God's covenant, and enter yourselves within the bond of it; and then come and take God's seal to the bargain. I hero, in my great Lord and Master's name, make offer of God's covenant to all of you, be what you will, gospel-slighters, rebels against God, graceless and profane sinners, carnal and earthly-minded souls, hypocrites, formalists, backsliders, weary and heavy laden sinners, doubting and discouraged souls; I exhort and beseech you all to come and take hold of God's covenant, make choice of God for your God and portion, and Jesus Christ for your Mediator and Peace-maker with God, and resign yourselves freely to God in Christ. O sinners, the covenant is free, the call is pressing, the offer is great, the bargain excellent.

This is the most honourable and advantageous bargain that ever you made; the design of my whole sermon has been to recommend it, and persuade you to close with it: God knows how your hearts stand inclined. But I would have you all to remember, that our time is short, and the hour is coming, when we that are ministers must leave this work of beseeching, pressing, and arguing with you, and go to him that sent us, with a faithful account of the issue of our message. And O how sad and unpleasant will the account be that we must give of those of you whom we leave unpersuaded to take hold of God's covenant. It will be a melancholy thing, and matter of grief, to accuse any of you to the Father; but we must do it, if you will not prevent it by your hearkening and obeying. If you do it not in time, as God is in heaven you will eternally repent it: I do here warn you of your danger, and call heaven and earth to record against you that I am free of your blood. O young people! what say ye to it? Will ye take hold of the covenant? Your baptism will not profit you, unless now, when ye are of age, ye ratify your parents' deed, renew your baptismal engagements, and personally join yourselves unto the Lord in a perpetual covenant. If ye approach to the Lord's table without doing it, you will be unworthy communicants, you will be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, you will but mock God and deceive your own soul. I have not time to answer objections against covenanting with God; I shall only ask one question, and then conclude.

QUEST. But you may say, What would you have us doing, in order to our being brought into God's covenant? We would gladly be among the number of that happy people, whose God is the Lord, and who are in covenant with him; but we know not how to get into it.

ANS. Surely the soul is not wholly passive in this transaction, but must be active in it. Something is to be done on our part, when we enter into covenant with God; and therefore we are called to "join ourselves unto the Lord in a perpetual covenant," Jer. l. 5. I do not mean, that we can do any thing to enter ourselves into covenant with God in our own strength; no, it is God by his Spirit "that worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure." The duty is ours, but the work is the Spirit's. It is the Spirit that courts the heart, and prevails with the soul to give its consent to this blessed bargain. But, in the mean time, let us be aiming at our duty as we can, looking for the Spirit's concurrence. And there are four things to be done by us, in order to our being in covenant with God.—Renunciation. Acceptation.—Dedication.—Solemn engagement.

1. You must heartily renounce and break league with all the Lord's enemies and rivals, Hos. xiv. 8, and particularly renounce,—Satan's government; though formerly you was led captive by him at his will, yet now solemnly renounce all subjection to him, and hearken no more to his suggestions and temptations, let God alone have the throne.—Renounce the world, be no more a slave to it as you have been; set your heart no longer on its profits and pleasures, as your portion and inheritance; but make God your treasure.—Renounce the flesh; however its lusts have been beloved by you, let them reign no more in you; but condemn them to be crucified as the murderers of Christ.—Renounce your own righteousness in point of justification and acceptance with God, and solemnly disclaim all trust and confidence in your own duties and performances.

2. Acceptation. Heartily aim to make choice, and accept of God in Christ, as your soul's portion and inheritance, Psal. lxxiii. 25. But observe, how God is to be chosen, only in and through Christ the Mediator; for "out of Christ he is a consuming fire;" therefore accept of precious Christ as your guide and way to the Father, and of his satisfaction and merits, as the ransom for delivering you from wrath. Accept of the Holy Ghost as your sanctifier, quickener, and comforter; and heartily acquiesce in the covenant of grace, and gospel-method of salvation through Christ, as "well-ordered in all things."

3. Dedication. As God gives himself wholly to you, so do you dedicate and give up yourselves, and all that you have, wholly and unreservedly to God, 2 Chron. xxx. 8. Give up your souls, with all their powers and faculties; your bodies, with all their senses and members; and all your enjoyments, temporal and spiritual, to be employed for God and his honour, and to be entirely disposed of for his service and glory.

4. Solemn engagement. You must resolve and engage, in the "strength of Christ our Surety," to live wholly to your covenanted God, and walk with him in newness of life, perform every duty he commands, suffer patiently what he inflicts, watch against every sin he forbids, and manfully fight against his enemies. Thus be aiming at your duty, and lay yourselves in the Spirit's way, and who knows but God will pity and help you honestly to take hold of his covenant, and also himself say Amen to the bargain. The Lord bless his word. Amen.

SERMON III.—A PREPARATION SERMON BEFORE THE COMMUNION.—THE RIGHT IMPROVEMENT OF THE DAY OF GRACE.

Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts as in the provocation, &c.—Heb. iii. 7, 8.

In this chapter, the apostle displays something of the Mediator's glory and excellency; ho shows that he is far preferable to Moses, as much as the builder of the house is greater than the house; and that he alone is the eternal Son of God, the great prophet and teacher of his church. And having laid down several propositions to this purpose, he comes to draw an inference from them in the words of my text, Wherefore, &c. As if he had said, seeing Christ is the chief apostle and prophet of his church, a teacher sent from God to instruct the world; it is therefore our indispensable duty to hear his voice, comply with his counsels, and that without delay; and this exhortation the apostle strengthens with that of David, Psal. xc. 7.

In the words we have, 1. The illative particle, "Wherefore," which denotes the deduction of the ensuing exhortation from the preceding discourse. 2. We have the authority which the apostle cites for his exhortation, even that of the Holy Ghost, who of old spake by David, Psal. xc. and now speaketh by him in the text. 3. In the exhortation we have a duty required of us, viz. hearing of Christ's voice, "Hear his voice;" not the voice of a mere man, not the voice of an apostle or angel, but of the eternal Son of God, that glorious ambassador of heaven, who was sent to the world for advancing a treaty of peace; his voice we are to hear, his instructions and calls we are to comply with. 4. We have the circumstance of time, and special season when this duty is to be done, and that is presently, "to-day," or in this solemn day of grace. 5. We have in the following verse a cautionary direction to all that sit under the gospel, to beware of hardening their hearts, or stopping their ears against Christ's calls, as the obstinate and hard-hearted Jews did in the wilderness.

Doctr. I. "That the consideration of the authority of the Holy Ghost speaking in the scripture, should mightily enforce upon us the duties there exhorted." We should consider whose authority we despise, when we slight the offers, calls, and duties pressed in the gospel, even that of the Holy Ghost; and it is a fearful thing to sin against the Holy Ghost.

Doctr. II. "That the voice which we are called to hear in and by the gospel, is Christ's voice; it is not the voice of a man like ourselves, but the voice of the Son of God, and therefore should be awfully regarded." But the doctrine which I intend to handle at this time, shall be drawn chiefly from the season of pressing this duty.

Doctr. III. "That all who sit under the gospel, should be careful to improve the seasons of grace, and opportunities of hearing Christ's voice, which God allows them."

In handling this doctrine, I shall show,

I. What is implied in hearing of Christ's voice in the gospel.

II. That there are some special seasons for hearing of Christ's voice, and what these are.

III. How we ought to improve these seasons.

IV. Reasons why we should carefully improve them.

V. I shall apply the whole.

I. As to the first, What is imported in hearing of Christ's voice in the gospel. I shall not insist on what is presupposed in it, viz. That our ears are naturally stopped against Christ; and it is only a work of his power on the soul that can open them; but show what it directly implies.

1. This hearing imports our believing the word to be Christ's voice, and not the voice of man. As long as we regard what we hear, only as the voice of a minister, or man like ourselves, it will never humble us, nor prevail with our stubborn hearts; but when we begin to take it up as the voice of God, or Christ speaking to us from heaven, then the soul hearkens, considers, and obeys. Till Samuel knew that it was the Lord's voice speaking to him, 1 Sam. i., he still took the wrong course: he went to Eli when he should have hearkened to God.

2. A close and serious attention of the mind to what we hear. The soul that hears Christ's voice stops his career in pursuing sin and the world, which always makes a buzzing noise about his ears; and applies his ear to hear what Christ saith; turns attentive to, and serious about the things of eternity.

3. The application of what Christ saith unto us in particular: as if Christ spoke to us by name and surname, and said to us as Nathan did to David, "Thou art the man." We commonly neglect what Christ saith by his word, by putting it by ourselves to others; but we hear him aright when we bring what he saith close home to our own hearts and consciences, and say, "It is to me this word is directed; it is me that Christ intends, it is I that the law condemns, and that justice threatens. I am the guilty sinner that have shut out Christ, and preferred my lusts to him, and yet he now pities me, and calls me to open to him."

4. A thorough conviction of the necessity and advantage of yielding to Christ's calls; O, saith the soul, Long hath my Saviour knocked, saying, "Open to me, arise and come away," and yet I have sat still, and given him a deaf ear; and now I am lost, undone, and condemned in my present case; if death knock before I open to Christ, I can look for nothing but the bottomless pit to open and swallow me up for ever. But if I open to Christ, I am happy, and out of the reach of wrath for ever.

5. It imports the soul's cordial complying with Christ's calls, and consenting to receive and embrace him as he is offered in the gospel: that is to say, as a prophet to teach us, a priest to atone for us, and a king to rule us. The man that hears Christ's voice goes in heartily with the gospel method of salvation, acquiesces in that noble contrivance of grace, is well content to be justified by Christ's righteousness, to be taught at Christ's school, and governed by his laws.

II. The second thing to be discoursed is, That there are some special seasons for hearing Christ's voice that should be carefully improved; and what these are. There are some advantageous opportune seasons of grace wherein God is ready to receive and entertain us, which are called in scripture "an accepted time, and day of salvation," 2 Cor. vi. 2. "An accepted time," that is, a time well pleasing to God; "a day of salvation," that is, a day wherein the improvers of it may get salvation begun in pardoning and sanctifying grace; and eternal salvation completed in heaven made sure to them. Now such times and seasons should be carefully managed, that they be not lost, as, alas! they are too many. I shall mention some of these seasons.

1st. The present time, when you have the gospel-ordinances, and health and strength to attend them. That is a season carefully to be improved; and hence the Spirit of God saith so frequently, yea, no less than three times in this third chapter of the epistle to the Hebrews, To-day, to-day, to-day, God cries to you, "To-day hear my voice;" but Satan says to you, To-morrow is time enough. But surely God's season is the best. O sinner! to-day thou art in health, to-morrow thou mayest be in sickness: to-day thou art living, to-morrow thou mayest be dying: to-day thou art on earth, to-morrow thou mayest be in hell: to-day Christ is smiling and inviting you to come unto him: but to-morrow he may be frowning, and sentencing you to depart from him, never to return again. And should not the present time, then, when you enjoy ordinances, and health to attend them, be duly improved?

2d. The time of youth is a special season of grace, Eccl. xii. 1, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth." O young folk, this is an accepted time, and a day of salvation. It is a most advantageous opportunity for hearkening to Christ's voice; for, 1. Now the heart is more tender, and the will more pliable than afterwards. Now the heart is sooner affected and melted for sin than afterwards; for old age turns stiff and inflexible. The branches of a young tree will bow, and train up any way, but when old they will not bend. 2. Now you have not such sins to burden the conscience, harden the heart, and hinder you from coming to Christ, as you will have afterwards. 3. Now your minds and thoughts are more free of cares and anxieties about the world than they will be afterwards; and so more fit for closing and transacting with Christ in the gospel. 4. It is a season that God especially regards. Under the law, he required the first-fruits as his portion, and would have all the sacrifices that were offered to him to be young, and in their strength, Exod. xxiii. 19; Lev. ii. 14. And still he loves the season of youth, and remembers the kindness of youth long afterward, Eccl. xii. 1; Jer. ii. 2, 3. The mourning, praying, and praising of young folk is the most melodious music in God's ears: wherefore let the precious season of youth be diligently improved. Are there not some young communicants here? O! improve this day of salvation; a time of youth is the most usual season of conversion and acquaintance with Christ. If you look through the land among the people of God, you will perhaps find scarce one of a hundred but will date his conversion and first closing with Christ from the time of youth. If a tree do not bud or blossom when young, it is a sign that it is barren, and will not bear at all afterwards. O then! now in the days of youth lay a sure foundation-stone; take heed to your first communicating; strive for heart-sincerity in hearing Christ's voice, closing with the gospel-offer, and covenanting with God.

3d. A season when people enjoy plenty and purity of gospel-ordinances with peace and safety ought carefully to be improved. And now ye have such a season, you have plenty of ministers, plenty of sermons, sacraments, solemn calls, free offers, faithful warnings, earnest intreaties, and powerful persuasions, and none to make you afraid. It is prophesied of the gospel-times, Psal. lxxviii. 11, that "the Lord shall give the word, and great shall be the company of them that publish it." Now you have many faithful labourers; in every parish you have such as publish the word, and preach the glad tidings of reconciliation. Many a time have you Christ crucified set forth before your eyes in the Lord's supper; and again, the Lord is to give you in this place a new occasion for it. These are precious seasons, which our fathers sometimes would have prized at a high rate, when they were put to seek their spiritual bread with the peril of their lives, "because of the sword in the wilderness." The Lord hath made his arm bare in behalf of the gospel: he hath disabled its enemies, settled the ark in its place, and still continues plenty of pure ordinances, notwithstanding all the contrivances and attempts of enemies for their oppression. O! for hearts to value and improve such precious opportunities.

4th. A time when God gives a people providential warnings to awaken and excite them to attend his word and ordinances, is a season to be improved. God hath often threatened us with a bloody sword; and now he is threatening us with the approaching of the pestilence; that wasting stroke that lays heaps upon heaps, makes death to ride in triumph through the streets. Many warnings of approaching judgments have we formerly misimproved; and therefore God may come upon us unawares, and surprise us with his judgments without warning. Well, while God is taking pains on us, and giving us warning at a distance, let us improve the season by hearkening to Christ's voice in the gospel. "Let us be moved with fear," like Noah, "and provide an ark for the saving of our souls," before the flood of wrath approach. Nay, blessed be God, the ark is prepared to our hand, and there is a window opened in the side thereof for our entrance: let us take the wings of faith, and fly thither without delay.

5th. A time when the inward workings of the Spirit on the conscience, concur with the external dispensation of the word and sacraments, is a special season to be improved. It is then, that a great and effectual door is opened both to ministers and people. Paul had this door opened to him at Ephesus, amongst many adversaries, 1 Cor. xvi. 9. O if it were so with us, we needed not fear all that adversaries can do against the gospel. But we have it to regret, that though God hath outwardly restrained adversaries, yet "a great and effectual door" is not opened to us: still the door is strait both for ministers and people: God's Spirit is greatly restrained in our day. If it be asked, When is it that a wide or effectual door is opened? Ans. It is only when the Spirit of God is poured out in a plentiful way, both on ministers and people. When God's Spirit was thus poured out after Christ's ascension, then both the graces and gifts of the Spirit were communicated in a plentiful measure. Then ministers had great light of knowledge and understanding, as well as the heat of zeal and love. It was easy for them to study and preach; they had clear uptakings of the matters of God, and a great readiness and liberty of expression. Their hearts were enlarged, their minds enlightened, their memories were strengthened, and they had a door of utterance opened, i. e. a great facility in declaring of their minds; they were no way straitened for proper matter or fit words; their hearts indited goodly things, and their tongues were as the pen of a ready writer. Thus it is still, when the Spirit of God is remarkably poured out: then the preaching of the gospel is both pleasant and powerful; ministers' hearts are warmed, and people's hearts are melted; ministers' mouths are opened, and people's appetites enlarged. There is such a thing as the Spirit of God, his striving with the heart and consciences of hearers, in and by the word, Gen. vi. 3. And when he thus strives, it makes an effectual door, and a special season of salvation. When the Spirit moves the waters of the sanctuary, people should not neglect then to step in, and be healed. Take heed you do not slight the strivings of God's Spirit with you in any measure, lest you provoke God to pass such a dreadful sentence against you, as that, Gen. vi. 3, "My Spirit shall no longer strive with you." And if you lose the precious season of the Spirit's striving, you perhaps will never recover it again.

QUEST. When is it that the Spirit of God strives with sinners, in and by the gospel?

Ans. 1. When he opens his eyes, and gives the man a discovery of his sinful and miserable state by nature, and of the evil, heinousness, and danger of his sins; and so rivets and fastens conviction on the heart and conscience, that the arrows of the threatenings stick, and the man is brought to thoughtfulness and anxiety about his future state; and hence is made to cry, "What shall I do to be saved?" O! that is a season which ought to be carefully improved.

2. The Spirit strives by making a man wholly dissatisfied with his present state, and all his earthly enjoyments, as long as he is in the dark about his soul's salvation. Though he may be in outward prosperity, he says, "All these things avail me nothing," while I am ready to be swallowed up by the wrath of God for sin; surely there is no living, no abiding in this state I am in. I am shut up in the prison of unbelief, and the house is all on fire about my ears; I must break the prison, and make my escape, otherwise I am undone for ever.

3. By making the man despair of help and deliverance by any thing in himself. O, saith he, I am a poor, miserable, helpless creature! Neither my doing, nor suffering, can free me from wrath. I know no course, no contrivance of my own, that can relieve me. My relief must certainly come from another source; for I can never work it for myself.

4. By humbling the man to the dust for sin, particularly for misspending time, neglecting prayer, misimproving sermons, profaning sabbaths and sacraments, &c. O! says he, is there any creature more vile than I? Surely there is no toad more loathsome, no carrion more offensive, no mire more unclean, than my soul before God. Can ever the arms of mercy open to embrace such a monster of sin as I have been? This is a choice season, which should be well improved.

5. By giving some light into the understanding, concerning the remedy provided for lost sinners. The soul begins, by the word, to discover something of the fulness and ability of Christ, as a Saviour, so that it is made to think there is hope in Israel concerning this matter: My case, says the sinner, is not so bad as the devils, for whom no remedy was ever provided.

6. By working some purposes and inclinations in the will toward the offered remedy; so that the soul makes its aims at Christ: yea, is content to take any course for an interest in him. And therefore says often with Paul, Acts ix. 6, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" What method shall I take to "be found in Christ, not having my own righteousness?"

7. By determining the soul to a conscientious and diligent use of the means for getting Christ, and salvation through him.

8. By making a stir and commotion among the affections, and exciting earnest and passionate desires after Christ and salvation through him. So that the soul is made to say, "O that I knew where I might find him! O! when wilt thou come unto me! I will spare no pains to get a meeting with him, I will seek him through the streets and broad ways, and all the lanes of the city, crying, "Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?"

Now, when the Spirit strives with any of you, in any measure, it is a precious season of grace, that should be carefully observed and improved.

III. The third thing in my general method is, to show how these seasons of grace ought to be improved by us.

1. By highly valuing and admiring the distinguishing goodness of God in affording us such days of grace and salvation. He deals not so with other nations: Jews, Pagans, Mahometans, and Papists, have not the gospel-light and offers of grace which you have. Be thankful to God, especially you that have more special and remarkable seasons beyond others: you that have health, and strength, and youth on your side; you that have the Spirit of God striving with you in the ordinances, your eyes opened, hearts melted, consciences awakened, affections moved; O bless God for his distinguishing mercies.

2. By believing firmly what Christ saith to you by the word, and attending carefully to it. Why? It is the word of the living God, more true, certain, and immovable, than the foundations of the earth. Nay, heaven and earth will sooner pass away, than one jot or one tittle of his word fall to the ground. Let your ears then be stopped against all the calls and solicitations of sin, Satan, and the world; and open only to precious Christ, saying with the psalmist, "I will hear what God the Lord will speak."

3. By applying closely to yourselves what Christ saith, and meditating on it afterwards. When you hear any sin threatened you are guilty of, or any duty pressed that you neglect; bring that word close home to your hearts, and say, This word is to me, let me not forget it. O let it abide with me when I go home, when I eat and drink, when I lie down and rise up, when I go out and come in. Still think you hear Christ's word sounding in your ears, and that you hear him crying, "Awake thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." Open the door of thy heart, and let me in. "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away." Why do you weary my patience, and let me stand so long neglected, "till my head is wet with the dew, and my locks with the drops of the night?"

4. By labouring to give kindly entertainment to the word, and the motions of Christ's Spirit on thy soul, presently striking in with conviction, submitting to reproofs, and hearkening to his counsels, saying with Samuel, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." Say not to the Spirit's motions and strivings with thee, as Felix did to Paul, "Go thy way for this time, and when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee." No, no, but forthwith give ear, yield and comply with the Spirit's strivings, and Christ's voice; be content immediately to have thy sores lanced, and thy wounds searched to the bottom; and when conviction and soul-trouble for sin is begun, go not to stifle or quench it, or seek hastily to pluck God's arrows out of thy conscience; but cherish and entertain the work of God's Spirit, by meditating on thy sin, considering thy lost estate by nature, thy insufficiency to help thyself, together with the excellency and suitableness of the remedy which God has provided.

5. By frequent and fervent application to the throne of grace, begging, for Christ's sake, that God may both begin and finish his work in the soul. Acknowledge that you are able of yourselves to do nothing, and that it is by his grace only that you can be saved; and when he begins by conviction, be thankful to him, and entreat that these sparks, kindled by the breath of God, may not be smothered, but blown up into a flame: and still remember that the work is God's, though it be your duty to be casting out fuel by prayer and meditation; yet the sparks that kindle the fire may come from God's altar, the breath that blows it comes from heaven. Pray therefore, that the fire may come down, even a live coal from the altar, and that heaven's wind may blow on thy soul. Cry with the spouse, "Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out." Let the north winds of the law come, and convince, and awaken; and the south winds of the gospel come, and refresh and comfort. Be earnest, O convinced sinner, in deprecating God's taking away his Spirit from you; make it a part of your daily prayer to cry with the psalmist, Psal. li. 11, "Lord, take not thy Holy Spirit from me." Lord, forbid the new creature be stifled in the womb. O do thou quicken and preserve it. Let these convictions terminate in my conversion here, and salvation hereafter. Lord, thou art a rock, thy work is perfect: hast thou begun, and wilt thou not also make an end? O! suffer no these tender fruits to be nipped in the bud, or blasted in the blossom, either by Satan's frost-winds, or the world's chilling blasts: but, O! preserve them to maturity, to the praise and glory of thy grace.

IV. The next thing is, the reasons of the doctrine; why we should so carefully improve our seasons of grace.

1. Because God looks for it, and expects it at our hand. When God plants trees in his vineyard, waters and takes pains on them, he looks for fruit from them, Luke xiii. We see what the Lord says of Judah, Isa. v. 1, 2, "My well-beloved," i. e. Christ, "hath a vineyard," i. e. the church of the Jews, "in a very fruitful hill;" i. e. a good soil, furnished with all possible means to make it fruitful. "And he fenced it," i. e. protected it by his providence, from the incursion of enemies; "he gathered out the stones thereof," i. e. removed out of it whatever was noxious or hurtful, perhaps the idol-gods, put these out of the land; "he planted it with the choicest vines," i. e. with pure ordinances, and institutions of worship, good government, and discipline. "He built a tower in the midst of it," i. e. for its defence, viz. the strong city of Jerusalem in midst of the land, which was built as a city compact together, whither the tribes went up for worship. "Also he made a wine-press therein;" i. e. the temple and altar continually running with the blood of the sacrifices." Now, after all, it is said, "He looked that it should bring forth grapes," which doth not import that God was uncertain of the event; but denotes what is just and equal, and what in such cases ought to be. Surely a vineyard so attended and furnished, ought to bring forth fruit, answerable to all the acts of God's care and grace towards it.

And to bring the matter home to our case, God hath been at special care to plant a vineyard in this land: we have a good soil, well fenced, the stones gathered out, idolatry and superstition removed, a choice vine planted, pure ordinances set up, enemies disabled that laid it waste. God has built towers, and made wine-presses to us, viz. the sacraments, and especially the Lord's supper, where the blood of Christ, our great sacrifice, runs plentifully to us, for pardon, healing, and washing. Now, doth not God look for grapes? Is it not just that we should bring forth fruit, answerable to all these privileges? Alas! for the most part, there is nothing but wild grapes with us; little suitable fruit of our solemn communion-days. You may see what is the result of frustrating the divine expectations, Isa. v. 6. Nothing but blasting, withering, ruin, and desolation.

2. Because of the shortness and uncertainty of the season of grace: none can tell how long it will last. You cannot promise it will continue as long as your lives, though even these be most uncertain. No; your special season and day of grace may end this very day, or at this communion-occasion, though you should happen to live many years after this. It is likely, God is saying to some hearing me, "To-day hearken to my voice, repent, and close with Christ my Son, or be henceforth hardened and undone for ever." O sinner, this night thy day of grace may cease; God may this day cause some of your hearts to warm by the word, others to tremble, others to mourn, others to purpose and resolve. Well, if you do not lay hold on, and improve this season, and hearken to Christ's voice, you may never get the like occasion again; nay, even though you should wish for it. Christ saith, Luke xvii. 22, "The time shall come, when you shall desire to see one of the days of the Son of man, and shall not see it." This may be one of the days of the Son of man to you; for now Christ is offering himself, and pressing salvation on you, and striving by his Spirit, I hope, with some of you. Well, if you neglect to open your hearts to Christ this day, God may set a seal on them to-morrow, that they shall never be opened. You may afterwards desire another of such days as this; you may wish for one of the offers of that Saviour, for one drop of that blood you slighted, for one knock of his Spirit at the door of your heart, which formerly you neglected; for one of his motions or strivings with you; and yet it may never be granted. With some the day of grace is longer, with others shorter; with some it ends in childhood, with others it ends in youth; and with some few it lasts to old age; but, O sinner! thou hast no reason to expect the continuance of it a moment after this day.

3. Because if you do not improve your day of grace, you lose your souls. You may compare the text with verse 11th of the chapter; "because they hardened their hearts, and would not hear his voice," in their day of grace, it is subjoined, "I swear in my wrath, they shall not enter into my rest." We see the sad case Jerusalem was in when they lost their day of grace, Luke xix. 41, 42, "When he was near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace; but now they are hid from thine eyes." Here it is said, "Christ wept," (orig. Eclause) which denotes a weeping with lamentation. "He wept bitterly," to let you all know what a sad and deplorable thing it is, for a people, city, or person, to lose their day of grace. The words he speaks are uttered in a weeping strain. Abrupt expressions come now and then from his mouth; he drops now a word, and then a tear; he would speak, but his weeping stops his voice, "If thou hadst known, even thou." Thou is reduplicate, or twice expressed, "Thou even thou." As if he had said, Thou ancient city, the city of David, thou seat of the temple, and of the sacrifices: "O if thou hadst known." Then he adds, "at least in this thy day." They had enjoyed many lesser days of grace, when they had faithful prophets dealing with them; these they persecuted and despised, and so lost these days: but these were but lesser days, which did not finally determine the state of that city; for they were to have another day, which is here called, "this their day," i. e. the day wherein the Son of God was to come among them, and preach the gospel to them, "three years and a half." That was a special day of grace, and the day that determined their state; for since they did not improve it, "the things of their peace were hid from their eyes." God would deal no more with them, but left them to destruction. O sinner! O communicants! so will it fare with you, if you let your day of grace go over. Night will come on, wherein none can work, you will stumble in the dark, and fall headlong into the pit for ever.

4. Because God keeps a strict account of every hour and minute of your day of grace, that you trifle away; for he reckons it very precious, whatever you think of it. When God lights the candle of the gospel, he expects you should work by it; and he will not suffer this precious candle to burn without observation; nay, he counts every hour and minute it burns, and every hour and minute his Spirit strives, and will make you reckon for them at last. God takes not such strict notice of times of darkness and ignorance; for it is said, he winks at sinners living under them, Acts xvii. 30. i. e. He doth not so narrowly mark their diligence; but when he sends times of light, and of his Spirit's striving with sinners, he will not wink at one hour or minute, but exactly set down every sermon you hear, every communion you see, every call, every entreaty, every threatening, every reproof, every conviction and warning you get, whether by ordinances or providences, whether by conscience or by his Spirit. And, O! what a dreadful libel will these make up against you at the great day, if you neglect your day of grace.

V. APPLICATION.

Use I. For information. We may hence see, that it is not the bare enjoyment of the gospel, and communion-seasons that will make us happy, but the right improvement of the day of grace, which we enjoy therein.

Use II. For lamentation. We may hence take occasion to bewail the sad case of many that neglect and lose the day of their merciful visitation. It is said, Jer. viii. 7, "The stork knoweth her appointed times, the turtle, the crane, and the swallow, observe the time of their coming," &c. And we are bid go learn of the ant, Prov. vi. 6, "that provides her meat in summer, and gathers her food in harvest," while the weather is good and dry, and food may be had. So that we see the brutes and silly insects observe their seasons. But, alas! many men neglect and forget theirs; they let their summer and harvest-days pass, without making any provision for eternity. O! how many among us may take up that sad lamentation, Jer. viii. 20, "Our harvest is past, our summer is ended, and we are not saved!" O that we could weep over many, as Christ did over Jerusalem, for losing their day of grace.

QUEST. Who are these that thus lose their day of grace?

ANS. It is hard to be very particular on this head; I shall only give some general characters of such persons.

1. Those who have sat many years under pure and powerful ordinances, and were never affected thereby; but still remain dead and hardened under the most awakening calls and plainest reproofs. These seem to be given over to ruin, Prov. xxix. 1, "He that being often reprov'd, hardeneth his neck, shall be suddenly destroyed, and that without remedy."

2. Those who have had many secret motions and operations of the Spirit on their souls, to no effect; many purposes and resolutions to good, and all vanished; many of the Spirit's strivings, and all resisted: these are likely to be given over, Ezek. xxiv. 13, "Because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged, thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more, till I have caused my fury to rest upon thee." When God's Spirit offered to cleanse that people from their sin, they, like Lot's wife, still hankered after it, and would not part therewith.

3. Those who have greatly grieved the Spirit of God, by venturing on sin against the light of their consciences, and the Spirit's motions, and so are turned wilful and resolute in sinning; such have the symptoms of rejection, Hos. iv. 17, "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone."

4. Those who are so forward and bent upon a sinful course, that they can endure no reproof or control therein, but hate them in their hearts, who seek to reclaim them: those have the symptoms of ruin upon them, Prov. xv. 10; Amos v. 10.

5. When persons are so far hardened in sin, that God ceaseth to be a reprover to them, and strikes their consciences so dumb and senseless, that they do not accuse nor challenge them: it is a sad sign of up-giving, Ezek. iii. 26; Hos. iv. 17.

6. When repentance is hid from people's eyes, so that they are not affected with the view of their sins when they are laid before them; no dispensation of providence, no token of God's anger, neither judgments nor mercies, rods nor threatenings; nay, the flames of hell flashed in the sinner's face do not breed any remorse in their consciences, nor relenting in their hearts for sin. When people arrive at this height, it is a sad sign that they are given up to wrath, Isa. xlii. 25.

III. Next use shall be of examination. O try if ye have improved your day of grace, so as to hearken to Christ's voice, and comply with his gracious offers. O communicants, it is highly your interest to know this that you may come with cheerfulness, and feast with your Redeemer at his table. Now try it by these marks,

1. Had you never the experience of Christ's Spirit's work in opening your ear, and inclining your heart to close with his offers in the gospel? Do you experimentally know the heinousness and multitude of your sins? Do you know something of the terribleness of God's wrath due to you for these sins? Have you seen your soul's need of Christ, as a man pursued for his life seeth his need of a city of refuge? Have you seen yourselves lost and dead men, if you get not into Christ? Have you felt ardent desires after Christ, and been made to say, "Give us Christ, or else we die?" Have you been content to take this lovely Saviour on any terms, to part with all for this "pearl of price," and to count all but "loss and dung" to be found in him.

2. Can you say that Christ's word and ordinances where you first heard his voice speaking to you, are still precious and lovely to you for his sake? And hence you are made sometimes to cry out with the psalmist, Psal. lxxxiv. 1, 2, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." Sweet sermons, sweet communion-days, lovely occasions, when the bridegroom's voice is to be heard.

3. Are you filled with low thoughts of yourselves, and all your own doings and performances, and with high thoughts of Christ and his righteousness? And do you turn out all Christ's rivals out of your hearts, and undervalue the world and all things in it besides him, who is "the chiefest among ten thousands, and fairer than the sons of men?"

4. Do you find a great alteration and gracious change on your souls since the time you heard his voice? Doth Christ sit as a refiner with you, changing both heart and life to the better? Are "old things past away," old lusts, old thoughts, old desires, old customs, old ways? And are all things with you become new? You that formerly set light by Christ and his voice, and admired the world and its flattering pleasures, and said of Christ, "What is thy beloved more than another beloved?" Do you now value him, seek nearness to him in duties, inquire for him in ordinances, yea, meditate on him in the night-watches, and when ye awake, do you find your hearts with him? And is sin, that displeaseth him, your greatest terror? Then surely you are among that blessed company that have heard your Redeemer's voice in your day of grace, and you may come with joy to his table.

IV. Use of exhortation. And here I exhort you all, in the name of Christ, to improve your season of grace. "To-day, while it is called to-day, O hear his voice;" and to-morrow, when he invites, O come unto his table. Hearers of the gospel, "This is now the accepted time, this is the day of salvation." What do you resolve to do? Christ is now come to cry and lift up his voice to this whole congregation, to try you once more if you will hear his voice before your day of grace end. Well, his voice is to you all, I know none of you excluded, if you do not exclude yourselves.

1. O carnal earthly-minded soul, that has been a drudge to the world, and a stranger to Christ all thy days, his voice is to you this day. O come hear his voice, and close a bargain with him, it will be the best bargain ever you made.

2. O profane sinner, drunkard, swearer, liar, Sabbath-breaker, whoremonger, sinner as black as hell, hearken to Christ's voice this day, and come and be saved from thy sins. Why will you stop your ears, and choose to die in your sins?

3. O hard-hearted sinner, that never was affected all thy life for the sinfulness and misery of thy natural estate, that never had a sore heart for offending God, that never mourned for one sin, Christ's voice is this day to thee, Isa. xlii. 12, "Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness."

4. O prayerless sinner, that never bowed a knee in secret, to cry for pardon of sin, and an interest in Jesus Christ, to save thee from the wrath to come, lend your ear this day, and hearken to Christ's sweet voice, while he calls, "Seek the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near," Isa. lv. 6.

5. Condemned rebels in the hands of justice, sentenced to die, and ready to be taken out to execution: O hear Christ's voice this day, and your souls shall live.

6. Slaves to sin and Satan, who have many times heard the devil's voice, answered his calls, and complied readily with his temptations; will you hear the Redeemer's voice for once, and comply with his counsels before it be too late? Why will ye shut your ear against the lovely Saviour, and obey the voice of your soul-destroyer.

7. Obstinate sinner, that could never hitherto, either by the word or the rod, by ministers or providences, be prevailed upon to leave one of all thy sins, O be persuaded to hear Christ's voice this day, and no longer harden thy heart.

8. O gospel-slighter, that hast many a day refused Christ's offers, spurned against his bowels, trampled on his blood, crucified him at the communion-table: O come, hearken this day to his voice, and he will let you see, that though your case be sad, yet it is not desperate; for "he hath found a ransom."

9. Hypocrites and formalists, that have had a mask of religion, but have all your days been dissembling and dealing deceitfully with God; come, deal ingenuously and sincerely with him for once, and hearken to his voice, give him your hearts as well as your outward man.

10. Backsliders and covenant-breakers, who have broken many a vow, slighted many an engagement, and sinned against many a resolution: O hear Christ's voice this day, when he calls to you, "Turn, ye backsliding children," come to me, and "I will heal your backslidings, and love you freely."

11. Poor plagued diseased souls, who are groaning under many heart-plagues and soul-distresses, such as atheism, pride, hardness, formality, &c.: come hearken to Christ's voice, and he will be your Physician.

12. Weary and heavy-laden sinners, who are like to sink with the burden of your guilt, come hearken to Christ's voice this day, and he "will give rest to your souls."

13. Pursued shelterless sinners, who are afraid of the avenger of blood, hearken to Christ's voice, and fly to the city of refuge. Many motives and arguments might I use with you, to hear the voice of lovely Jesus, while he calls to-day.

I. Consider how earnest Christ is to persuade you to hear his voice; he stands at your doors, and knocks both by his word and Spirit; yea, he waits and knocks after many repulses and affronts, and promises that all former slights and refusals shall be forgiven, if ye will yet hearken and close with him. How oft doth he repeat his entreaties, Luke xiii. 34, "How oft would I have gathered you!" Yea, he weeps for sinners' obstinacy, Luke xix. 41. Strange! doth he gain any thing by your hearkening to his voice? What means this earnestness? It is all, O sinners, on your account. For, (1.) He knows better than any the worth of your souls, and that a world cannot redeem them when lost. (2.) He knows well the miserable state of your souls without him; it is most sad and deplorable at present, and will be much more so through endless eternity: for if you hear not Christ's voice, you will die in your sins, and be tormented in them for ever. (3.) Christ is so earnest, because he knows the difficulty of winning souls. He knows Satan has great power and interest with souls, to blind, harden, and delude them, and that it is not easy to undeceive them, and pull them out of his hand; and therefore he deals and strives so earnestly with souls to gain them.

II. Take a serious view of the state of your souls. While you stop your ears against Christ's charming voice; it is inexpressibly miserable. For, (1.) Your souls are destitute of all that is good, Eph. ii. 12. You are as poor and wretched creatures as ever God made; you are without life, without grace, without peace, without pardon, without comfort, without righteousness, without ransom, without the favour of God, without the lovely image of God, without the Spirit of God, and without all happiness. (2.) Your souls are in the possession of Satan, where Christ is shut out, the devil is let in; and where he dwells, there he hath an absolute dominion: he uses all the faculties of the soul as his tools and instruments, Eph. ii. 2. O! would not any man reckon it an unspeakable misery to be in a house shut up with the devil? (3.) Where Christ is shut out, the plague of sin rageth, and its pestilential marks daily appear; what madness is it then to refuse to hearken to the voice of this blessed Cleanser? (4.) The fire of God's wrath is kindled there, where Christ is refused; and what distraction is it to shut out Christ, whose blood only can quench this fire? (5.) If you do not hearken to Christ, you have no way to prevent eternal destruction; for there is no advocate, no surety to interpose for you, if he be refused. Surely the thought of appearing before an angry God after death must be terrible to a Christless soul; "For who can dwell with devouring fire? Who can abide with everlasting burnings?" I have read of a certain king of Hungary, who was a Christian; and being on a time marvellous sad and heavy, his brother, who was a brisk and gallant man, would needs know what ailed him. "O brother!" saith he, "I have been a great sinner against God, and I know not how I shall appear before him when he comes to judgment." His brother answered, "These are but melancholy thoughts," and so made light of them, as courtiers use to do. The king replied nothing at that time; but the custom of that country was, (the government thereof being absolute,) that if the executioner sounded a trumpet before any man's door, the man was presently to be led to execution. The king, in the dead time of the night, sent his executioner, and caused him sound his trumpet before his brother's door, who, hearing and seeing the messenger of death, ran quickly, and sprang in trembling into his brother's presence, falls down on his knees, and beseeches the king to let him know wherein he had offended him. "O brother," answered the king, "you never offended me, but loved me: and," said he, "is the sight of an earthly executioner so terrible to thee; and shall not I, who am so great a sinner, fear much more to be brought to the judgment-seat of an angry God." What soul can think on this without terror, that hath not hearkened to Christ's voice in the gospel?

III. If you do not hearken to Christ's voice in the gospel, it had been better for you never to have heard the gospel at all; for your guilt is dreadfully aggravated hereby, and your misery will be the greater, both here and hereafter. We may gather this from Rev. vi. where, after the "white horse," i. e. Christ with the gospel neglected, comes the "red horse" of war, the "black horse" of famine, and the "pale horse" of pestilence. Neglecting to hear Christ in the gospel, ushers in all outward miseries like a flood, Jer. vi. 8, "Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem, lest my soul depart from thee, lest I make thee desolate, a land not inhabited." Then again, how sad will your case be at a tribunal, and through all eternity! The devils, the Turks, the heathens, and your own consciences, will bitterly upbraid you in hell, for refusing to hear Christ's voice in the gospel.

IV. Christ will not hear your cries in the time of misery, if you neglect his voice in the time of mercy, Prov. i. 24—26. Now Christ's voice is sweet, and full of mercy; but remember, O gospel-slighters, the time is at hand, when you will hear Christ speaking in another tone; no more "open to me, and hearken to my voice," poor soul: but "depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire," &c.

V. This may be the last season you will hear Christ's voice speaking to you; this may be the last communion and the last call that Christ intends to give you. This may be the last day of grace, and the last time that his Spirit will strive with you. If you stop your ear, or harden your heart this day, there may follow an eternal dead silence, and God's Spirit never strive any more with you, and so your day of grace is lost, and your soul lost for ever. O young folk, what say ye to it? A season of youth is an accepted time, and a day of salvation: for the Lord's sake do not lose it. You have now plenty of sermons, sacraments, and gospel-offers; you have Christ crucified set before your eyes to affect your hearts, and bring you to a compliance with his calls. You have also loud warnings this day from God's providence, and, I hope, some of you the inward workings of God's Spirit on your consciences, concurring with these outward means. Well, then, give kindly entertainment to Christ's voice in this season of grace; while he yet stands beseeching you, come hearken to his voice, and accept of him as your Surety; enter into covenant with him this night, and come to his table, and seal it to-morrow. O sinner, turn your back on the devil, leave your sins, and stop your course, and come and be reconciled to God through this peace-maker, who is standing waiting to be employed. Well, what answer shall I carry back to my Master, that sent me to deal with you for this end? Shall I go and complain? "Lord, they are a company of obstinate sinners thou sentest me to; I entreated them to hearken to thy voice, and leave their sins; but there was no concern, no fear, no sense of sin among them. Had I been to preach to beasts, stocks, or stones, they would have been as much moved as they. Alas! I have spent my strength in vain, my voice and lungs for nought; I thought thy sweet entreaties and charming voice would have melted their hearts; but neither comforts nor terrors had any effect."

Or shall I have ground to say? "Lord, I have offered sinners a Redeemer, and entreated them to close with him. Though they stood long out against thy threatenings, yet when they heard thy entreaties, their hearts began to relent, some began to sigh, others to weep, others to long after Christ; and I hope they are gone home to make a personal covenant with him this night, and sincerely design to return and seal it to-morrow." God grant this may be the event. Amen.

SERMON IV.—A SERMON AFTER THE COMMUNION.—THE BELIEVER'S DIGNITY IN BEING AN HEIR OF GOD.

Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son: and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ, Gal. iv. 7.

In this chapter the apostle holds forth the happy state of believing Gentiles under New Testament times; that it is ever preferable to that of the believing Jews under the Old Testament. The Jewish church he compares to a child in minority, that is, under tutors and governors, and is acquainted only with the first rudiments of religion; and likewise to the state of a servant, that is still kept under subjection and bondage: for that church was always in a servile condition, having been under the heavy yoke of a great many ceremonial rites and observances. But our blessed Lord Jesus, by his coming into the world, hath broken off that yoke from his people's necks, and hath brought them under a more spiritual and agreeable dispensation; yea, he hath sent forth his Spirit into their hearts. Upon which account the apostle concludes them to be happy, yea, even children of God, "Wherefore thou art no more a servant," &c.

In the text we have the happy state of the believing Galatians briefly represented. I. Negatively, "Thou art no more a servant;" i. e. no more in a state of servile subjection to the law, and to the Mosaic rites and observations. II. Positively, "Thou art a son;" i. e. thou hast attained to a more excellent state of liberty, like to that of sons who have come to ripe age. He means not that believers under the Old Testament had not that privilege of being children of God; no, believers then were really sons, but kept in such a state, and trained up under such hard discipline, that they seemed more like servants than sons. But, saith he, to you, the believers under the New Testament, the discipline is changed, and you have attained to more honourable son-like treatment. III. We have an inference from this privilege of son-ship, "And if a son, then an heir of God through Christ." Among men only, the eldest son is heir, but all God's children are heirs.

In which we have two things: 1. The high dignity and preferment of God's children; they are heirs of God, i. e. they have a free right and title to eternal life, and all the gifts and blessings of God; yea, to the infinite God himself, who is the believer's chief good and portion. 2. The way of obtaining this dignity and happiness, through Christ, and the merit of his blood: He is God's eternal Son, and heir of all things, and being our Surety, he, by his obedience and sufferings, hath purchased a title to believers, to be God's sons by adoption, and joint heirs with him of the heavenly inheritance: "He is our elder brother, and is not ashamed to call us brethren." The inheritance is his by nature, but ours by grace.

From the words thus explained, observe,

1st. That the privileges of believers under the New Testament, exceed those who lived under the Old. The legal state was more servile, but the gospel state is more filial.

2d. That though God hath one Son only by eternal generation, viz. our Lord Jesus Christ; yet he hath many sons by grace and adoption, viz. believers.

3d. That those who have the Spirit of God dwelling in their hearts, and exciting them to prayer, have a good evidence of their son-ship, and filial relation to God. This is clear from the connection of this verse with the preceding.

4th. The doctrine that I am to insist on at this time is, "That it is the great honour and privilege of all true believers, to be the children and heirs of God through Jesus Christ."

This is confirmed from that parallel text, Rom. viii. 16, 17.

The method for handling this subject shall be, I. To enquire in what sense believers are the children of God. II. In what respect they are called heirs. III. What is the heritage they are entitled to. IV. How it is they attain to this privilege. V. To show the wonderful free grace of God, in granting such a glorious privilege to believers, as to be his children and heirs. VI. Make improvement of the whole.

I. As to the first, In what sense believers are the children of God.

1. Negatively, It is not to be meant here, that that they are his children only, (1.) In respect of creation, for so all men are God's children, Mal. ii. 10, "Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?" Had believers no further interest in God than this, they should have but little comfort; for in this sense God is also Father to the devils and wicked men, for "he made them; but he that made them will not have mercy on them, and he that formed them will show them no favour." Nor, (2.) Is it to be meant, that they are his children only by providence; for so he is to all, Deut. xxxii. 6, "Is he not thy Father that bought thee?" i. e. hath redeemed thee from slavery, and conferred great blessings on thee. Nor, (3.) Is it to be understood of their being his children by profession, or external covenant-engagements; for so all the members of the visible church are, Isa. i. 2.

2. Positively, Believers are the children of God, by way of special grace, and that in these several respects, (1.) In respect of election, God has chosen and predestinated them from eternity to be his children and heirs, upon whom he will entail the kingdom of heaven, Eph. i. 5. (2.) In respect of regeneration, he dignifies them with a new birth, working a gracious change upon them, infusing in them a supernatural principle of holiness, whereby they become like their heavenly Father, and so they are said to be "begotten and born of God," Jam. i. 18; 1 John iii. 9. (3.) They are his children by adoption; which is an act of God's free grace, whereby he assumes those into the number of his children who were not so naturally, but were strangers and aliens: Yea, he takes those who were enemies, and of the family of hell, into the family of heaven; and graciously entitles them to all the advantages, dignities, and privileges of children.—As, for instance, he educates, brings them up, and makes provision for them, as for sons, Isa. xlii. 3; Matt. vi. 32; Psal. lxxxiv. 11.—He allows them a share in his fatherly love and compassion, together with the protection and attendance of sons, Jer. xxxi. 20; Heb. i. 14.—He frees them from a servile state, or any base and drudgery work, and endues them with a free spirit, Rom. viii. 15.—They have the chastisement of sons, which is most needful, Deut. viii. 5; Heb. xii. 6—8.—He allows them free access to, and a filial confidence with him in prayer; hence, in the verse preceding my text, the apostle saith, "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." And, lastly, he entitles them to the inheritance of sons, as in the text, "If sons, then heirs of God." And this leads to,

II. The second head, viz. In what respect believers are called heirs. And for the better illustration hereof, I shall show wherein temporal and spiritual heirs do agree, and wherein they differ.

They agree and resemble one another, in these things:

1. He that is an heir of an estate, hath his title freely conveyed to him; he pays not for it, because he has it by birth. So believers, who are spiritual heirs, have the title to their inheritance freely; and as they have nothing to pay for it, so it is given to them "without money, and without price." And though they have not a title to it by their natural birth, yet by their new birth they become the sons of God, and heirs of heaven.

2. They who are rightful heirs of an estate have the surest title of any other, because it is built upon nature: a father may frown upon his son and heir for his fault, but doth not easily disinherit him; nor will he turn him out of doors, as he doth a servant, for his offence. So believers, who are God's adopted children and heirs, have a most sure title to the heavenly inheritance. Though God may chastise them, yet he will not disinherit them, Psal. lxxxix. 32—34, "I will visit their transgressions with the rod; nevertheless, my loving-kindness I will not take utterly from him. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips." Our title to the inheritance by the second covenant, is far surer than Adam's was by the first: for when he offended, God treated him as a servant, and turned him out of doors: but the believer, who is become a child and heir by Jesus Christ, is better secured by the second covenant; for he hath not only God's word, God's writ, and God's oath, to confirm it, but he hath the Mediator's blood sealing his charter, and an earnest of the inheritance already given him, viz. God's Spirit put into his heart, 2 Cor. i. 22. So that his right and title is indefeasible and can never be altered.

3. An heir's title to an inheritance is reckoned more honourable than his who obtains it another way. So the believers' title is most honourable, being made heirs of God, and co-heirs with his own Son Jesus Christ, Rom. viii. 17.—Christ is the natural Son, and has the primary right to the inheritance; but believers, by adoption, are assigned to a share, and made co-heirs with him. So that Christ and believers do, as it were, divide heaven betwixt them; they have the same Father, dwell in the same house, sit at the same table, reign on the same throne, partake of the same glory. O! what honour is this, which is put on worms of the earth! John xvii. 22, 24; John xx. 17; Rev. iii. 21.—Christ indeed being our elder Brother, his inheritance is double, and his power and glory is far greater than the glorified saints and angels, "insomuch as he hath, by inheritance, obtained a more excellent name than they," Heb. i. 4; Eph. i. 22.

4. An heir, during his minority, hath not the actual possession of his inheritance, as being incapable to manage it, and therefore hath tutors and curators appointed him; so a believer, though an heir of heaven, hath not the possession of the inheritance, while here. This life is the time of his minority, and Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit are his tutors and curators, until he arrive at ripe age, and the years of his majority, when he will be fully "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light," and then he enters upon the immediate possession of all that is promised to him.

5. An heir of an estate, though he want the possession for a time, yet he hath a present maintenance allowed him out of it, suitable to his station and circumstances; so believers, during their minority in this world, have a sufficient maintenance granted them, out of that great inheritance promised to, and provided for them. As for temporal things, they have a competency secured to them while here:—"Their bread shall be given them, and their water shall be sure." And for spiritual things, they shall have as much grace strength, comfort, and joy, as will bear their charges, until the time appointed come, when they shall enter upon the full possession of all.

6. An heir of a good estate may be somewhat straitened in his circumstances for a time, because of burdens on the estate, or some necessary restrictions laid upon him; yet comforts himself with the hopes of a plentiful estate at length: so the heirs of promise may be under many straits and difficulties while here, under burdens of corruptions, fears of wrath, and hidings of God's face. They often complain of little grace, weak faith, languishing desires, and of faint discoveries of God and Christ, and the invisible things of the other world: yet nevertheless they should not murmur, but encourage themselves in the faithful promise and sure right they have obtained in Christ; and be thankful, if as much be allowed them out of the inheritance, as will bear their charges to heaven, where they shall be supplied to the full, forget all their straits, and remember their poverty no more.

7. An heir, whatever his present straits and circumstances be, is a respectful and honourable person; and they who know what he is born to, and what his expectations are, put respect upon him: so believers, however mean and straitened they be, during their minority in this world, are very honourable persons, "the excellent ones in the earth," and, in many respects, "more excellent than their neighbours;" they are heirs of a great inheritance, and, upon this account, should be honoured by those among whom they live; for though they make no great outward appearance at present, yet, in a little, they shall be crowned with glory and honour.

On the other hand, temporal and spiritual heirs differ in these things:

1. Temporal heirs, however rich they be, are only heirs of a corruptible spot of earth; but believers are heirs of an "inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for them." And what is earth to heaven?

2. Many heirs, here on earth, never come to the actual possession of their estates; for they may be squandered away, or lost by the ill-management of their parents or tutors; or they may be taken from them by oppression or violence; and oftentimes death comes and snatches away the young heirs before they attain to ripe age; so that they never win to the possession. But heaven's heirs will all certainly get possession of their inheritance; their tutors will not lose nor mismanage it to them; no enemy can seize it by violence; nor "thief break through and steal." And death will be so far from depriving them of the possession of their inheritance, that it brings them to the immediate and full fruition thereof, through a glorious eternity.

3. A temporal heir doth not fully possess the heritage till the father dies; but the spiritual heir doth possess it fully in his father's life-time. Our eternal Father lives for ever; and this doth not hinder the heirs possessing: what a mystery is here! In temporal heritage the father dies to give place to the son; but here the Son dies to bring the heirs of heaven to live and possess with the Father.

4. When a temporal heir comes to the possession, he can enjoy the inheritance but a short while; for death soon comes and dispossesses him. But the spiritual heir, when he gets possession of his inheritance, becomes immortal, and is for ever out of the reach of death.

III. The third head in the method was, to show what the heritage is which God's children and heirs are entitled to; surely it is the greatest and largest that ever was: "All things are yours," 1 Cor. iii. 21. More particularly,

1. The earth is their inheritance, Mat. v. 5, though commonly they possess little of it, yet they have a covenant-right to make use of the good creatures, and the outward support and refreshments of life. The men of this world, though they have a general providential right to such things of the earth as they possess, yet they have no covenant-title thereto, as believers have: their enjoyments come not to them from God as a loving Father, or as a God in covenant with them, to promote their souls' good: they have not the comfortable and sanctified enjoyment of the creature; no, this comes only to us in Christ, and is a part of the believer's portion. By the fall, Adam and his posterity were disinherited, they lost their covenant-right over the creatures, with the sanctified use thereof. But in Christ, who is the heir of all things, the title is renewed to believers, and they become heirs of the world: and whatever part of it falls to their share, they may look on it as a blessing of the covenant, a legacy from Christ, a part of his purchase, sanctified for their use, and designed for their good.

2. Heaven is their heritage, however poor they be in this world, yet they are heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love him, Jam. ii. 5. The heirs of this celestial crown are like princes in disguise, travelling in a foreign country: strangers, that know them not, look only to their outward appearance; and are apt to think them poor and miserable; but their hopes and happiness lie in things not seen—they are heirs of the land that is afar off. Sometimes, with Moses, they are allowed to come to the top of Pisgah, to view this promised land, and this is most satisfying: at other times, with Abraham, they are admitted, as it were, to walk through it, and hear God say, "All this is thine, all is made over to thee in Christ:" and this fills the heirs of heaven with joy "unspeakable, and full of glory."

3. In the text they are called "heirs of God;" God himself is their inheritance, as this is more than to say, they are heirs of both heaven and earth. "I will be your God," is the most comprehensive promise in the whole Bible, it imports an interest in all the blessings and promises of the new-covenant, in all the purchase and fulness of Christ, in all the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, and in all the divine attributes and perfections. When the Lord saith to the heirs of salvation, "I will be your God;" how great is the inheritance he bequeaths to them! It is more than if he made over to them a thousand heavens, or ten thousand worlds; for, saith he, I give you the omnipotent Jehovah, I make over myself unto you, in all my essential perfections; my omnipotence shall be your guard, my omniscience your overseer, my omnipresence your companion, my bounty your store, my wisdom your counsellor, my justice your rewarder, my holiness your fountain of grace, my unchangeableness the rock of your security, my all-sufficiency your inheritance, and my eternity the date of your happiness. Surely, O believer, the "lines are fallen to you in pleasant places," and you have got a goodly heritage."

IV. The fourth head was, to inquire how believers attain to this high privilege, of being children and heirs of God.—1. It is not from any worth or merit in them, but from the free love and goodness of God, that hath predestinated them to the adoption of children, and chosen them heirs of the kingdom. 2. It is by the mediation of Jesus Christ, who, as their Surety, interposes for them, when under sentence of death; purchased the inheritance for them by his merits, and left it to them in legacy by his testament, which he sealed and confirmed with his own blood. 3. By the application of the Holy Ghost, who is the executor of Christ's testament, and who comes and infests believers in the bequeathed inheritance, by renewing their souls, working faith in them, and disposing them to close with the Redeemer; planting all gracious habits in them, and thereby giving them the earnest and first fruits of the inheritance.

V. The fifth thing was to show the wonderful grace of God in granting such a glorious privilege to poor believers. If we seriously consider the grace of God in adopting us to be his children and heirs, we may well cry out with the apostle, 1 John iii. 1, "Behold! what manner of love is this the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God?" The wonderfulness of this grace appears in these things:

1. That he adopts us to be his sons and heirs when he needed us not. Men adopt sons because they are childless, and need some to propagate their families, keep up their name, and perpetuate their memories. But the eternal Father adopts children and heirs, though he hath a natural and eternal Son of his own, who is the brightness of his glory, the express image of his person, a Son in whom his soul delighteth; and although he could have been infinitely happy without us, and needed no accession to his glory. We stood in need of a Father, but he stood not in need of sons.

2. That he chooses those to be his sons and heirs who have nothing to recommend them to him, but are utterly unworthy of this dignity and privilege. Men usually adopt those of their kindred, or who are their friends and favourites; but God shows this favour to rebels, enemies, traitors, Satan's slaves, and hell's heirs. Men adopt those in whom they see, or at least fancy, something of worth. Mordecai adopted Esther because she was fair: but God adopts those who are naturally most vile and unworthy, yea, despicable as worms, loathed as carcasses, deformed as monsters, black as Ethiopians, and diseased as lepers. Having nothing to engage his love, but every thing to provoke his loathing of us.

3. That he should be at such charge and cost in adopting us. Men are at no pains about it, but to draw up a writ, and sign or seal it, and then all is done; but infinite wisdom and power must be set on work to make us sons and heirs; an eternity must be spent in contriving the method; the eternal Son of God must die to bring it about, and the charter of our adoption must be sealed with his most precious blood. Never was it heard that any man let his only son suffer and die to adopt an enemy; but this the great God hath done, which is the wonder of the redeemed, the wonder of angels, and will be the wonder of eternity.

4. That he exalts those whom he adopts to such high dignity and honour; for God to have pardoned his enemies, and delivered them from going to hell, had been much; for him to have taken his enemies, and made them his friends and favourites, had been more: but for God to take his mortal enemies into his bosom, and make them his sons and heirs; yea, beautify them with his image, value them as his jewels, entitle them to his kingdom, and make them co-heirs with his own beloved Son, is such a prodigy of love as surpasseth all infinite comprehension. To have advanced one of the blessed cherubim or seraphim so high, had been a stupendous act of grace: but to take a lump of polluted dust, a cursed sinner, a wretch as black as hell could make him, and raise him so high, yea, above the brightest cherub in glory, is eternally an astonishing wonder of free love.

APPLICATION.

I. Use of information. This doctrine informs us of these things:

1. Of the wonderful love and goodness of God to poor elect sinners in Christ: he takes enemies into his family, yea, puts them among his children; and not only doth he confer the honour of sonship on them, but also puts the nature of sons in them; for they are sons by regeneration, as well as by adoption; both these are joined together, as is clear from John i. 12, 13, "To them that believe he gave power to become the sons of God, who were born not of the will of man, but of God."

2. That believers are of more noble and illustrious descent than any others; they are sons of the most high God. Some talk of their progenitors, and value themselves on their high extract: so the Jews vaunted that they were Abraham's seed, John viii. 33. But surely it is an infinitely greater privilege to be among the sons of God. David thought it no small honour to be son-in-law to the king of Israel, 1 Sam. xviii. 18. And shall any among us reckon it a small thing to be a son to the King of heaven.

3. That God is an infinitely rich and bountiful Father, who makes all his children heirs, and that of a great and splendid inheritance: though his family be numerous, yet there is not one of them left unprovided; for he brings "many sons to glory," Heb. ii. 10.

II. Use of examination. Let us all try what right or claims we have to this honour and privilege, of being the sons and heirs of God.

1. Try, O communicants, if ye have the marks and characters of God's children. (1.) Have you cordially made choice of God as your Father in Christ, and dedicated yourselves to him at this time in a perpetual covenant, Jer. iii. 19, "How shall I put thee among the children! &c. Thou shalt call me my Father." (2.) Have ye received the Mediator by a true and lively faith; for it is hereby we become children, John i. 2, "To as many as received him, he gave power to become the sons of God." Gal. iii. 26, "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." We can be adopted only by virtue of his right, who is the elder brother, and heir of all things. (3.) Are you like your Father? have you his image upon you, holiness? (4.) Do you sincerely love Christ, your elder Brother and Redeemer? John viii. 42, "Jesus said unto them, if God were your Father, ye would love me." (5.) Do ye love and esteem all the children of the family as the excellent of the earth? Psal. xvi. 2. (6.) Are ye heartily concerned for the interest and welfare of your mother, the church? Psal. cxxxvii. 6. (7.) Are ye troubled for offending your Father? 2 Chron. xxxiv. 27. (8.) Are you desirous of your Father's presence and company? Psal. xxvi. 8. (9.) Have ye children's appetites for your spiritual food? Psal. lxxxiv. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 2.

2. Try if you have the spirit and disposition of heirs.

(1.) Is it your main care to make sure your birth-right and title to the inheritance? Many of God's children have not the assurance hereof, but they all labour after it, and are restless without it, Matt. vi. 33.

(2.) If you be heirs, you will highly value your birth-right, and not be willing to part with it for a trifle; you will not (like profane Esau, Heb. xi. 16) sell it for sensual pleasures and gratifications of the flesh. Nay, your hearts will rise against Satan's solicitations to break with your Father, and sell your birth-right, and say with Naboth to Ahab, 1 Kings xxi. 3, "The Lord forbid it me, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee." God forbid that I should part with my portion in Christ for worldly gain, carnal satisfactions, or any earthly delight whatsoever.

(3.) Your hearts and thoughts will be much set upon your heritage above, for it is your treasure, and "where your treasure is, there will your hearts be also," Matt. vi. 21. What do ye think most of when ye are alone? Nebuchadnezzar, when he was alone, thought on his large territories, Dan. iv. 29, 30, "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom," &c. So, if you be heirs of heaven, your hearts will be running much thither.

(4.) In the time of your difficulties and straits, you will be drawing your comfort and encouragement from the large and goodly heritage you are entitled to; and likewise you will be looking and waiting when it will fall into your hands; yea, you will be sending messengers and spies to the land of promise to survey it, and bring you good tidings from thence for your support while in the wilderness. You will be feasting and entertaining yourselves with the thoughts of your rich inheritance and portion in Christ, and groaning within yourselves, "When shall I be with my Father and elder Brother above? When shall my pilgrimage be finished, and the time of my minority expire, that I may enter upon the possession." Rom. viii. 23, "We, who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our bodies."

(5.) All those who are heirs of heaven get the seal and earnest of the inheritance put in their hearts, viz. the Spirit of God, 2 Cor. i. 22; Eph. i. 13, 14, "After that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession." As an earnest-penny secures our right to a bargain, and is also a part of it; so the sanctifying Spirit, or grace of God in the heart, is a pledge and earnest of the glorious inheritance above. O communicants! have ye got this earnest in your souls? Are ye beginning to reap the first-fruits of the inheritance? Surely it will be matter of rejoicing to find it.

QUEST. How shall I know if I have got the Spirit in my heart, as the seal and first-fruits of the inheritance?

ANS. By his actings and operations in your souls. 1. Wherever he is, he is an illuminating Spirit that lets you see the evil of sin, and the excellency of Christ. 2. A humbling Spirit that brings the soul to lie in the dust, and abhor itself for its abominations. 3. A Spirit of prayer that inclines the soul to come to its Father for the supply of wants, Gal. iv. 6. 4. A sin-subduing Spirit that helps to weaken and mortify in-dwelling corruption, Rom. viii. 13. 5. A soul-sanctifying Spirit that infuses, increases, quickens, and actuates grace in the heart, Eph. iv. 23, 24. Now wherever these gracious actings and operations of the Spirit are to be found, you may conclude you have got a seal of your heirship, the earnest and first-fruits of the inheritance, as a pledge of your being shortly put in possession of all.

III. Use of exhortation to two sorts, 1. Those who are aliens and foreigners. 2. Those who are children and heirs of God.

I. I shall speak to those who are aliens, have no interest in God's family, nor the children's privileges; and yet many such have been presuming to eat of the children's bread, to which they have no right. I entreat you to awake from your security, and consider the misery of your state. O! that God would sound an alarm in your ears.

1. If you be not God's children, you are dogs; and yet you have been presuming to meddle with the children's bread, which is horrid sacrilege.

2. You are children of the devil, and of the family of hell; nay, you are Satan's bond slaves. There is no medium; either you are God's children, or the devil's slaves, John viii. 44. And what have Satan's slaves to do with God's holy things?

3. O alien and foreigner! thou art a child of wrath, an heir of hell; this is thy native heritage and portion, and this sad heritage will remain sure to thee; when thou leavest thy substance to others, this shall go along with thyself to another world. "The wrath of God abideth on thee," both here and eternally: O sinner! wrath is thy constant covering now, and the heavens are growing blacker and blacker every day above thy head. The earth is weary of thee; the pit is opening her mouth for thee; "Hell is groaning for thee from beneath;" and the thread of life, that is keeping thee out of it, is just ready to break. O! waken before it be too late.

4. Thou art "without God in the world;" thou hast no interest in God as thy friend; thou art far from God; he is thy wrathful enemy: thy hell is begun already; for what makes hell but exclusion from the presence of God!"—"Depart from me, ye cursed." Now you are gone from God already, with his curse upon you, like the damned; only your case is not desperate as theirs is: there is some hope of your returning to God again: but there is none of theirs. "O! turn then to the strong hold, ye prisoners of hope."

5. By presuming on the Lord's table, you have drawn a new curse on yourselves; for ye have been mocking God, shedding Christ's blood, murdering the blessed Redeemer. You have been acting Judas's part, saying, "Hail, Master," and "betraying the Son of God with a kiss." O! Satan's slaves, you have been eating Christ's bread, but God's curse was on the morsel you got; and you have drawn down new soul-plagues on yourselves. You will be ten times more Satan's slaves than you were before; for to all your other sins you have added this, of "crucifying Christ afresh."

QUEST. Is there any hope for such children of wrath, and heirs of hell, as we are? "What shall we do to be saved?"

ANS. 1. I say to you, as Peter to Simon Magus, Acts viii. 21, 22, "Thou hast neither lot nor part in this matter; thy heart is not right with God: repent therefore of this thy wickedness, and pray God for forgiveness." Repent and weep over a slain Christ, whom you pierced at his table, and cry, "Lord, deliver me from blood-guiltiness." O! can you weep over a dead child, or friend? Can you weep for the loss of world's wealth, and not weep for the loss of your souls, and of your Saviour?

2. Retire into some secret place, and there meditate on your misery, while children of Satan, and heirs of wrath. Firmly believe your sad state, your salvation is impossible, while in it. There is a bill of exclusion passed in the court of heaven, against all under a covenant of works, which is your case, Gal. iv. 30, "The son of the bond-woman shall not be heir:" heirs of wrath must not be heirs of glory: there is no salvation under this covenant, but on a condition impossible, perfect obedience to the law, and satisfaction to divine justice for the wrong already done. There is no promise in it of pardon, no place for repentance, no accepting the will for the deed. O! poor forlorn soul, put the question to thyself, How shall I live in this case? How shall I die in it? How shall I appear before a just God in it? Surely, a state of wrath is too hot a climate for my soul to live in.

3. Cherish convictions when God sends them: go not to run away with God's arrows of conviction sticking in your consciences, to your employments, to work them out; to your cups, to drink them out; to your bed, to sleep them out; to your companions, to sport them away. No, but run with them to the great physician, Christ, that he may take them out with his own hand, and apply Gilead's balm to the wound. Alas! many destroy their immortal souls, by crucifying their convictions.

4. Presently embrace the sweet gospel-offers that are made to you; now is the day when the great trumpet is blown, that out-cast perishing sinners may come and accept of the gospel jubilee, Isa. xxvii. 13. Now liberty is proclaimed to the captives: now the heirs of wrath may become heirs of glory. And what way is that? even by closing with Christ in a marriage-covenant. Come marry the heir of all things, and you shall be freed from bondage, and heaven shall be your dowry. Come flee presently out of the dominion of the law, into the dominion of grace; and there the law's curses shall not reach you. Accept of Jesus Christ on the terms of grace, and you shall have a great heritage with him, an inheritance that shall last for ever. Worldly heritages do not last; all your riches and honours, profits and pleasures, must shortly be buried with you, they cannot accompany you into another world. But if you accept of Christ, as your Saviour and Surety, then the eternal God is your God "and portion for ever." O heirs of wrath, what are your hearts saying? Are you content with this bargain? Are you willing to leave Satan's slavery, and become children and heirs of the great King?

5. Remember that dreadful vengeance will shortly seize upon them that refuse such a glorious heritage: consider what is abiding you, Psal. xi. 6, "Snares, fire, brimstone, and an horrible tempest, shall be the portion of your cup."

Exhortation II. To those who are sons and heirs of God. I shall speak, in the first place, some things to you all in general.

1. Has God of his free merey and rich grace, made you his sons and heirs, then be humbled, and and remember what you once were. When God found you, you were "children of wrath, even as others." Free love hath picked you out from among the multitude of condemned malefactors, hath commanded your fetters to be taken off, put a pardon in your hands, and brought you forth to the glorious liberty of the children of God, and made you "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." You had nothing in you to engage him to love you, yet he loved you, when you were most loathsome. What matter of wonder is here! The glorious Bridegroom courted and espoused you to himself on the day in which you might have been led forth to execution! He took off your prison-garment, and clothed you with robes of righteousness, and garments of salvation. He took the chains from off your arms, the rope from about your neck, and put his own comeliness on you, that you might be fit for the King's table! be not proud of your gifts, graces, or attainments: but remember, that ye were once "children of wrath, even as others;" all you have is borrowed. Be humble also, and "remember your faults this day." Mind, how you have forgotten your benefactor! How unkindly you have treated him that remembered you in your low estate! How unsuitably you have walked! "Is this your kindness to your friend?"

2. Pity the children of wrath, and heirs of hell, that still lie in chains of darkness. Be not unconcerned for them, seeing ye were once in the same condition with them; ye have got ashore, but your fellows behind you are still in danger of perishing. Put on bowels of compassion for them, pity them, and use all means for their deliverance.

3. Be content with your lot in a present world, and be easy under your present straits and difficulties, whatever they be; for you have the prospect of a great inheritance from whence you may take encouragements under every trial. You may be easy under the world's hatred, and carry cheerfully amidst all affronts and injuries, for you may expect to be envied. Favourites of princes are commonly slandered and abused. Joseph was hated of his brethren, because his father showed more than ordinary kindness to him. "If ye were of the world, saith Christ, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you," John xvi. 19. But let this solace your minds; you are heirs of God, and dearly beloved of him.

4. Live as children of God, and heirs of the kingdom; walk worthy of your dignity, and behave suitably to your character. You have the angels, those great officers of the crown, and chief ministers of state, appointed to wait on you constantly, while here below, and you have a glorious expectation hereafter. Show forth then the greatness and nobleness of your spirits, by undervaluing mean and sordid things. Let your speech and actions here look like the country to which you are going, that it may be said of you, as of Gideon's children, Judg. viii. 18, "Each one resembled the children of a king." The heirs of earthly kings have been observed to have had generous and noble spirits, and have scorned to intermeddle with base and inferior matters. It is a common story of Alexander the Great, that when he was a little boy, and provoked to run a race with one of his inferiors, he first demurred, and then flatly refused the challenge, saying, "It did not become the son of a king to submit to so mean an undertaking, and contend with one so far below him." The brave spirit of that princely youth may shame those Christians who are the adopted sons of God, and heirs to a crown that shall never fade; and yet oftentimes are found grovelling on the earth, like the men of this world, and busied about things very far below them. Let the heirs of heaven maintain a holy contempt of the world, and the things thereof. Let them set their feet on those things on which worldlings set their hearts; and reckon themselves richer and happier in their relation to God and the kingdom above, than any graceless monarch that ever wore an earthly crown. Shall earthly men make such a noise in the world, and think none comparable to them, because forsooth their heap of dung is some what bigger than their neighbour's? (for so Paul esteems the world) and will the children of the King of heaven, "of whom the world is not worthy," Heb. xi. 38, be so low and mean-spirited, as to be amused and dazzled with the world's vanities; who yet have God for their portion, Christ for their husband, heaven for their home, and glory for their treasure?

5. Let the heirs of heaven be mutually concerned in one another; let them sympathise together, when any of them is in trouble, and also rejoice in one another's welfare. And when the time cometh that they arrive at full age, and are taken up to the possession of their inheritance, though they be your near relations, do not quarrel God's providence, or mourn, "as those that have no hope;" or carry, as if you grudged their happiness; but cheerfully submit to your Father's will, and rejoice in their preferment; for the "day of their death is better than the day of their birth."

6. Be earnest in prayer, that God may raise up many young heirs to supply the room of those that he is taking home. Let the heirs of God be never so much increased, God's children will not envy their number, but greatly rejoice therein; seeing the inheritance is vast, and infinitely satisfying to both men and angels: and our heavenly Father is highly glorified in the multitude of his children. And, Lastly, When heirs are brought into the family, carry affectionately to them; be kind to young heirs, especially during the time of their nonage and want of experience; be for "eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame," and great shall be your reward in heaven.

In the next place, I shall say something more particularly to those who were at their Father's table yesterday, of whom I presume there have been, and are several sorts.

I. There may be some, I hope, that have ground to say, that they came to their Father's table, and he smiled on them, and dealt bountifully with them. To such I shall say these few things: 1. Wonder at the Lord's kindness, and bless his name with your whole souls, for his distinguishing favours to you, who were by nature enemies of God, and children of Satan. 2. Hold fast and improve carefully what you have got, and let not Satan rob you of it. 3. Sympathize with other children of the family, that have not got your length, but perhaps are under great discouragements; mind their case, and speak a good word for them now, while you are favourites of heaven.

II. In the next place, I shall speak to those heirs of heaven, who, notwithstanding of their being at the table, remain full of doubts and fears, and are very apprehensive that God has not yet put them among the children, nor given them a right to the heir's portion. Well, what is the ground of your doubting? 1. O, saith one, I scarce feel the working of the sanctifying Spirit of God in my soul, which is the common earnest or pledge of the inheritance, that God useth to give to his heirs while here. Ans. Though grace be weak in you, you must "not despise the day of small things," or say you have none at all: nay, bless God, if thou canst spy any spark of grace in thy heart at all, and pray that God may cherish it. A man that gets an earnest of a good bargain, is not much discouraged whether it be a greater or a smaller piece of money, a sixpence, or half-a-crown. for he thinks the least piece is a sufficient earnest or pledge from an honest man of his bargain; and he is easy, seeing he knows he has to do with one that is faithful, and will not go back of his word: indeed he might be discouraged, if that which he got were not an earnest-penny: but there is a great difference betwixt a piece of money that is given in gratitude, and that which is given only in earnest, as a pledge of a far greater sum, or of a very rich bargain. O heir of heaven, remember this, the small degree of grace thou hast, is given only as an earnest of more grace, yea, of eternal glory itself.

2. Another may be saying, Ah! but I want that love to God that a child should have to his father. Ans. 1. It is good thou art sensible of it, and that thou knowest thy wants. 2. Canst thou say it is thy greatest grief thou hast not more love to thy Father; yea, that thou wouldst give a world, if thou wast master of it, for more heart-love to him? Then take comfort, for there is sincerity of love to God in thy heart.

3. Another may say, I have not the spirit of prayer, which God useth to bestow on his children; I cannot attain to these enlargements and fluent expressions that I see others have in prayer. Ans. 1. It may be they are old experienced Christians thou conversest with, and they likewise have their ebbs and flowings as well as others; for the "Spirit blows when and where he listeth." Thou seest perhaps the one, but art unacquainted with the other. 2. It is thy happiness, thou hast to do in prayer with one that looks not so much to the words of the mouth, as the affections of the heart. If thou hast a heart centring on God, and flowing out towards him in duty. God loves that better than the most eloquent expressions.

4. Ah! saith some poor soul, I cannot attain to any tenderness of heart and frame in prayer. Ans. 1. Is it thy greatest grief and trouble that it is so? Then it is a good sign thou hast some tenderness in thy heart. 2. Dost thou look to thy elder brother, Jesus Christ, that he may plead for thee, and send his Spirit to help thy infirmities? Our blessed Lord Jesus has prayed for many that could not pray for themselves. Cry to him for the quickening influence of his Spirit, to enable you to call on his name; for he "gives his Spirit to them that ask him."

5. It may be some poor drooping soul is saying, I came to my Father's table yesterday, but instead of any comfortable discovery, all I got was a frown: my Father frowned, and seemed angry with me. Ans. 1. Thou hast reason to be thankful that he took any notice of thee at all; for sometimes God holds communion with his people by frowns and reproofs, and thereby humbles them for sin, and draws them nearer to himself. 2.

Perhaps God is correcting thee for some former sins against light, which as yet thou hast not mourned over: for those whom God takes into his family, and puts among his children, he will correct in his fatherly love, but "his loving-kindness he will not take away from them." Let all the children of God, and heirs of heaven, submit, in a humble and kindly manner, to the reproofs and corrections of their heavenly Father. And let them say, as Elihu to Job, under his sharp trials, "What I see not, teach thou me. If I have done iniquity, I will do so no more." Lord, train me up during my minority, as thou pleasest; make use of what discipline towards me thou thinkest best for me; only, if it be thy blessed will, make it known to me for my comfort, that I really belong to thy family, and shall not be shut out of doors for ever. And so my soul shall live and praise thy name.

SERMON V.—A SERMON AFTER THE COMMUNION.—THE FAINTING BELIEVER STRENGTHENED FOR HIS WORK.

He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might, he increaseth strength, Isa. xl. 29.

THE prophet having concluded the preceding chapter with a prophecy of the captivity of the Jews into Babylon, though it was many years before it came; he in this and the succeeding chapter, furnishes the church and people of God with a great many precious promises for their support and comfort, during that long captivity; which surely would be of great use to them in that cloudy and dark day.

In the latter end of this chapter, the prophet is reproving the people of God, who are now supposed to be captives at Babylon, for their unbelief and despondency under their affliction, in saying or thinking God had either cast them off, or could not help them, verse 27. For remedying whereof, he puts them in mind of God's power and all-sufficiency to help in the greatest straits, verse 28. And in the text and following verses, he assures them of God's compassion, and readiness to help them under all their sinking discouragements, "He giveth power to the faint," &c.

More particularly in the text, we may notice these things: 1. The sad case of many of God's people in captivity, "They were faint and without might," i. e. They were under pressures and burdens both outward and inward, that were ready to crush them, and make them faint away; they were called to several pieces both of service and suffering, for which they had no strength nor might of themselves. 2. We have their mercy and privilege under this sad case; power and strength; i. e. spiritual strength mainly, which is graciously promised them for their encouragement, under all their faintings and trials. 3. The author of this privilege, "The everlasting God, the Lord Jehovah, with whom is everlasting strength, who fainteth not, neither is weary." 4. The way how this mercy is conveyed; it is in a way of free gift, without any worth or merit on our part; he giveth it, and he increaseth it; he giveth strength where it is not, and he increaseth it where it is already given in any measure.

Doctrine, "That as the Lord's people while here are liable to many fainting discouragements, under which they cannot support themselves, so the Lord is pleased to give them suitable strength for all their exigencies." This is also confirmed from that gracious promise, recorded in the following chapter, Isa. xli. 10, "Fear thou not, for I am with thee: be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee, yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness." And the psalmist confirms this truth by his own comfortable experience, Psal. cxxxviii. 3, "In the day when I cried thou answeredst me, and strengthenedst me with strength to my soul."

The method I choose for prosecuting this doctrine, shall be,

I. To inquire into those fainting discouragements, which believers labour under while here.

II. Why the Lord doth let them meet with such trials.

III. How it is that the Lord doth strengthen his weak and fainting people.

IV. What are the great ends and uses for which the Lord gives such strength to his people.

V. Give some reasons to prove, that the Lord will certainly give them this strength.

VI. Make improvement.

I. As to the first, viz. To instance some of those fainting discouragements that believers labour under while here, and which in a special manner, call for divine support. And these are of two sorts; viz. either of a temporal or a spiritual nature.

1. Sometimes they meet with external afflicting providences, which are very discouraging: As when they are troubled with poverty and want, so that they know not how to subsist themselves and their families; this is a great trial, and requires spiritual strength from God to help them to carry right under it.—When they are destitute of earthly friends, and have none to comfort or sympathise with them in trouble; this is also a heavy trial that needs strength from God.—When they are loaded with reproaches and misrepresentations, and that not only from enemies, but even from friends; this hath been very sinking to the best of God's people.—When they are vexed with the death and loss of near and dear relations, pleasant children, and helpful friends; this case has been afflicting to many.—When they are under bodily sickness or racking pains, so that they “have no rest in their bones, wearisome nights are appointed for them, and they are full of tossings till the dawning of the day.”—When they have a near view of meeting with death, that king of terrors, and terror of kings.—When they are under the oppressions and persecution of cruel enemies. These are trials that the dearest of God’s children are exposed to, and under which they would be ready to faint, if they were not strengthened from above. And especially those outward pressures are very sinking and discouraging to them; especially when they think it is their sin that has brought them into these sad circumstances, or when their trials are of a long continuance, and it may be something in them appears to be singular, as it was in the case of the Jews in Babylon. Then it is that God’s people are ready to faint and succumb, and should look to God to step in with suitable supplies of strength.

2. Sometimes God’s people are troubled with fainting discouragements of a spiritual nature: As when they find indwelling corruption, and heart-plagues strong and prevailing: this case was very affecting and afflicting to David, Psal. lxxv. 3, and to Paul, Rom. vii. 24, and to the church, when they cried out, Isa. lxiv. 6, “Our iniquities like the wind have taken us away:” q. d. The tide is so strong, we have no might to stem it.—When the “enemy is exalted over them,” and Satan doth harrass them with blasphemous injections, horrid atheistical thoughts, and violent temptations; he sometimes tempts God’s children to the greatest of sins, as he tempted Job to curse God: how is the soul ready to faint at such a time, if it get not strength from God! and crieth out, “How long shall mine enemy be exalted over me? It is like a sword in my bones, when the enemy reproacheth me, and saith daily to me, Where is thy God? O my Rock, why hast thou forgotten me? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?”

3. When God hides his face, and they cannot get access to him in duty; so as they think, they are given up and left to struggle with Satan and corruption in their own strength. That is a melancholy case to the soul, under which it would faint, without secret support from God.

4. When they find their hearts wholly out of frame for any spiritual duty; by reason of much backwardness to it, wearying of it, and corruption working in them, which carries them away from God in time of duty: such as atheism, unbelief, worldly-mindedness, heart-hardness, &c. Now the soul would faint, and wholly backslide from God, if he did not secretly uphold it.

5. When the soul is brought back again, as it were, to the foot of mount Sinai, and made to hear the thunderings thereof, and the curses of a broken law renewed: the law gets a new commission to take the man into custody, and put his feet into the stocks: so that the old wounds are opened, and former guilt is revived, and God seems to behave to him like a stranger or an enemy. Thus he did to Heman, Psal. lxxxviii. Now, at such a time the soul is ready to faint, and say, “Is his mercy clean gone for ever! Will he be favourable no more? Hath he forgotten to be gracious? Hath he in his anger shut up his tender mercies? But especially if sickness, or the messenger of death, come and knock at the man’s door, while in such a case, O, how is he distressed with the melancholy apprehensions of death and judgment! “Death,” thinks he, “is near, and I am most unready for it; judgment is approaching, my accounts are unclear, and the Judge’s face all covered with frowns.” Now the soul indeed would faint if God in Christ did not support it.

6. As believers have many fainting discouragements, upon the account of their own case, so also upon a public account, in respect of the church, and land wherein they live: As when they see a spirit of slumber and deep sleep fallen upon professors, so that they are not moved with the judgments of God, when denounced both by his word and providence; yea, though “the fire be kindled, and burning round about them, yet they lay it not to heart.”—When they see religion under a great and visible decay among all ranks, many turning daily more careless and indifferent about duty, more slack about family-worship and secret prayer, and daily more carnal and worldly in their conversation. When they see Christian love decay, divisions and animosities increase, malice, envy, and hatred of one another prevail, and people growing more selfish, minding their own things, and careless about the things of Jesus Christ.—When they see God’s Spirit in a sad measure withdrawn from the assemblies of his people; ordinances become as a sealed book, dry breasts, and a miscarrying womb, so that Ichabod may be written on them, or “God is departed;” when they see communions lifeless, and not what they wont to be. Christ is absent, and yet few sensible of the judgment, or laying it to heart, so as to lament after the Lord. They see many busy to sin him away, but few endeavouring to pray him back again. The sincere seekers of God are often like to faint under this discouragement.—When they see many professors making soul-slips, yea, falling into scandalous sins, to the reproach of religion, and hardening of the wicked; and but few like to be found sincere in their profession.—When they see those that are truly godly, tender and conscientious in their walk, public-spirited and concerned for the interest of Christ, removing and going off the stage: this is a very melancholy and sinking discouragement to the few that are left behind, under which they need support from God: hence it was that the psalmist cries so earnestly, Psal. xii. 1, "Help, Lord, for the godly man that ceaseth: for the faithful fall from among the children of men"

II. The second thing proposed was, to inquire why the Lord lets his people be troubled with such fainting discouragements.

1. To correct them for their former faults and miscarriages; hence we read, Jer. iv. 18, when the Lord had threatened several sad things against his people, he saith, "thy ways and thy doings have procured these things to thee." God will have his people to smart for sin; not to make any satisfaction for sin, but to render sin bitter unto them.

2. To humble and make them low, in the midst of their great attainments and signal enjoyments: believers are still apt to be puffed up with these, if they were not kept under by humbling dispensations. Hence, even Paul himself had a messenger of Satan sent to buffet him, "lest he should be exalted above measure, through the abundance of revelations," 2 Cor. xii. 8.

3. To let them know the difference betwixt earth and heaven, a militant and triumphant state. When things go well with us in the world, we are apt to say, with Peter on the mount, "It is good for us to be here." But when these go ill, God's people turn their tongue, and say with the psalmist, Psal. lxxiii. 27, "It is good for me to draw nigh to God." When we live at ease, we are ready to think ourselves at home: but when trouble comes, we begin to say, "Arise, let us depart, this is not our rest." It is not easy to wean us from the comforts of this life: and therefore God many times doth rub gall and wormwood on the breasts of this present world, to imbitter its comforts, and take our hearts off it.

4. To awaken the spirit of prayer, and make them more importunate in their addresses to the throne of grace, Psal. cxxx. 1. Christ suffered the storm to continue, till the ship was almost overwhelmed, that the disciples might come and awaken him with their cries to help them, Matt. viii. 25.

5. That his people may get new proofs of his love and tender care in strengthening such weak reeds as they are, to endure such storms; and in his stepping in so seasonably for their relief and support, ready to faint and succumb. God's people have much to speak on this account, to the praise of his free grace, Psal. xciv. 18, "When I said, My foot slippeth, thy mercy, O Lord, held me up."

6. To cause his people long for heaven, and mend their peace in the way to it, Phil. i. 23. There is a great difference betwixt our prayers in health and in sickness; our repentings in prosperity and adversity, Isa xxvi. 16; Hos. v. 15. He that in prosperity prayed with a cold heart and dry eyes, can in affliction cry aloud, and mingle his prayers with tears. Though heaven was much out of sight and out of mind before, and he had scarce a thought of fitting; yet now when distress comes, he begins to sigh with David, Psal. lv. 6, "O that I had wings like a dove; for then would I flee away, and be at rest: I would hasten my escape from the windy tempest."

III. The next thing is to inquire how it is that the Lord doth strengthen his weak and fainting people. And here I shall do two things: First, Inquire into the nature of the spiritual strength the Lord gives his people. Second, Into the way and manner how he conveys it to them.

As to the first, This spiritual strength supposeth that the soul is made alive and raised out of the grave of sin and a natural state, by the quickening Spirit of God. And that the soul is united to Christ by faith, who is the fountain and channel of all grace and spiritual strength.

But more directly, God's strengthening his people imports these things:

1. The Lord's creating and implanting the habits of grace in the soul, which are the strength of the soul: and therefore called the armour of God, and our shield and helmet, Eph. vi.

2. His increasing of grace in the soul; for he not only plants these habits, but strengthens them, and gradually perfects what he has begun, Psal. xcii. 12, 13.

3. His breathing on his work of grace in the soul, and thereby actuating his people's graces, and drawing them forth into a lively exercise: for God must not only plant grace and increase it, but also set it at work and bring it into action," Phil. ii. 13, "It is God that worketh in you both to will and to do."

4. The Lord's strengthening of his fainting people imports his letting out and conveying of fresh supplies of grace to his people, in the time of their need. Not only doth he plant, increase, and actuate grace, but likewise he doth come in with seasonable supplies and reinforcements to the weak and decayed graces of his people, answerable to their pressures and exigencies. Grace of itself is but a creature, and subject to perish, and would soon be destroyed by the frequent attacks made upon it, if it were not seasonably reinforced with new supplies from its author. And thus the Lord, from time to time, feeds the believer's lamp with fresh oil; gives it more faith, more love, more hope, and more desires; and thus he gives power to the faint, and strengthens these things which remain when ready to die.

5. It imports the supplying the soul with experiences of the power, mercy, and faithfulness of God, for the nourishing and strengthening of faith in the time of trial; and therefore we find the Lord, when he is strengthening his fainting people, in the text and context, he refers them to their former experience, ver. 27, 28, "Hast thou not heard? Hast thou not known?" How then sayest thou, that God hath forsaken thee! Often do we find David strengthening his faith this way, Psal. xlii.; cxvi.

6. It lies in the Lord's applying to the soul his gracious and comfortable promises, and thereby animating his people with spiritual courage and resolution to grapple with all their enemies and difficulties. He shows that God is on their side, that his "grace is sufficient for them, and that he will never leave them, nor forsake them," Isa. xli. 10; Psal. cxviii. 6; Heb. xiii. 5, 6; 2 Cor. xii. 9.

7. The Lord strengthens his people, by giving them an encouraging view and prospect of a happy outgate from all their trials and discouragements, and of a glorious victory over all their enemies, Job xix. 25; Rom. xvi. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8.

I come to the second thing; viz. To show the way and manner how this spiritual strength is conveyed to believers. And this you may take up in these following propositions:

1. God has treasured up in Jesus Christ his Son, a fulness of grace and spiritual strength for his people. As our Mediator is the purchaser of his strength, so he is the trustee to whom it is given in order to be bestowed upon believers. This is clear from the promises of God for giving strength, they run in this channel, Zech. x. 12, "I will strengthen them in the Lord;" i. e. in Christ, "and they shall walk up and down in his name, saith the Lord."—From the precepts of God which are in the same strain, Eph. vi. 10, "Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might," 2 Tim. ii. 1, "My son, be strong in the grace that is in Jesus Christ."—From the practice of the saints, they all look for their strength this way, Isa. xlv. 24, "Surely, shall one say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength." And Paul saith, Phil. iv. 13, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." So that Christ is our head of influence and store-keeper. The stock of our grace and strength, since Adam's fall and mismanagement, is all put in Christ's hand; he is the great steward of heaven, the key of the store-house is in his custody, and on him we must daily depend for necessary supplies.

2. The way that Christ our head and treasurer communicates his strength, and gives out the necessary supplies thereof to his people, is by the ministration of the Holy Spirit, and his gracious operations and influences on their souls, John xv. 29; xvi. 14, 15. And for this effect, the Spirit of God dwells in believers, to excite and draw forth their graces to frequent acts and a lively exercise; and to give them those gracious aids and assistances their exigencies call for.

3. The way that the Holy Spirit gives this strength to believers is, in the use of appointed means, both public and private, Psal. lxxxiv. 4—7. Where we see that those who would go from strength to strength, must dwell in God's house, and attend his ordinances. We expect not our daily food without labouring, tilling, sowing, and reaping; so neither can we look for spiritual strength but in the use of the word, sacraments, and prayer.

IV. The fourth thing in the general method is, To show what are the great ends and uses for which the Lord gives this spiritual strength to his people.

1. He gives it to them for doing or performing of duty; for without new supplies of strength we cannot act spiritually, nor persevere in duty: hence the spouse cries out, Cant. i. 4, "Draw me, and we will run after thee." And the psalmist saith, Psal. cxix. 32, "I will run the ways of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart." God's work must ever be done in God's strength.

2. He gives it for suffering, and bearing of crosses and afflictions, and we need God's strength that we may do it without murmuring or fainting, Col. i. 11.

3. For fighting, we have strong and dangerous enemies to conflict with—the devil, the world, and indwelling sin; and we have no strength of our own to resist or subdue them. wherefore we must look to God for supernatural strength.

V. The next thing was to give reasons, why the Lord will certainly give suitable strength to his people under all their exigencies.

1. Because it was purchased for them by their Surety, Christ, and promised to them in him, Zech. x. 12.

2. Because they were, in the most solemn and serious manner, recommended to the care of God by his beloved Son Jesus Christ, when he was leaving the world, John xvii. 11.

3. Because of their near relation to him, and his great love to them; they are the subjects of his kingdom, the children of his family; yea, they are, as it were, the wife of his bosom; and will he not then take special care of them?

4. Because they rely and depend wholly upon the Lord himself for this strength and support, Isa. xxvi. 3; Psal. lvii. 2.

5. Because the Lord knows that his people have many strong and dangerous enemies; and that they have no inherent strength to hold out against them, having lost all that by the fall. Yea, he knows that they have a natural inclination to backsliding, that the seed of the worst sin is in them, and of themselves they cannot stand before the least spark of temptation; and so would be infallibly undone, if he did not strengthen them, Hos. ii. 7; Psal. xix. 13.

APPLICATION.

Use I. Of Information. We may hence see,

1. That worldly prosperity and carnal joy are no sign of God's favour: for God's people are subject to many fainting discouragements here. Wicked men receive their good things in this life, but believers' good things are to come.

2. We may hence be informed of the difference between the two covenants of works and grace. Adam, by the first, was to do all by his own inherent strength; but believers, under the second, do all by borrowed strength, and must be constantly beholden to God for new supplies. And it is well for us that it is so, for our stock is far surer in God's hand, than in our own. When the prodigal got his stock in his own hand, he presently left his father's house, "went into a far country," and squandered all away, and so would we, if God should trust us with it. Besides, by this gracious method, believers are kept humble all their days, and put to keep up a constant correspondence with a throne of grace, and give all the glory of their through-bearing to God's free grace. Blessed be God for the well ordered covenant.

3. We may hence see, how great security believers have for their through-bearing: almighty power is engaged for them; they are strengthened and "kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation." So that everlasting strength must fail before a believer can finally miscarry.

Use II. Of Reproof.

1. To those who are too secure and confident when they attain to any spiritual comfort or joy, and do not remember the fainting discouragements God's people are subject to while in this world. O communicants, have you been kindly entertained at this feast! Be not vain or secure, all things here are changeable. How suddenly was David's case altered! Psal. xxx. One time he is mounted up in prosperity; but being too confident, he is presently cast down and troubled. And in Psal. cxix. we find him at one time "rejoicing in God's testimonies, as much as in all riches;" and very soon after, his "soul is cleaving to the dust, and melting for heaviness." Go not then to build too much on sensible consolations, for these come and go at God's pleasure; it is in heaven only you can have continual day without night or cloudings; but here you are to look for changes, yea, for fainting discouragements, therefore prepare for them by securing a title to divine strength.

2. To these believers who give too much way to fainting discouragements, and do not encourage themselves in their covenanted God and his strength. I do not marvel, O communicants, though you are cast down, who are sensible of the hidings of God's face, the prevailing of heart-plagues, the buffetings of Satan, &c. but only give not way to excessive discouragement: I call it excessive when it is ready to make you give over hopes, lay aside endeavours, indispose you for holy duties, refuse to apply to Christ your all-sufficient help, or refuse comfort from God's promises of strength and support. Some indeed think religion lies in desperate unbelieving thoughts, and in making of complaints: but surely there is no religion there, otherwise we must conclude Cain, Judas, and the damned, to be godly. Religion rather lies in the actings of faith, and improving God's promises for strengthening us in doing his will.

3. To Arminians, who maintain the doctrine of free-will; viz. That it is in the power of a man's free-will to do that which is spiritually and savingly good, if he pleases to use his natural abilities. O, how little do these men know themselves that talk so! for if it be not in the power of a man's will, when graciously changed and renewed to do good, without superadded supplies of grace and strength from God from time to time, as certainly it is not; far less can a natural and unregenerate person do it, that is dead in trespasses and sins.

4. To those communicants who look not entirely to God in Christ for strength for the work and warfare, duties and difficulties before them; but lean too much to something in themselves, or something they have got at this occasion.

(1.) Some trust too much to the stability of their own resolution and engagements. They have vowed and sworn, and they hope likewise to perform accordingly. But do not depend upon these, otherwise they will soon fail you; as they did Peter after the first communion. The psalmist was under many resolutions to keep close to the way of duty, yet he says, Psal. lxxiii. 2, "My feet were almost gone, and my steps had well nigh slipped." And he acknowledges it was nothing but God's merey that held him up," Psal. xciv. 18.

2. Others trust too much to the stability of their gracious habits, without looking to God for daily renewed influences of strength, for actuating and recruiting their weak graces. But what is grace, faith, love, fear of God, repentance, hope? Of themselves they are but vanishing things, and if they were not seasonably strengthened and supplied from heaven, they would soon die, Rev. iii. 2.

5. We may here reprove those who make it an excuse for the neglect of duty, they want strength. O! it is because they want will. For can you say, that though you have no strength of yourselves; yet you desire to cast your impotent souls in God's way, and aim at duty as ye can, looking to God for strength, and pleading his promise? Could you say this, it were something. Were you like a man rowing up the water, and still beat back by the impetuous stream, you might have some shadow of excuse; but when you do not make sincere attempts, you can have none.

QUEST How shall we undertake to perform duty, when we are dead, and find influences and strength withdrawn?

ANS. Whatever be our case or frame, yet still God's command is of binding force on us, and obliges us to do it.

2. No pretence of indisposition, can warrant our not obeying a divine command: for our deadness and indisposition is our sin, and one sin can never excuse another. Two blacks cannot make one white. So that in a dead hour, you must essay to do your duty, though you can do nothing but the very outward form.

3. You must aim at your duty to prevent greater evils, for if you neglect it wholly, your case grows still worse: your deadness increases, your hardness, impenitency, darkness, weakness, and indisposition, will still grow greater.

4. By aiming at duty, you put yourselves in God's road; and when, like the blind man, you lie in Christ's way, you are more likely to get a visit or an alms from him than those who stay at a distance.

5. Duties performed, when we are indisposed, may be very pleasing to God. It must surely be acceptable to our gracious Lord and Master, to see one of his weak or lamed servants attempt to go his errands, though he halt and make but slow progress in his way: nay, this will move his tender heart to pity him, and give him strength. And many a time have his servants got supplies of strength on a sudden, when they have been essaying duty. Their souls, "ere they were aware, have made them like the chariots of Amīnadab," Cant. vi. 12. Therefore, O discouraged communicant, persist in aiming at thy duty, whatever be thy present frame. Who knows, when thou art lifting at thy heavy burden, but God will graciously lend thee aid and lift it for thee.

Use III. Of Trial. O communicants, examine if you have got any spiritual strength at this solemn feast. Many a weak believer has found it a strengthening meal to their fainting souls. Mark, if it be so with you. 1. Do ye find your graces more quick and vigorous than formerly. As, for instance, 1. Is faith more lively? Are you better pleased with the contrivance of grace, and method of salvation, than before? And are you now enabled to abandon your own righteousness, and go to your Surety, Christ; laying the burden of your sins upon him, and leaning wholly to him for pardon and acceptance with God: and also looking to him as your head of influences for heart-purity and sanctifying grace, and strength to perform duty? 2. Is your repentance and grief for sin increased? Do you see more of sin's deformity, and abhor it as the enemy of Christ? And are you more afraid of piercing your Redeemer by it, and more resolved against wicked company and temptations to sin, than before? 3. Is your love and desire toward Christ more quickened? Are you more restless without his presence? Would you part with your best enjoyments in the world, for a sight of his face? Are you more desirous of heart-holiness, that you may be capable to serve Christ, and advance the interest of his kingdom?

2. If this ordinance hath been a strengthening meal to you, then you will find more delight in duty than before, you will be inclined and enabled to pray more fervently, to hear more attentively, to praise more affectionately, to receive more believingly, keep the Sabbath more exactly, watch over your heart and ways more diligently: and, in a word, to be more humble and pious towards God, more just and righteous towards man, and more sober and temperate towards yourselves; yea, you will be more afraid to shift or neglect any known duty, than you were before.

3. You will be more animated and encouraged to "fight the good fight of faith," to resist the devil's temptations, and the world's allurements, to struggle against your lusts, and mortify indwelling sin. And you will be setting conscience on the watch-tower, to give warning of the enemy's approach; and you will not be slow to take the alarm.

4. If you have got more strength, you will be better reconciled to the cross than formerly; and content with patience and submission to underly what troubles and afflictions the Lord thinks fit to try you with for your soul's good; yea, and kiss the rod when it comes, saying, "Good is the will of the Lord concerning me."

Use IV. Of Exhortation. Let me hence exhort you to several duties.

1. Let those believers, who are not tried with such fainting discouragements as others, bless God for his tenderness towards them, and bear their smaller trials the more patiently. How gentle is your exercise and soul trouble, in respect of Job's, David's, Heman's, and many others, dear and near to God, who have been ready to faint under their burdens, and pressed above measure; God is gracious to you, he sees you are weak, and will not overburden you.

2. Let none misconstrue believers' exercises of spirit, nor despise them, because they are frequently faint and discouraged: for the greatest spirits in the world have been thus exercised. David was a man of singular valour, that had a heart as "the heart of a lion," 2 Sam. xvii. 10. A man of eminent wisdom, and therefore said to be "wise as an angel of God," 2 Sam. xiv. 20. A man of a cheerful temper, and a great master of music, and therefore called the "sweet singer of Israel," 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. And yet we frequently find him sore troubled, bowed down, cleaving to the dust, and sharply exercised under the hidings of God's face, and other soul-distresses.

3. Doth God give suitable strength to his people in all exigencies? Let none abuse this doctrine, by giving up with the use of the means that God has appointed; and neglecting to use their own endeavours. For though believers have Christ to lean to all their way in their journey to heaven; yet none must expect to be carried thither upon his shoulders, without setting down a foot. We may warrantably look to him for strength for every duty; yet it is in our using the means that this strength is conveyed.

4. Beware of leaning to yourselves, and neglecting to look for this promised strength. (1.) Lean not to your own purposes; for your "goodness is like the morning dew." (2.) Lean not to your gracious habits; for these are but creatures, and ready to die. (3.) Lean not to your duties and performances; for they are defiled and unclean. (4.) Lean not to your frames; for they are fleeting and inconstant. And besides, it is highly dangerous and provoking to God, for to trust in any of these; remember the fearful curse that is pronounced against him "that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord," Jer. xxvii. 5, 6. Whom then shall we trust? Read Isa. xxvi. 4, "Trust ye in the Lord for ever; for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength."

5. Let all believing communicants bless God for this new and excellent method of salvation through Jesus Christ. The new covenant is far better than the old. Now, our stock is not in our hand, but in Christ's, and he manages it for us; which is our great happiness. As when God brought Israel out of Egypt with a high hand, he did not set them down on the other side of the Red sea, and then bid them shift their way to Canaan: no, he led them on their way; yea, "As a man carries his children, so he bare them all the way they went." So when God, in a day of his power, brings an elect soul out of spiritual Egypt, he doth not set him in the way with a stock of strength in his hand, and then leave him to march through the wilderness alone: no, he leads and supports him all the way; for he knows that the whole country rises on him in his march, and if left to go alone, without special and renewed aid, he would never get to Canaan.

QUEST. But what course shall I take to get these seasonable supplies of strength from God, that I may be helped safe through the wilderness, without fainting and failing?

ANS. Take these directions:

1. Labour to be thoroughly convinced of your impotence and insufficiency, that you may be weak in your own sense and feeling; for the way to be strong, is to be weak, according to the apostle's experience, 2 Cor. xii. 10, "When I am weak, then am I strong." Hence also it is said of these worthies, Heb. xi. 34, "Out of weakness they were made strong," i. e. out of weakness felt and apprehended.

2. Humbly represent and bemoan your impotence before God, like Ephraim, Jer. xxxi. 18, "I heard Ephraim bemoaning himself, I was a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke." He felt his own impotence and aversion to what was good; and then he groans and looks up to God for power: "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned; for thou art the Lord my God." And, in the next verse, we see how readily the Lord stepped in with pity and help to him. Thus also did Jehoshaphat, and found help, 2 Chron. xx. 12, "We have no might against this great company that cometh against us, neither know we what to do; but our eyes are upon thee; q. d. Though we be weak, yet we know thou art infinitely powerful, and full of compassion.

3. Use well any small power you have, and it will increase. The right arm is more strong and vigorous than the left, because it is more exercised. So grace, the more it is exercised, the more it grows, Mat. xiii. 12; Prov. x. 29.

4. Wait on the Lord in the diligent use of the means; for it is promised, Isa. xl. 31, "They that wait upon the Lord, shall renew their strength." And in Psal. xxvii. 14, "Wait on the Lord, be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart: wait, I say, on the Lord." We must use, but not trust to the means, but to God in the due use of them.

5. Walk tenderly, and guard against every known sin; for sin lets out the soul's strength, as bleeding lets the spirit out of the body.

6. Be often looking, in a believing way, to the Mediator, Christ, your Treasurer and Head of influences; and derive all your supplies of strength from, and through him alone.

7. Carefully entertain the Spirit's motions, and fall in with them. "Grieve not the Spirit of Christ, which is sent to strengthen you; otherwise you will, in so doing, cast away your strength from you.

Lastly, Acquaint yourselves, O communicants, with the word of God, and its gracious promises of strength; lay them up in store against the time of need, and plead them humbly with God: for prayer, grounded on a promise is likely to prevail. This was David's argument under his faintings, Psal. cxix. 28, "Strengthen thou me according to thy word." And he had the experience of its prevailing with God, Psal. cxxxviii. 3, "In the day when I cried, thou answeredst me, and strengthenedst me with strength in my soul." I shall add no more, but conclude with the apostle's words, 1 Pet. v. 10, 11, "The God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you. To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever." Amen.

SACRAMENTAL ADVICES FROM VARIOUS SCRIPTURE-TEXTS.

ADVICE 1.—"COME THOU AND ALL THINE HOUSE INTO THE ARK," GEN. VII. 1.

As God in his mercy called Noah to come into the ark prepared for him and his household, to save him from drowning in the great deluge; so God by the gospel calls you, O man, to come into the Ark, Christ crucified, which he hath provided for perishing sinners, to save them from the deluge of wrath that is coming. God hath long forewarned you of it; nay, the flood is beginning to rise, it is time for thee to flee to this Ark; believe it, there is no other way for thy safety. The ark of thy prayers, or of thy tears, convictions, or reformations, will not save thee from it; nothing will do it but the Ark Christ.

As all who were out of Noah's ark perished in the flood; so will all perish who are out of Christ. These of the old world, who only came near to the ark, or touched the outside of it, they perished if they did not enter into it; so in like manner will those perish, who only come near Christ by an outward profession, and are not found in him by a true faith.

As the ark gave a good account of all that entered into it, not one of them was lost in the flood; so will Christ give a good account at the last day of all that fly to him by faith: none shall pluck them out of his hand, not one of them shall perish in the deluge of wrath; Christ will present them all safe to his Father, "Behold here am I, and the children thou hast given me."

As Noah's ark was accessible, and had a door in it for people to enter; so in a crucified Jesus there is a door of access opened, even a door of faith, whereby poor sinners of the Gentiles may have access to Christ, and to God in him, Acts xiv. 17. As Paul and Barnabas rehearsed it as glad tidings to the church, that "God had opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles;" so we Gentile sinners should gladly receive the news. Glory to "God in the highest," for opening this door of faith, and keeping it still open to perishing sinners.

Come, then, O Gentile sinner, enter in by this door to the Ark, and lodge thy soul within it, that thou mayest be safe from the flood of wrath that is coming upon the ungodly world. God forbid you be found hovering without the Ark, until the flood come and wash you off from the very sides of it. O how dismal and cutting will the thought be to you through all eternity, that you was so near Christ, and within a step of the Ark, and sometimes touching it, and yet never entered it! How sad will it be to perish, like the thief upon the cross, with a Saviour at your side! and to sink into hell betwixt the arms of mercy stretched forth to save you! Now, poor soul, the Ark is near you, flee to it with speed; behold, for your encouragement, there is a window opened in the side of the Ark, and mercy's hand is put forth to take in shelterless doves who come to it. Now is the time to bestir yourself, to come into the Ark without delay, and so prevent your perishing in the flood for ever.

QUEST. What shall I do to get into the Ark; to wit, a crucified Jesus?

Ans. 1. Be like Noah's dove which he sent forth, see that you find no rest for the sole of your foot any where else; turn your back upon all other arks of men's devising, they are all-insufficient to save you from the flood. Make not an ark of the absolute mercy of God out of Christ, seeing he declares a crucified Jesus to be the only channel of his mercy. Make not an ark of church-privileges, as your good education, admission to sealing ordinances, &c. for the ark did not save Shileh, nor the altar's horns Jeab, nor the temple save Jerusalem. Make not an altar of your gifts, knowledge, prayers, duties, moral honesty, or self-righteousness; for the flood, when it comes, will dash all these in pieces. Suppose those of the old world had built other ships as like the ark as possible, or had fled to high towers of their own contriving, the deluge would have destroyed them all; there was no safety for them but in Noah's ark alone. So whatever arks you devise to save you from wrath, if a crucified Christ, the Ark of God's building, be slighted, the flood will sweep away all your own arks as the "refuge of lies," Isa. xxviii. 17.

2. Labour to be thoroughly convinced of your misery while out of the Ark; and, in a deep sense of your necessity of getting into it, break presently over all the bars and hindrances which the devil casts into your way to stop your entry into the Ark; as unbelief, sinful pleasures, worldly cares, presumptuous hopes, carnal company, diversions, &c. break resolutely through all these to the Ark, as David's three mighty men brake through the host of the Philistines to the well of Bethlehem; surely your arguments for doing it are far stronger than theirs.

3. Approve heartily the whole contrivance of God's Ark in all its rooms and stories. Approve Christ crucified in his person, nature, offices, and relations; in his states of humiliation and exaltation. Accept of him in them all, subscribe to the whole new covenant scheme, as a device worthy of God, and of infinite wisdom; consent to the great end and design of it; namely, that self be debased, and free grace eternally magnified.

4. Be frequently essaying faith's flight unto the Ark, and to the window in the side of it; make earnest efforts, like Noah's restless dove, to get in; say often like David, Psal. lv. 6, "O that I had wings like a dove, for then I would fly away and be at rest." I would hasten my escape from the flood, and lodge my soul this minute in one of the rooms of the Ark. Believing is a work you should be often essaying, and though you cannot believe with saving faith, yet believe as you can, looking to God for more strength. You cannot pray, praise, or sanctify the sabbath aright, yet you aim at these duties as you can; so, in like manner, make honest attempts at believing and flying to Christ; and aim in his strength to apply his blood, every man to his own soul in particular, by an appropriating faith, corresponding to the free gospel offer, and taking home the remedy as his own; depending still upon the Spirit's grace, who will not fail those who trust in him, but assist them in making saving application.

5. Be willing to part with every thing that would compete with God's ark, however specious or plausible a show it may have. Renounce the old covenant, and all lurking places about Sinai, for in none of these can you find safety. Abhor your own righteousness for an ark, whatever shape it appear in; and embrace him alone for it, who is "the Lord our righteousness." His righteousness only is spotless, perfect, and law-biding.

6. Make a surrender of yourself, and all you have, to Jesus Christ, to be disposed of by him as he pleaseth: be willing to suffer the loss of all things for him; yea, count all things loss and dung, that you may win to the Ark, and be found therein when the flood cometh.

ADVICE II.—"BEHOLD I STAND AT THE DOOR AND KNOCK,"
REV. III. 20.

Lost sinner, I bring you good tidings; the eternal Son of God hath undertaken a long journey, and endured great sufferings to purchase salvation for thee! A dear purchase it is, dear hath it cost him to obtain it! and now he hath brought it the length of thy door, and there, O man, Christ is standing, knocking, and saying, "This day salvation is come to thy door," open and take it in. Now, can you refuse, O sinner, to take in Christ's purchased salvation, when Christ hath come with it to thy very door, even the door of thy heart. Behold he stands at it, and knocks for entrance! Open, open, &c.

The arguments for your opening are strong and many:—

1. Consider at whose door Christ stands, even at the door of a creature infinitely below him. O, it is a beggar's door, that hath nothing to entertain Christ with when he enters! yet saith he, Open to me, and I will bring in provision with me, and make thee a rich feast. It is at the door of a poor Lazarus, that is all full of ulcers and sores; yet, saith Christ, Open, and I will bring in the balm of Gilead, a plaster of my blood for healing all your sores, and, for as costly as it is, it shall cost you nothing. It is even at the door of an enemy, a mortal enemy, that Christ stands; you have spoken ill of him, thought ill of him, and done ill to him; you have affronted him, wounded him, and lodged his traitors and murderers; yet saith Christ, Open, and hearken to the offers and terms of reconciliation which I have purchased for you with my blood; they are most surprising and safe.—It is at the door of Satan's slaves that Christ stands, those who have been long drudging at his work and feeding upon his husks; yet, saith Christ, open to me, and I will set you at liberty, and make you God's free men and children. Why then will you not open and receive him joyfully? O sinner, stand amazed at Christ's condescending goodness, in standing at the door of such a smoky cottage, so ill swept, and out of order! Good reason have you to cry out, "Lord, I am not worthy thou shouldst come under my roof." But seeing thou humblest thyself to visit the unworthy in such a manner, come in, and but speak the word, and the house shall be cleansed, diseases healed, grievances redressed, and the soul made happy. It is highly your interest then to open the door, and welcome in your Saviour, who stands and knocks for access.

2. Again, consider who it is that stands at your door: it is even the King of glory, a King of infinite power and majesty! And will you not lift up the gates of your souls to this King? Were it but an earthly king that knocked at your door, you would soon open and receive him; yea, count it a great honour that you had such a person in your house. But what are clay kings to the "King of glory; to the Prince of the kings of the earth; to our great Emmanuel, the glorious Plant of renown, the Head of the elect world?" Who then would not cast the gates wide open to such a glorious King? Again, he is "the everlasting Father," and the Father of all believers, that stands and knocks! A Father full of pity, that follows after his prodigal children, and invites them to return to him!—And will not a child open the door to his father? Can you find in your heart to keep your compassionate Father standing at your door? Nay, further, it is your Husband that knocks, a loving Husband, that hath suffered much for your cause. And will not an affectionate spouse open and let in her husband? Moreover, it is your Physician that knocks, who brings healing medicines for all your diseases, by which he hath cured many thousands before now! And will not a sick and dying man let in such a Physician? Open, O sinner, why will you die?

3. Consider Christ's patience and long-suffering at your door; he doth not knock and then go away as one indifferent whether you open or not; no, he knocks and stands still; he stands and knocks again, and that after many repulses! No beggar, wanting an alms, would stand so long at our doors, as Christ stands at a beggar's door, not seeking to take from him but wanting to give unto him. O wonder at his goodness and long patience! Behold, he that hath a throne of glory to sit on, and ten thousand times ten thousand to bow before him, is willing, O sinner, to stand at thy door! Yes, he stands, whilst thou dost lie in the bosom of thy lusts. He stands without, whilst his enemies are let in, and allowed to possess the best seats! He stands at the door while Satan is let in, and gets the easy chair! O wonderful patience! that Christ, after so many affronts and repulses, and after seeing enemies preferred before him, should continue to stand at your door and knock! But, O sinner, do not try his patience too much, nor provoke him too long; for, observe the text, he now stands, he is on his feet ready to go away; the knock will be given that will prove the last, and thou knowest not but the present knock may be it; do not then delay to open one moment longer.

4. Consider Christ's earnest desire to be let into your heart; he not only stands at the door, but he knocks, yea, knocks loud, and knocks often, to convince you of his earnestness. Many a loud knock doth he give, by his calls and invitations to his word, "Come unto me—open unto me—look unto me." Many a knock gives he by his promises to you, "I will come in—I will sup with you—I will ease you—heal you—enlighten you—manifest myself to you," &c. Many a knock gives he by his threatenings of wrath and vengeance against those who shut their doors against him. Many a knock gives he by your own conscience, and by his own Spirit raising convictions, inclinations, desires, and purposes, within your heart, to bring you to a Saviour. And many a rap and knock doth he give at your door on sacramental occasions. Then it is he knocks aloud with his nailed hands and pierced feet, and stands at your door with his wounds open, his blood streaming, and his garments dyed with blood: and all this to show his earnestness to be let into your heart. Open then to Christ, O sinner, while he is knocking, be assured he will not knock always, this may possibly be the last day of the Spirit's knocks and strivings with thee; so that, if you refuse to open at this present knock, God may strike you dead and senseless all your life, clap a seal on the door that it shall never open; you may hear ministers knock after this, but never hear God's Spirit knock again; and "woe unto you if he depart from you." Remember, O man, for as many knocks God gives at your door, he keeps an exact account of them all, and will reckon them all up to you at the judgment-seat. And can you think he will open heaven to you then, who will not open your heart to him now! No, no; his ear will be as deaf to you hereafter, as yours is to him now. Read and believe that terrible word, Prov. i. 24, &c.

ADVICE III.—IF ANY MAN HEAR MY VOICE, AND OPEN THE DOOR, I WILL COME IN AND SUP WITH HIM," REV. III. 20.

Great and precious are the promises which Christ makes to them who hearken to his voice in the gospel-offers, and open their hearts to receive him as offered to them in all his offices; I come in, and bring all the benefits of my purchase with me, to entertain and feast that soul, even pardon, peace, light, life, grace, and glory.

I. Observe the duty called for, is to hear Christ's voice and open the door to him; that is, to accept and embrace the free gospel-offers, and heartily to acquiesce in the gospel-method of a sinner's reconciliation and sanctification through the righteousness of our glorious Immanuel, and willingly receive and submit to him as our Prophet, Priest, and King. What is the preaching of the gospel, but Christ's charming voice calling lost sinners home to himself? What is it but Christ's following them with invitations and entreaties to come to him and live? This is Christ's voice which he would have sinners to hear, come, and live; though they generally refuse to do it! O what condemned malefactor would refuse to hear the voice of his sovereign offering him his life, as condemned sinners do? John v. 40, "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life." Yet behold, after many refusals, he follows his offers with arguments, strong arguments, to prevail with sinners, and after the greatest obstinacy he is loth to break off his treaty with them, Hos. xi. 8, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?—Why will ye die?" What reason can you give "for refusing life? or for choosing death?"

II. Observe who it is that Christ calls to hear his voice, and open their doors to him: it is not this or that man only, or any particular sort of men, it is any man, every man that sits under the gospel. "If any man will hear my voice and open the door," saith Christ, "I will come in." "If any man will open," he he old man or young man, "I will come in." If the greatest sinner, the most crimson-coloured sinner, will open, I will come in. "Any man," if the swearer will open, if the sabbath-breaker, if the murderer, if the drunkard, if the unclean, if the thief, if the cheat, if the liar, if the mocker, if the prayerless man, if the man that hates God and godliness, will open to me, "I will come in and sup with him." O what encouragement doth this word, "If any man," give to every sinner to flee to Christ! If any man, whoever he be, whatever he hath done, if he will welcome me, receive me in the gospel-offers, I will come in to him.

III. Observe, Christ requires sinners to open the door that he may come in, to teach them; however unable they be, this is their duty; they must endeavour, and use all means to do it, and look up to him for strength. He will have the sinner's consent, and the soul made willing to receive him. O then cast open the door, open it wide, receive Christ wholly, receive him without reserve, open before him "the two-leaved gates," not the wicket, or one leaf only, but both leaves of the door. Let Christ have full and free consent of the soul, an abundant entrance into it. There are some resolving to open the door to Christ, others perhaps are beginning to open it: O let them not halt in doing it. With some the door is half open, and there they stop. They are almost, but not altogether Christians. O almost Christian, why do you halt? Why would you
